This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

JANET OSBORNE OR M'KINNON, Appellant.—Thomas Shaw, K.C. BARCLAY, CURLE, & COMPANY, Respondents.—William Campbell, K.C.

Appeal to House of Lords—Review of judgments pronounced under special jurisdiction—Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. c. 37), Sched. II., sec. 14 (c).—By sec. 14 (c) of the second schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, which applies to Scotland, "any application to the Sheriff as arbitrator shall be heard, tried, and determined summarily in the manner provided by the 52d section of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1876, save only that parties may be represented by any person authorised in writing to appear for them, and subject to the declaration that it shall be competent to either party, within the time and in accordance with the conditions prescribed by Act of Sederunt, to require the Sheriff to state a case on any question of law determined by him, and his decision thereon in such case may be submitted to either Division of the Court of Session, who may hear and determine the same finally, and remit to the Sheriff with instruction as to the judgment to be pronounced."

Held that in an arbitration under the Act the judgment of a Division of the Court of Session upon a case stated by the Sheriff cannot be appealed to the House of Lords.

(IN the Court of Session, infra, p. 436.)

APPEAL COMMITTEE. Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury.) Lord Davey. Lord Morris. Lord Shand. Lord Lindley.

This was an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, between Barclay, Curle, & Company, Limited, engineers, Whiteinch, Partick, and Janet Osborne or M'Kinnon, in which the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire (Boyd) awarded Mrs M'Kinnon compensation in respect of the death of her husband, and at the request of Barclay, Curle, & Company stated a case.

On 1st February 1901 the Second Division recalled the award of the arbitrator, and remited to him to dismiss the claim.

Mrs M'Kinnon appealed to the House of Lords.

Barclay, Curle, & Company presented a petition to the House of Lords to dismiss the appeal as incompetent.

The petition was ordered to be argued before the Appeal Committee by one counsel on each side.

After hearing counsel,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—We are all of opinion that this appeal is incompetent. Whatever may have been the reason for it, we think the Legislature has conferred the jurisdiction upon the Court of Session under circumstances and in language which render it impossible to say that any appeal to this House is competent. That may, and I think it does, render the observation which was made at the bar a just and true one, namely, that it does seem a somewhat anomalous condition of things that there should be an appeal in similar cases to this House from the English Court of Appeal, and yet none in Scotland; but that, after all, is only one of the anomalies which may be created by different legislation. We must construe the language as it stands here: and, looking at the language as it stands with reference to the subject-matter dealt with, we are all, as I have said, of opinion that the appeal is incompetent.

APPEAL dismissed, with costs.

THE GREAT NORTH OF SCOTLAND RAILWAY COMPANY (Defenders), Appellants.—Lord-Advocate Murray—Haldane, Q.C.—Ferguson. THE DUKE OF FIFE (Pursuer), Respondent.—Guthrie, Q.C.—Clyde.

Railway—Construction—Conveyance in implement of decreet-arbitral—Railway Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 19), secs. 60, 65.—The Railway Clauses Act, 1845, sec. 65, enacts,—"The company shall not be compelled to make any further or additional accommodation works for the use of owners and occupiers of land adjoining the railway after the expiration of the prescribed period, or if no period be prescribed, after five years from the opening of the railway for public use."

A decree-arbitral, dated 5th November 1856, determining the compensation payable by a railway company to a proprietor for lands taken by the company and for damage through the railway works, after findings in favour of the proprietor, proceeded,—"Fifth, we hereby repel all other claims made by" the proprietor "in the said reference, and find that the foresaid sums are in full satisfaction of all claims competent to him against the said railway company under the said reference, excepting always the obligation upon the said company to preserve the effective drainage of the lands in so far as the same may be interfered with by the construction of the works, and to keep up the works, fences, water-courses, and others, falling upon the said company under the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845."

On 11th August 1859, a disposition was executed by the proprietor, which, after narrating the decreet-arbitral, conveyed the land to the railway company under the conditions contained in the decreet-arbitral, and with the following declaration:—"Declaring that the said railway company shall be bound and obliged to preserve the effective drainage of the lands in so far as the same may be interfered with by the railway works, and to keep up the works, fences, water-courses, and others, falling upon them under the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845."

In an action raised in 1896 by the proprietor against the railway company the First Division of the Court of Session held that the disposition contained an unambiguous conventional obligation on the railway company to maintain the effective drainage of the pursuer's lands in all time coming, and that it was incompetent to refer to the decreet-arbitral as qualifying its construction.

In an appeal held, reversing the judgment, that the disposition fell to be construed in conformity with the decreet-arbitral on which it proceeded, and the Railway Clauses Act, and that after the lapse of the prescribed statutory period the railway company could not be called on to execute any additional accommodation works.

THE following narrative is taken from the judgment of Lord Macnaghten:—"More than forty years ago, in 1855, the Great North of Scotland Railway Company required to purchase and take for the purpose of their undertaking certain lands forming part of the Fife estate. The estate at the time was held under strict entail, and vested in one Thomas Robertson Chaplin, as trustee for the fourth Earl of Fife, who was then heir of entail. The usual notices were given, and the parties went to arbitration under the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, for the purpose of determining the sums to be paid by the company as purchase-money for the lands permanently taken, and as compensation for all damages sustained or to be sustained by the said trustee or by the estate of the said Earl by and through the works and operations of the railway company.

"The decreet-arbitral was dated the 5th of November 1856. The arbiters found the sums payable by way of purchase-money and compensation, and enumerated certain conditions to be observed by the parties, some in favour of the company and others in favour of the trustee, and then they proceeded as follows:—'We hereby repel all other claims made by the said Thomas Robertson Chaplin as trustee foresaid in the said reference, and find that the foresaid sums are in full satisfaction of all claims competent to him against the said railway company under the said reference, excepting always the obligation upon the said company to preserve the effective drainage of the lands in so far as the same may be interfered with by the construction of the works, and to keep up the works, fences, water-courses, and others, falling upon the said company under the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, and keep in repair the bottoms and sides of the streams deepened below the natural level by the railway company, and also to keep the same clear in so far as affected by the railway works.' The arbiters then directed that 'in respect the said lands were held under the fetters of strict entail,' the trustee should execute a conveyance in favour of the railway company on payment of the sums payable for purchase-money and compensation in accordance with the provision of the Lands Clauses Act.

"The conveyance was not executed until after the death of the fourth Earl and his trustee. It bears date the 11th of August 1859. It recites the decreet-arbitral and the provision for the execution of 'a valid and formal conveyance' which was to be made (as expressed in that recital) 'under the conditions and declarations contained in the said decreet-arbitral and hereinafter mentioned.' And then after recitals from which it appeared among other things that the purchase-money and compensation had been paid 'in terms of the said decreet-arbitral and Lands Clauses Act,' the lands permanently taken were duly conveyed to the railway company under the conditions contained in the decreet-arbitral, and with the following declaration:—'Declaring that the said railway company shall be bound and obliged to preserve the effective drainage of the lands in so far as the same may be interfered with by the railway works, and to keep up the works, fences, water-courses, and others, falling upon them under the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, and protect and keep in repair the bottoms and sides of the streams deepened below the natural level by the railway company, and also to keep the same clear in so far as affected by the railway works.'

"It was common ground in the argument before your Lordships that the latter part of the declaration which I have just read referring to 'the bottoms and sides of streams deepened below their natural level,' and the corresponding passage in the decreet-arbitral, have no application to the circumstances of the present case. It is therefore unnecessary to determine the scope and effect of the provision embodied therein. If it be anything more than the recognition of an existing statutory obligation under the Railway Clauses Act, it is at anyrate not inconsistent with anything which that Act contains."

The present action was raised in 1896 by the Duke of Fife against the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, to have it declared that the company were bound to implement the terms and conditions of the disposition of 1859, and in particular the clause or condition quoted above, and that the company had failed to implement the said clause. There was also a conclusion to have the defenders ordained to execute such works as might be necessary to satisfy their obligation, and there was a conclusion for damages.

* "OPINION.—The object of this action is to compel the defenders to implement an obligation imposed upon them by the disposition granted in their favour in 1859 by the pursuer's predecessors, of the land acquired from them by the defenders for the construction of their railway.

"The first question is as to the construction of the obligation. The first part of it runs as follows:—'Declaring that the said railway company shall be bound and obliged to preserve the effective drainage of the lands in so far as the same may be interfered with by the railway works, and to keep up the works, fences, water-courses, and others, falling upon them under the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.'

"That is a very badly-expressed sentence, because there is no proper antecedent to the words 'falling upon them.' It is plain enough that these words were intended to refer to statutory obligations upon the railway company in regard to keeping up works, fences, water-courses, and others. It is not so clear, however, whether the obligation to preserve the effective drainage is also a statutory obligation, or whether it is a contractual obligation imposed by the disposition.

"There is no difficulty in seeing what is the nature of the obligation in regard to drainage if it is competent to look at the decree-arbitral.

"In the decree-arbitral the arbiters, after fixing the price to be paid by the defenders for the lands and for severance damage, and dealing with accommodation works, abatement of rents, public burdens, and the expenses of the proceedings, repelled all other claims made by the then proprietor of the lands, and found 'that the aforesaid sums are in full satisfaction of all claims competent to him against the said railway company under the said reference, excepting always the obligation upon the company to preserve the effective drainage of the lands,' and then the clause proceeds as in the disposition.

"In the decree-arbitral, therefore, there is no ambiguity. What is excepted is 'the obligation' to preserve drainage, and keep up the fences, &c., in terms of the Railways Clauses Act, and it is plain that it was that obligation and no other which was intended to be incorporated in the disposition.

"But the pursuer says that it is incompetent to look at the decree-arbitral to aid in the construction of the clause in the disposition, and that

The pursuer reclaimed.

The First Division, on 23d November 1897, recalled the interlocu-the natural interpretation of that clause is to impose upon the defenders the obligation to do whatever is necessary in all time coming to preserve the effective drainage of the lands.

"Now, I do not think that it is incompetent to look at the decree-arbitral.

"The decree-arbitral and the disposition are two successive steps in the process by which the railway company exercised their statutory powers and acquired the lands, and the decree is not like negotiations or a previous agreement which the disposition superseded. I therefore do not think that it is incompetent to read the decree-arbitral in order to see what were the circumstances under which the disposition was granted, and what was the subject-matter with which it dealt. Again, it is not a question of controlling the words of the disposition. If the obligation in the disposition had been, upon a natural construction of the language used, different from the obligation in the decree-arbitral, I think that it would have been necessary to give effect to the former, either as superseding or being in addition to the obligation imposed by the decree-arbitral. But the only question here appears to me to be, to what does an ungrammatical and, if read literally, unintelligible sentence in the disposition refer? A reference to the decree-arbitral makes that clear, and shews that it refers to the obligation which had been already imposed by the decree-arbitral, and to nothing else.

"The next question is, What are the obligations laid upon a railway company by the Railways Clauses Act in regard to drainage of lands interfered with by their works? I think that the only obligations are those contained in the 60th section of the Act under the heading of 'Drainage Works.'

"The provision is that the company shall make, and at all times thereafter maintain, all necessary culverts and drains 'either over or under or by the sides of the railway, of such dimensions as will be sufficient at all times to convey the water as clearly from the lands lying near or affected by the railway as before the making of the railway or as nearly so as may be, and such works shall be made from time to time as the railway works proceed.'

"Now, it is not disputed that the defenders carried out these directions when they were constructing the railway, and it is not said that at the time the culverts and drains were not sufficient. Nor do the defenders dispute their liability to maintain the works which they made.

"The pursuer's case is that the works originally made to provide for drainage are no longer sufficient, and that the defenders are bound now to do whatever is necessary to put the drainage of the lands in as good a state as it was in prior to the formation of the railway.

"The question has arisen in this way. At the place in question the River Isla followed a winding course, and to save the expense of building bridges, the defenders exercised the powers conferred by the 16th section of the Railways Clauses Act and diverted the river, making it run in a new channel for a considerable distance along the railway line. Chiefly by reason of debris brought down by two streams which flow into the Isla, banks of sand and gravel have been formed across its course, and the effect has been to cause an accumulation of silt in the new channel, which has raised the surface level of the water considerably higher than it originally was. The result is that culverts and drains which when they were made had a sufficient outfall are now under water and of little use for drainage purposes. The pursuer does not say what he wants the defenders to do, but it is plain that what is required to make the drainage effective is to remove the banks which have formed across the river and clear out the new channel. Apart from the difficulty that the main bank is in the bed of the river tor of the Lord Ordinary, and found "that the railway works of the defenders have interfered with the drainage of the pursuer's lands so that it has become ineffective, and that the defenders have failed to below the new channel, and on lands to which the defenders have no right, they contend that they are under no obligation to keep the new channel or any part of the river free of natural obstructions.

"The defenders argued that the new channel was not a railway work in the sense of being one of the works authorised by their Act. As I have said, the new channel was made under the powers given by the 16th section of the Railways Clauses Act. But that Act was incorporated into the special Act, and it was by virtue of that incorporation that the defenders were able to exercise the powers contained in the general Act. Upon this point I need only refer to the judgment of Lord Cairns in regard to the analogous case of the diversion of a road in Rangeley v. Midland Railway Company, 1868, L. R., 3 Ch. App. 306. I therefore do not think the defenders can escape liability on the ground that the diversion of the Isla was not a work which they made under the authority of their Act.

"But that does not greatly advance matters, because the question remains, When a railway company have altered the course of a river, what obligation are they under, if any, to maintain the new course of the river and keep it from being silted up? I do not find in the statute any obligation of any kind laid upon a railway company in regard to the diverted part of a river. I shall consider presently whether the new channel of the river is to be regarded as part of 'the railway,' to which the obligation in regard to drainage works in the 60th section of the Railways Clauses Act applies, but apart from that provision the statute seems to contemplate that where the course of a river is altered the new course shall simply become part of the river, and that the railway company shall have no obligations in regard to it any more than they have in regard to other parts of the river. Of course that is on the assumption that the diversion is properly executed. If the work was unskilfully or negligently done, and injury followed to adjoining lands, I apprehend that the railway company might be liable in damages at common law.

"Upon the question whether the drainage provisions of the 60th section apply to the new channel of a river, there is more difficulty. The drains which the company are by that section directed to make are to be 'sufficient at all times to convey the water as clearly from the lands lying near or affected by the railway as before the making of the railway.' The expression 'the railway' is defined in the Act as meaning 'the railway and works by special Act authorised to be constructed.' That may mean only the works which are specified in the special Act, and not works which are only authorised by the incorporation into the special Act of the Railways Clauses Act. Further, it rather appears that the works referred to in the definition do not include all works which a railway company may make, because the expression 'the undertaking' is defined as meaning 'the railway and works of whatever description by the special Act authorised to be executed.' On the other hand, in the case of Rangeley to which I have referred, Lord Cairns said that the 16th section of the Railways Clauses Act appeared to him 'to shew conclusively that the diversion of the footway was part of the works authorised by the company's Act.' Further, if a company diverts a river for the purpose of making their line, there is the same reason for compelling them to restore drainage intersected by the new channel as there is for compelling them to restore drainage intersected by their line.

"I do not think, however, that that is a question which it is necessary to determine in this case, because it appears that the drainage works which the defenders made when they constructed their line and the new channel were designed in view of the fact that the river, instead of following its old fulfil the obligation incumbent on them under and in terms of the disposition of 11th August 1859 to preserve the said drainage effective, and decern." *

course ran alongside the line, and were intended to preserve drainage which had been affected both by the new channel and by the line.

"Further, I think that it is plain that the defenders cannot now be called upon to execute new works, because by the 65th section of the Act it is provided that the company 'shall not be compelled to make any further or additional accommodation works . . . after five years from the opening of the railway for public use.'

"The question, therefore, comes back to this, whether the defenders are bound to clear away banks which have formed, and silt which has been deposited in the bed of the river, so as to reduce the level of the water in the new channel to what it originally was. For the reason which I have given, I do not think they are under obligation to do so. . . ."

* LORD PRESIDENT.—In constructing their railway, the Great North of Scotland Railway Company diverted the River Isla at a part of its course where it formed a bend. The new course cut the arc, so to speak, and thus saved the company from having to form two bridges. The new channel was formed alongside of the railway—the land both for it and for the railway being acquired from the Earl of Fife.

From the configuration of the ground, the land at this part of the Isla was not easily drained; and the disposition, which formed the title of the railway company to the land so taken from Lord Fife, contains this clause:—"Declaring that the said railway company shall be bound and obliged to preserve the effective drainage of the lands in so far as the same may be interfered with by the railway works." The present action is rested on the allegation that the works of the railway company have so interfered with the drainage of the lands that it has ceased to be effective, and the company, who are defenders, are called on to restore the drainage to a state of efficiency.

Now, the Lord Ordinary's opinion contains a great deal of discussion about the statutes and about a decree-arbitral which is narrated in the disposition. In my view the first question is, what is the meaning of the obligation which is founded on? and is there any ambiguity in its terms? Unless there is such an ambiguity, I do not think that we have got anything to do with the decree-arbitral or with the statutes.

Now, the obligation which I have read seems to me to be perfectly intelligible, and to contain no ambiguity at all. The company undertake to keep the drainage of the lands effective so far as their works interfere with it. There is no question which are "the lands"; they are the lands portions of which are disponed to the company (as is made clear by a reference to the immediately preceding clause). Now, the diversion of the Isla was a work which manifestly interfered with the drainage of the land which formerly drained into the old course of the Isla, and now must necessarily drain into the new course. Accordingly it is quite intelligible that the company should undertake to keep the drainage of the lands effective.

In this view I cannot affect to find any difficulty in construing the clause primarily in question, and I have therefore no need to inquire whether the decree-arbitral or whether the railway statutes contain any such obligation. Whether they do or do not, there is the obligation written plain in the disposition.

It is attempted, however, to perplex the clause upon which I have commented by saying that it is qualified by the words "falling upon them under the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845," which occur a little further on. I do not think that these words are attached to

Mar. 20, 1901. Duke of Fife v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

The defenders appealed.

At delivering judgment,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case the pursuer raised an action with the object of compelling the railway company to keep up the works, fences, water-courses, and others, which the company were under an obligation to maintain, and to keep in repair the bottoms and sides of the streams which were deepened below the natural level by the railway company, and keep them clear in so far as they have been affected by the railway works.

The main contention of the pursuer was based upon the language of a somewhat ungrammatically drawn instrument, which in the pursuer's view of its construction imposed upon the railway company the perpetual obligation not only to keep and maintain the existing water-courses and the like, but apparently to execute whatever works were necessary to drain the pursuer's lands in the neighbourhood of the railway works.

or apply to the clause in question. They seem to me, in the structure of the sentence, to apply solely to the words which they immediately follow, viz.: "and to keep up the works, fences, water-courses, and others." Limited to those words, they are intelligible, although the expression is slightly inaccurate or elliptical, for it is not accurate to describe works as falling upon the company—what falls on the company being not the works but the keeping up the works. With this limited application, the reference to the Acts is good enough sense, although the expression is faulty, and the words of qualification are satisfied. With the more extended application, the construction becomes painfully difficult, for the substantive which is to be described as "falling upon the company" is the very complex one "the effective drainage of the lands in so far as the same may be interfered with by the railway works." Once this connection is assumed, the defenders proceed to make the adjective eat up the substantive, for they say that the words which I have so often quoted mean nothing more than "drains," the reason being that the maintenance of drains is all that falls upon the company under the Railways Clauses Act.

I regard this as an illegitimate process of construction. The question whether the words about the statute apply to the words about effective drainage is at least an open question; the words do not necessarily apply to them—they do not primarily apply to them—they are satisfied without applying to them. Whether they do or do not apply to them must be determined, in part, by considering, first, what is the natural meaning of the words to which it is proposed to apply them, and then whether the epithet to be applied harmonises with or is repugnant to that meaning. If the result of that consideration be to shew that the proposed application creates a repugnancy, then it is also proved that the epithet does not apply. To make up your mind that the epithet applies, and then construe the substantive by the necessities of the adjective, is the course of reasoning adopted by the defenders, and in my judgment it is fallacious.

I may add one remark on the construction of the passage in the disposition. The reference to the statutory obligations of the company seems to be introduced for the purpose of making it clear that the obligation about the effective drainage was not to come in place of the class of statutory obligations germane to that subject. This being done, the deed proceeds to lay on another obligation, which is admittedly conventional and not statutory.

In the view which I take of the disposition, I have no occasion, and I do not think I have any right, to examine the decree-arbitral. I may say, however, that if the decree-arbitral be examined, the true inference seems

v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

It appears to me that before dealing with the case as appearing on this record, it is desirable to point out the state of the law as applicable to such questions.

There is no doubt that in this Act under which the railway was made, as in most Acts of a similar character, obligations are placed upon the undertakers to make, keep, and maintain proper accommodation works for (among other purposes) the drainage of adjoining lands, but the obligation to keep and maintain is under the Acts limited to the keeping and maintaining of these works tales quales, and the Legislature has made proper provision for the sufficiency of such accommodation works by remitting that question to some tribunal whose determination shall be final, and has further provided in this, as in other Acts, that after a particular time no further works can be demanded by the adjoining proprietors. There does not appear in this case to be any question that the culverts and drains originally made are kept in proper repair, and it is not denied on the part of the railway company that if they were out of repair, there is a continuing obligation to keep and maintain them in proper condition.

The limitation in this case is five years. The Acts were passed in the years 1846 and 1855, and, of course, unless some other obligation exists beyond that involved in the statute, and assuming that the accommodation to be that Lord Fife's trustee, Mr Chaplin, had made a claim (plus his other claims for compensation) either for money or (if the company chose to give it) for an undertaking to keep his drainage right; that the company had offered an obligation; and that the arbiters accordingly repelled his claim "excepting always the obligation," that is to say, on the footing that an obligation was granted. If the decree-arbitral meant that Mr Chaplin was to be remitted, as regards drainage, to his rights under the Railways Clauses Act, then his claim would have been repelled simpliciter, and no exception have been made of an obligation. Indeed here, as well as in the construction of the disposition, the defenders' argument is that the obligation founded on was mere superfluous words.

The observation which I have made on the decree-arbitral suggests that its effect depends on the record on which it adjudges. We were told that, in fact, the claims submitted to the arbiters have been lost; and all this rather confirms one's belief in the soundness of letting the disposition tell its own story.

The view which I have now presented of the case gives rise to this issue of fact—have the works of the defenders so interfered with the drainage of the pursuer's lands as to render it ineffective?

It seems to me that the pursuer has succeeded in establishing his case. I shall briefly state the propositions of fact which lead to this conclusion. [His Lordship then adverted to the evidence upon which he held that the pursuer had succeeded in establishing his case.]

I would propose that we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and find that the railway works of the defenders have interfered with the drainage of the pursuer's lands so that it has become ineffective, and that the defenders have failed to fulfil the obligation incumbent on them under and in terms of the disposition of 11th August 1859 to preserve the said drainage effective. By adopting a declaration of this kind we shall protect the defenders against the suggestion that we are enforcing against them any obligation arising out of the statutes, or from anything other than the specific conventional obligation undertaken in this particular deed.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

works were sufficient and proper at the time they were made, which in my view cannot now be disputed, there is no ground for the pursuer's contention that the railway company are bound to execute new works.

Assuming as I do, on this part of the case, that the accommodation works originally executed must be held to be sufficient and proper for the purpose, it is not competent to raise again the question, which ought to have been determined within five years from the passing of the Acts. The whole purport and object of such a limitation would be defeated if it were possible to raise such questions after the limited period.

The policy of the Railway Acts is to limit the period within which railway companies may exercise certain powers, e.g., the power of taking land within a limited time, and it would be very unreasonable to suppose that the Legislature had intended to cast upon them a perpetual obligation, which at the same time it deprived them of the power of fulfilling.

The learned counsel who have argued on the part of the pursuer have hardly contested that this is the state of the law if the obligations on which they insist are simply to be found within the language of the Act of Parliament, but they insist that the instrument to which I have referred involves a much wider obligation, and apparently it is contended that the obligation is to keep the drainage of the lands effective so far as their works interfere with it.

Now, it becomes necessary to consider what is the history of the claim on which reliance is placed. It is a deed of disposition executed in pursuance of a decreet-arbitral, and I cannot entertain a doubt that that decreet-arbitral which is recited in the disposition, and which the disposition itself refers to as "dealing with a matter now in debate" is quite properly referred to by the Lord Ordinary as expounding what is the extent and meaning of the language of the disposition.

This is not a question of attempting to alter or qualify a deed by matter external of the deed itself, but it is in truth an exposition by the very deed itself of what was its bearing and intention.

Now, the decreet-arbitral, in pursuance of one direction of which this deed was executed, was a proceeding under 8 and 9 Vict. c. 19. The matter remitted in pursuance of the statute was, what sum should be paid in respect of the land which the railway company were taking under the powers of the Act.

Of course where portions of land adjoining the railway or intended railway were being taken, the question of what accommodation works were to be executed by the company would naturally and justly affect the amount which the company were called upon to pay, and in the decreet-arbitral now in question certain accommodation works (not, however, including drainage works) are recited as being part of the obligations undertaken by the company. Those who drew the decreet-arbitral when they were in ordinary form releasing the railway company from anything further than the payment of the purchase-money and the execution of the works, appear to have been struck by the generality of the language whereby the railway company were to be released, and by way of caution they inserted a parenthetic exception pointing out that this general release was not to operate to relieve the company from such statutory obligations as by law they were already under.

Duke of Fife v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

Notwithstanding the generality of the language, I cannot think that such an exception was necessary. The arbiters would have no authority to override the Act of Parliament, and as I have said, drainage was not a matter dealt with by the arbiters themselves, and indeed under the circumstances I doubt if they would have had authority to do so.

The framers of the disposition in endeavouring to give effect to the decreet-arbitral inverted the mode in which the rights of the railway company were to be preserved as well as the rights of the adjoining proprietors, and put into the disposition as a positive obligation what had only been preserved in the decreet-arbitral itself by way of exception. But it seems to me that this can make no difference in the operation of the deed. It is manifest that what was intended was to draw a deed in pursuance of the directions of the decreet-arbitral, and I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary that, reading the two instruments together, it is impossible to doubt what is the meaning and intention of the deed itself.

In my view, this disposes of the case, because, though questions of fact have been entered into, if the obligation founded on them is limited in the way which I have suggested, there is no fact in proof which establishes that the railway company have not fulfilled their obligations, and to my mind it would be a very serious thing indeed if, many years after the railway had been constructed, it could be contended that entirely new obligations could be created so that questions which ought to have been determined at the formation of the railway should be raised many years afterwards when circumstances, and indeed the natural conditions of the soil or the flow of the river, might have entirely changed.

I do not think it necessary to enter into the question of whether or not the complete diversion of a stream, or a portion of a stream, would carry with it, apart from any specific directions of the statute, any obligation in respect of the drainage of adjoining lands. Prima facie, one would suppose that a section authorising a diversion should itself provide for the conditions under which such a diversion was authorised, and if not provided for the rights and incidents of the diverted portion of the stream would carry with it the same rights and incidents as existed in the original portion of the stream diverted. But I say that in this case that question does not appear to me to arise, because in either event it either was or was not a condition of things which required the execution of drainage works. If it did, they should have been executed within the five years; if they did not, no subsequent action by anyone but the railway company themselves could cast upon them a new obligation.

As to the matters of fact with which the Lord Ordinary has dealt, both in respect of the nature of the action now raised, and in respect of the proper parties to be called if some action other than the present one were in debate, I am in entire agreement with his Lordship, and I have nothing to add to what he has said.

For these reasons I move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed against be reversed, that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary be restored, and that the respondent do pay to the appellants the costs both here and below.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—(After the narrative above quoted)—The interlocutors under appeal are founded entirely on the opening words of the declaration, to the effect that "the said railway company shall be bound and obliged to preserve the effective drainage of the lands so far as the same may be interfered with by the railway works." Taking those words by themselves without attending to the context, and excluding altogether from their consideration both the terms of the decreet-arbitral and the provisions of the Railway Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845, the learned Judges of the First Division hold that the obligation upon the railway company is "perfectly intelligible." They construe it as unlimited in extent. "There is the obligation," they say, "written plain in the disposition"; there is no need to inquire whether the decreet-arbitral or the Railway Clauses Act contains any such obligation; the Court has nothing to do with the Act or the award. Such being the view of the Court, the finding in the interlocutor of 23d November 1897 was that the railway works had interfered with the drainage of the pursuer's land, and that the defenders had failed to fulfil the obligation incumbent on them under and in terms of the disposition of the 11th of August 1859 to preserve the drainage effective. On the 21st of June 1898 the Court made a remit to a civil engineer to report what works were necessary to render the drainage effective. A report has been made recommending works outside the property of the railway company, the cost of which is said to be estimated by the company's engineers at £4000.

Now, the first observation which occurs to one in reference to the interlocutors under appeal is that if the railway company have indeed undertaken the obligation which the learned Judges of the First Division fasten upon them, they have taken upon themselves a burden from which the Railway Clauses Act expressly and in terms protects railway companies. Section 65 of that Act provides that the promoters shall not be compelled to make any further or additional accommodation works for the use of adjoining owners after the expiration of the prescribed period, or if no period be prescribed, after five years from the opening of the railway for public use. In the present case, many years after the statutory period has expired, the Court orders the appellants to make further and additional accommodation works, involving a present outlay of large amount and an indefinite liability in the future, while there is nothing in the conveyance or in the decreet-arbitral or in the evidence to suggest that the railway company ever dreamed of waiving the benefit of section 65, or were ever asked to make so foolish a sacrifice.

Then comes the question, has the Court of Session rightly construed the obligation on the part of the railway company, and are they right in shutting their eyes to the Railway Clauses Act and the decreet-arbitral? I think not. The decreet-arbitral and the conveyance are both parts of one and the same transaction. The governing instrument is the decreet-arbitral. The conveyance was executed in obedience to the directions contained in it. The conveyance was necessary for the purpose of constituting a valid feudal title to the lands taken permanently, but for no other purpose. The obligations imposed upon the company by the decreet-arbitral, or rather I should say recognised therein as being incumbent upon the company, do not derive their validity or gain any additional force from being "mentioned" in the conveyance. They were just as binding on the railway company before the conveyance as after it. Whatever force they have is derived solely from the railway statutes and the decreet-arbitral. The conveyance merely purports to repeat what is contained in the award. If there be any error or slip in the repetition, or if the words seem to have some different meaning when found in the conveyance, the error or slip must be corrected, or the matter put right, by referring to the decreet-arbitral.

Now, the decreet-arbitral is, I think, perfectly clear. It finds that the sums assessed as purchase-money and compensation are in full satisfaction of all claims competent to the landowner against the railway company, but at the same time, by way of precaution, it notices that there are certain obligations still incumbent upon the company, and that those obligations, so far at anyrate as they have to be considered for the purposes of the present case, are obligations falling upon the company under the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act. The first of those obligations is the obligation to preserve the effective drainage of the pursuer's land "so far as the same may be interfered with by the construction of the works." Instead of importing an obligation of indefinite duration involving an indefinite liability, the declaration in question is, in my opinion, merely a recognition of an existing liability cast upon the company by section 60 of the Railway Clauses Act, but limited and controlled by section 65. By section 60 the company became bound to make, for the accommodation of adjoining owners, all such culverts, drains, and other passages as would be "sufficient at all times to convey the water as clearly from the lands lying near or affected by the railway as before the making of the railway, or as nearly so as may be," and such works, it is to be observed, are to be made "from time to time as the works proceed." What is that but an obligation to "preserve the effective drainage of the land so far as the same may be interfered with by the construction of the works"? Perhaps it would have been better to have kept to the language of the Act. But for my part I cannot see the slightest difference in meaning and effect between the two expressions. And in each case the provision must be read in connection with the limitation of liability prescribed by the statute which the Court below has unfortunately ignored.

The next part of the declaration provides for the maintenance of the accommodation works when made; and then there is a reference to the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, which in the decreet-arbitral plainly applies to the obligation to preserve effective drainage as well as to the obligation to maintain the accommodation works. The parallel clause in the conveyance is somewhat elliptical, and taken by itself perhaps somewhat obscure, but it must, I think, be read by the light of the decreet-arbitral, and it must, I think, have the same meaning as the original provision from which it purports to be copied.

I am therefore of opinion that the conveyance does not impose upon the railway company any such obligation as that to which the First Division of the Court of Session have found them liable, and I am of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from ought to be reversed, and the action dismissed, with costs both here and below.

LORD MORRIS.—I am of the same opinion, and I can add nothing to the reasons which have been given by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, and my noble and learned friend opposite, Lord Macnaghten.

LORD SHAND.—I am also of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from should be reversed, and the judgment of the Lord Ordinary restored, and I concur in the opinions of my noble and learned friends the Lord Chancellor and Lord Macnaghten.

It is, in my opinion, taking much too narrow a view of the case to take the disposition of 1859, and what, indeed, I regard as a part only of a clause in that deed, as decisive of the questions between the parties. The decreet-arbitral, which is the basis of the disposition, and which is therein fully referred to, and the Railway Clauses Act, must also be looked at and be regarded as settling the rights of the parties. It was, indeed, in giving effect to the decreet-arbitral that the disposition itself was, as that deed bears, granted; and it is clear that section 65 of the Railway Clauses Act of 1845 applies, and is by the decreet-arbitral expressly made to apply, to the case. The result is that the company is not bound, after the prescribed period, which elapsed many years ago, to execute the drainage works which have been demanded. The reference to the decreet-arbitral in the disposition itself in my opinion makes it clear that the whole clause as to the drainage of the lands "in so far as the same may be interfered with by the railway works," and the keeping up of the accommodation works there enumerated which the disposition itself contains, is one and the same continuous clause, and gives effect only to sections 60 and 65 of the Railway Clauses Act of 1845 with the limitation as to time which the statute prescribes in imposing the obligation of maintenance on the railway company. That limitation as to time is sufficient to exclude the present action, which therefore entirely fails.

LORD BRAMPTON.—Having heard the judgment delivered by the Lord Chancellor, and having availed myself of the opportunity afforded me to read and carefully consider the judgment which my noble and learned friend Lord Macnaghten has just read, I desire only to express my entire concurrence in the views they have announced. I have nothing to add, feeling that those noble and learned Lords have in far better language than I have at my command embodied the opinion I had also formed for myself.

ORDERED that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and that of the Lord Ordinary be restored.

Trust—Power to lend to firm.—Held that a power given by a testator to lend part of his funds to a firm of which he was a partner applied only to the firm as existing at the date of his death, and did not authorise the trustees to continue the loan to the firm after a partner had retired.

Smith v. Patrick.

Trustee—Breach of Trust—Partnership—Transfer of assets and liabilities to new firm—Novation.—In December 1893 a partner in a large engineering business died, leaving a settlement in which he authorised his trustees to allow his share of the capital in the business "to remain as a loan" to the firm, so long as his trustees considered it reasonably safe to do so. His trustees were A and B, two of the three surviving partners, and his widow. The testator's widow died in April 1894. The deceased's capital, ascertained to amount to £19,000, was allowed to remain in the business, which was carried on by the surviving partners, A, B, and C.

On 23d December 1895 C retired from the firm, in terms of an agreement by which he received £9000, the other two partners A and B taking over the whole assets of the firm, and binding themselves to "pay and so relieve C of all the obligations due by the firm," and to exhibit to him discharges thereof. The trustees were not parties to this agreement, and no payment was made to the trust.

On 3d November 1896 A and B, as the surviving trustees of the testator, executed a deed, which, after narrating the agreement, set forth that the granters as trustees foresaid had accepted the new firm and its partners in lieu of the dissolved firm, and discharged the dissolved firm, and C as a partner thereof and as an individual, of all sums due to the trust.

On 3d December 1896 the new firm and the individual partners granted a trust-deed for behoof of their creditors. A and B thereafter assumed D and E as trustees of the testator, and subsequently resigned office.

D and E as trustees acceded to the trust for creditors and drew a dividend.

D and E as trustees then raised an action against C concluding for payment of the balance of the loan, the summons containing also a conclusion for reduction of the discharge.

Held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that the discharge granted by A and B as trustees in favour of the defender was entirely gratuitous and sine causa, and was invalid and ineffectual to discharge the defender of his liability for the loan.

Held further that the pursuers, by acceding to the trust for the creditors of the new firm, were not barred from claiming payment of the debt from the defender as a partner of the old firm.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury). Lord Shand. Lord Davey. Ld. Brampton. Ld. Robertson.

THIS action was raised in April 1898 by Joseph Patrick and Robert Howie, the trustees of the deceased Alexander Smith junior, engineer, Glasgow, against Alexander Dawson Smith, concluding for reduction of a deed of discharge, dated 3d November 1896, granted by the pursuers' predecessors in office, William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith, whereby they, as trustees of Alexander Smith, discharged the dissolved firm of A. & W. Smith & Company, and the defender, Alexander Dawson Smith, as a partner and as an individual, of a debt due by them to Alexander Smith junior, or to his trustees. The discharge was challenged on the grounds—(1) That it was granted by Alexander Smith's trustees without any consideration to the estate; and (2) because, being gratuitous, it was obtained by fraud and collusion on the part of the defender and the granters, William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith. The sum concluded for was £10,702, 2s. 6d., which was a balance of a debt to the trust-estate, which amounted to £19,857, 17s. 9d.

The discharge proceeded on the narrative that before 23d December 1895 the granters, William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith, were partners in business with the defender, Alexander Dawson Smith, under the firm of A. & W. Smith & Company; that the firm and partners were indebted to Alexander Smith's trustees (being William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith); that at that date the firm was dissolved by the retiral of the defender; and that William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith, as the continuing partners, undertook to relieve the defender, the retiring partner, of all the obligations due by the dissolved firm. The deed then proceeded, "and that we, as trustees foresaid, have accepted, as we do hereby accept, the present firm of A. & W. Smith & Company, engineers, Glasgow, of which we, the said William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith, are the sole partners, as debtors in lieu of the said dissolved firm and partners."

The following circumstances were disclosed in a proof:—The firm of A. & W. Smith & Company carried on business as engineers at the Eglinton Engine Works, Glasgow. On 7th December 1893 Alexander Smith junior died, after which the business was carried on by the remaining partners, William Smith, Hugh Osborne Smith, and the defender Alexander Dawson Smith, until 23d December 1895, when the defender retired.

By the trust-deed of Alexander Smith junior he nominated his wife and William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith as his trustees. He was survived by his widow, who died in April 1894, and by one child, Herbert, the sole beneficiary. With regard to the testator's interest in the firm, he specially authorised his trustees to allow his share of the capital to remain as a loan to the firm, should the partners be willing to retain it as a loan, so long as his trustees should think it safe to allow it to remain; and he further declared that his trustees should not be liable "for allowing my share of the capital in the firm of A. & W. Smith & Company to remain as a loan so long as they think proper, nor for any loss that may arise therefrom, seeing it is my desire that my share should remain in the firm."

The amount of the interest of Alexander Smith junior was allowed to remain in the firm. It was ascertained to be £19,857, 17s. 9d.

In January 1894 the defender visited Australia, and did not return until May 1895. During the defender's absence some pieces of business had been done which ultimately turned out badly; and, in particular, there was one relating to the supply of machinery to a sugar plantation, called the Bronte Estate, in Trinidad. Before the defender retired it had resulted in a debt to the firm of above £8000 insufficiently secured. The defender's partners entertained the idea that the firm should take over the whole sugar plantation and work it. The defender was strongly opposed to this project, considering it foreign to the legitimate business of the company. On 30th September 1895 William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith gave notice to the defender that the partnership would be dissolved as on 31st March 1896. This they had power to do under the contract. But there was a question whether, under the contract, they were entitled to buy out the defender and keep the business, or whether, as the defender believed, he was entitled to keep the business and pay out his partners. He endeavoured to raise capital for this purpose, but found himself unable to carry it out, partly because the other partners were, in a trust capacity, proprietors of the business premises.

The result was that the defender retired on terms expressed in a minute of agreement, dated 23d December 1895, between the other partners and him. It narrated that it had been arranged to dissolve the firm, and it provided (1) that the dissolution should be at the date of the deed, and that the defender should be as free to carry on the business of an engineer as if he had not been a partner, but should not be entitled to represent himself as successor in business of A. &

W. Smith & Company; (2) that the defender should be paid £9000; (3) that the parties should sign a notice of dissolution, which should be advertised and circulated among all the parties from whom the firm had received credit; (4) that William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith should "pay and so free and relieve the said Alexander Dawson Smith of all the obligations due by the said firm of A. & W. Smith & Company," and exhibit discharges thereof, and that William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith should be entitled to the whole assets.

The notice referred to in the agreement, which was advertised and sent to, inter alia, the trustees, was to the effect that the firm was dissolved of mutual consent, and that William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith would continue the business for their own behoof, and would collect all debts and discharge all liabilities.

The agreement was between the partners only. The trustees were not parties to it.

The defender did not think it necessary to get a formal discharge, and the matter was delayed. His agent, Mr Cook, however, thought it necessary, and pressed for it. It was not, however, obtained till 3d November 1896, when William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith signed the discharge against the strong remonstrance of their agent.

A month after this it was found that the firm was in financial difficulties which it could not overcome, and the firm and partners granted a trust-deed for behoof of their creditors in favour of Mr M'Clintock, C.A., whose examination disclosed an apparent deficit of above £13,000. In December 1896 the pursuers, Joseph Patrick and Robert Howie, were assumed as trustees of the deceased Alexander Smith, and the former trustees, William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith, resigned office. The trustees acceded to the trust for creditors, and they claimed, and received, a dividend. The sum sued for was the amount of the original debt, deducting the dividend.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The said discharge being entirely gratuitous and sine causa, and having been granted by the said William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith as trustees foresaid, and obtained by the said defender, without any consideration having been received or given therefor, is invalid and ineffectual to discharge the defender of his liability for said loan. (3) The said discharge being entirely gratuitous and sine causa, et separatim, having been obtained by fraud and collusion on the part of the defender and the said William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith, it ought to be reduced as concluded for.

The defender pleaded;—(4) The said discharge being valid and effectual, and not liable to challenge on any of the grounds libelled, the defender should be assoilzied. (5) The pursuers are barred by their actings since said discharge was granted from maintaining the conclusions of the summons. (6) It being impossible to effect restitutio in integrum, the conclusions for reduction should be refused.

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), on 5th January 1899, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that it is not proved that the discharge sought to be reduced was granted without consideration, or was obtained by fraud and collusion on the part of the defender, and of William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith, the trustees at the date of said discharge of Alexander Smith junior: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the whole conclusions of the summons, and decerns," &c.*

* The ground of the Lord Ordinary's judgment appears from the follow-

The pursuers reclaimed. The First Division, on 20th March 1900, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor [5th January 1899]: Find that the discharge granted by William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith in favour of the defender dated 3d November 1896 was entirely gratuitous and sine causa, and was granted by the said William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith, and obtained by the said defender, without any consideration having been received or given therefor, and is invalid and ineffectual to discharge the defender of his liability for the loan: Find that the said discharge was granted by the said William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith fraudulently:

ing extracts from his Lordship's opinion:—"If the trustees were under no antecedent obligation to grant this discharge, they were not, in the circumstances, entitled to grant it, and the defender could not avail himself of it. If so, the case would be a very hard one, because the decision would be against the clear understanding of all the parties who had transacted. But I think that in law it could not have been resisted.

"It seems to me, then, that the question comes to be whether, at the date of the discharge, the defender had right to insist on it on account of what had occurred before; or whether—which expresses the same thing in different terms—the trustees could at that time have successfully raised an action against the defender for payment of the debt. This really raises the defence of novation or delegation at some date before the date of the discharge. . . .

"In support of this defence various authorities were referred to; in particular, Bilborough v. Holmes, 1876, 5 Ch. Div., 255; Scarf v. Jardine, 1882, 7 App. Cas. 345; and Rolfe and Bank of Australasia v. Flower, Sutting & Co., L. R., 1 P. C. 27; and I would particularly refer to the exposition of the law of novation in cases of partnership by Lord Selborne in Scarf, supra. But I do not think it necessary to make further reference to these cases, because I find the law on the point expressed in subsection 3 of section 17 of the Partnership Act, 1890, 53 and 54 Vict. cap. 39, which is as follows:—'A retiring partner may be discharged from any existing liabilities, by an agreement to that effect between himself and the members of the firm, as newly constituted, and the creditors, and this agreement may be either express or inferred as a fact from the course of dealing between the creditors and the firm as newly constituted.'

"There was in this case no express agreement to the effect here specified; but it may be inferred from the course of dealing, and it is worthy of notice that the inference is to be drawn, not from anything which takes place between the creditors and the retiring partner, but from the course of dealing between the creditors and the new firm. The only question here is, whether an agreement by the trustees to discharge the defender can be inferred from their dealings with the new firm. No doubt there was not much time for a course of dealing between December 1895 and November 1896, and transactions were necessarily few when the creditors and debtors were identical. Still, I think it clear that the trustees intended to relieve the defender, and that their dealings must be held to have been in fulfilment of that intention. There are one or two points which may be here noticed. In the first place, there was the preparation of a bond in favour of the trustees. The draft was framed before the defender retired, and the name of the defender was inserted with those of the other two partners as obligants. But after his retiral this draft was revised by the agent of the remaining partners, and the defender's name was struck out. There is a minute of trustees, dated 10th February 1896, which bears that the agent of the trust reported that the bond to be granted by Messrs A. & W. Smith & Company to the trustees had been sent for revisal, and I think that at that date A. &

Smith v. Patrick.

Therefore sustain the second and third pleas in law stated for the pursuers: Reduce, decern, and declare in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons: Further, decern and ordain the defender to make payment to the pursuers, as trustees foresaid, of the sum of £9682, 17s. 6d. sterling, with interest at 5 per cent on the sum of £10,702, 2s. 6d., from 15th April 1898 to 7th July 1898, with interest at 5 per cent on the sum of £10,192, 10s. from 7th July 1898 to 22d September 1899, and with interest at 5 per cent on the said sum of £9682, 17s. 6d., from 22d September 1899 to the date of payment: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.*

W. Smith & Company could only signify the new firm. The defender was represented by a different agent, and this draft bond was never submitted to him. Again, on 2d June, the new firm paid the interest of the debt to the trustees. That might not of itself be conclusive, but it becomes so when it is considered that the creditors and debtors were the same, and that the trustees understood that the defender was to be discharged. Further, the money itself remained with the new firm. I am of opinion on the whole that the defence of novation is instructed, and that for a considerable time before the date of the discharge the change of the one debtor for the other had been effected.

"It remains for consideration whether this change of the one debtor for the other by novation was not to be regarded as a breach of trust from which the defender cannot benefit. Discharge by novation could not, it may be said, be better than express discharge, and the validity of an express discharge might be objected to as injurious to the trust. Now, I am of opinion that had a discharge been granted at that date, on the footing that the trustees should obtain the new firm as a debtor, it would have been effectual, for it would not have been without consideration to the trust. As to the adequacy of the trust security, it was for the trustees to judge, and I think that such a discharge could not have been accounted a breach of trust or a fraud against the trust, if it really and in substance amounted to a shorthand method of reinvesting the funds after they had been in form repaid to the trustees.

"It seems to me that this case falls to be decided in respect of what took place when the defender retired, and in respect of the subsequent dealings of the trustees with the new firm. If there was then novation, then the discharge was the mere formal implement of the preceding contract, and if it was so, it was granted with full consideration.

"While the case has appeared to me very difficult and complicated, the conclusion which I have reached seems to me certainly in accordance with equity.

"I do not require to consider the defences founded on the pursuers having acceded to the trust-deed granted by the new firm and its partners, and having claimed and obtained a dividend. I may only say that I do not see that this case can on that point be distinguished from the case of Morton's Trustees, 25 R. 72, or that this defence could be supported consistently with that decision.

"The defender complained that he had not been consulted enough in regard to the carrying out of the trust for creditors; but whether his complaint be well founded or no, I do not see how it could be directed against the pursuers, or could in itself form any ground of defence."

* LORD ADAM.—The Lord Ordinary has repelled the reasons of reduction and assoilzied the defender.

It appears that at the first meeting of the trustees, held on 10th January 1894, with reference to the power given to the trustees by the truster to allow his share in the firm of A. W. Smith & Company to remain as a loan to that firm, Mr William Smith stated that his firm was willing to take on loan the residue of the estate, and that the trustees having considered the

Smith v. Patrick.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—It appears to me that this is a particularly plain case, and I confess I should feel great regret if there could be any doubt as to what the decision of it should be.

In the first place, I disagree with the learned counsel for the appellant as to the true construction of the will, and I believe that is enough to decide this case. It appears to me that, not only in form but in substance, when a testator is disposing of his effects and leaving a large sum of money for the benefit of his son, it is not a mere technicality to say that a new firm is a different person. On the contrary, he has been familiar with the firm and the mode in which it is conducting its business and so on all his life, and when he says, "Well, there is a certain sum of money, £19,000, and that may continue in the firm as a loan," that means the firm with which he is familiar. It is not denied by the learned counsel here that the change which took place in the firm did make it a new and a different firm. In point of law, matter agreed to the loan, and instructed their agent, when the amount was ascertained, to have the loan put upon a proper footing by taking a personal bond for the amount from the firm and several partners thereof.

It further appears that at the next meeting of the trustees, held on 30th August 1895, the law-agent laid before the meeting a statement made up by A. W. Smith & Company as at 11th November 1894 shewing the sum of £19,857, 17s. 9d. as the balance of the deceased's interest in the firm, and that the trustees instructed their agent to prepare a personal bond for the signature of the partners of the firm for £19,500, and to obtain their cheque for the balance. The draft of such a bond was prepared and sent to the agents of the firm for revisal, but it was never executed.

The defender was abroad when these transactions took place, and he alleges that he was ignorant of these resolutions of the trustees, which, he says, were never communicated to him. But even if so, that does not appear to me to be material, for if the matter is to be considered as a loan to the firm, the other parties were entitled to bind him, in respect that it was a loan to be applied to the use of the firm, or if, as it appears to me, it is to be considered as a debt for which the firm was liable, as being the value of the interest of the deceased partner in the dissolved firm, in either case the three partners were conjunctly and severally liable for the amount.

In consequence of disputes between William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith on the one hand and the defender on the other (which it does not appear to be necessary to consider in detail) as to the manner in which the business of the firm was being conducted, the defender retired from the firm on 23d December 1895, in terms of a minute of agreement between the partners of that date.

By the second article of this agreement it was stipulated that William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith should pay to the defender the sum of £9000 sterling, which sum he had agreed to accept in full payment of all sums standing at his credit in the books of the company, whether in name of capital, interest, salary, or otherwise.

By the fourth article it was stipulated that William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith should pay, and so free and relieve the defender of all obligations due by the firm, and exhibit to him discharges thereof, and that the said William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith should have right to the whole debts due to the firm.

The defender of the same date received payment of this sum of £9000, but William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith did not pay all the obligations therefore, their contention is that if instead of there being all the persons that there were originally in it, not one of them remained, but it was a firm, to use the loose phrase which the learned counsel indulged in, "substantially carrying on the same business," that would be equally within the power given by the will. I entirely differ from that view. It appears to me that the acquaintanceship with the modes of business of the firm and the individuals composing it may have formed a factor, and probably did form a factor, in the mind of the testator for giving the permission that the money should continue as a loan. Having arrived at that conclusion, there can be no doubt as to what follows. The lending it to a new firm was not within any power given by the will, and inasmuch as it was not a proper trust investment, it was undoubtedly a breach of trust by the trustees.

Then as to the granting of the discharge, I do not think it requires much observation to shew that that discharge, whether granted or not, was not worth the paper on which it was written. There was no antecedent obliga-of the firm—at least they did not pay the debt due to the trustees of Alexander Smith junior and so relieve him thereof.

Notice was sent to the trustees of the dissolution of the firm, and that William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith were to carry on the business for their own behoof under the same firm name, and that they would collect all debts due to and discharge all the liabilities of the late firm.

It appears to me that there is nothing objectionable in this agreement as an agreement between the partners. The defender may or may not have made a good bargain, but that does not affect the present question. The trustees were no parties to the agreement, and I think that it is hopeless to contend that it had the effect of discharging the defender of his liability for the debt due to them—and the Lord Ordinary is of the same opinion.

The Lord Ordinary, however, is of opinion that circumstances occurred subsequent to the retirement of the defender from the firm, and before the date of the discharge sought to be reduced, which altered the complexion of the case and operated the discharge of the defender, and this, in his view, is the cardinal part of the case.

Subsection 3, section 17, of the Partnership Act, 1890, enacts that a retiring partner may be discharged from any existing liabilities by an agreement to that effect between himself and the members of the firm as newly constituted and the creditors, and that this agreement may be either express or inferred as a fact from the course of dealing between the creditors and the firm as newly constituted.

The Lord Ordinary thinks that there was such a course of dealing between the trustees and the newly constituted firm from which it can be inferred as a fact that the trustees agreed to discharge the defender.

The first circumstance on which he founds is that a draft bond was prepared in favour of the trustees for the amount of the debt due to them, and that in this draft the defender appeared as a conjunct and several debtor with William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith, but that after the defender's retiral from the firm the draft was revised by the agent for William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith, when the defender's name was struck out of it, leaving William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith as the only debtors on the face of the bond. If the name of the defender had been struck out of the draft bond by the agent of the creditors, or if the bond as so altered had been accepted by them, I could have seen the force of the observation, but as neither of these things happened I fail to see the relevancy of the circumstance.

The only other circumstance founded on is that on 2d June 1896 the trustees accepted from the new firm a sum of £452, 12s. 11d., being a half tion on the trustees to grant the discharge at all. What they did was to grant the discharge to a person, because in their individual capacity they had agreed with him to do it; and in regard to their doing that I confess I take the view taken in the Inner-House. It appears to me that, if we are to form a judgment upon the facts, the circumstances shew most distinctly that the reason why they granted the discharge was in order to escape from the embarrassment of having to pay a large sum of money; that in so doing they did not regard the interests of the persons whose interests as trustees they were bound to regard; and in that respect I agree with the unanimous judgment of the Inner-House, that they were guilty of a fraudulent breach of trust. It may be very hard upon the appellant, to whom, so far as I can see, no blame is attributable at all, that he is made to suffer for their fraud; but the question is whether or not the beneficiary is to suffer by the fraud of his trustees. It appears to me that there is no doubt that there was not the least pretence of justification for the acting of this new firm in its character as a firm, and then its members alternating with themselves year's interest on the debt. This sum was paid to the agent of the trust and a receipt for it granted by him. He certainly never imagined that by so doing he was discharging the defender of his liability for the capital of the debt.

I do not think that it can possibly be inferred from the trustees' acceptance of this sum from the new firm, who had intimated to them that they had undertaken to pay the debts of the old firm, that they thereby agreed to discharge the defender of his existing liabilities, or, as the Lord Ordinary puts it, agreed to accept the new firm as their sole debtor in lieu of the old firm and its partners. The mere acceptance of the money would not have that effect in law, and if that be so, there is nothing in the case that I see to give it that effect.

The Lord Ordinary says that the taking of the money might not of itself be conclusive, but that it becomes so when it is considered that the creditors and the debtors were the same, and that the trustees understood that the defender was to be discharged. I think it is a fallacy to say that the creditors and debtors were the same. The trustees were, no doubt, nominally the creditors, but the true creditor was the beneficiary under the trust, nor were the debtors the same, because the defender was a debtor and he was not a trustee, nor do I know of any evidence that the trustees understood that the defender was to be discharged by this payment, or otherwise than by payment by William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith of the obligations of the old firm, as they had undertaken to him to do.

The truth is, that William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith, in their capacity as trustees, had never had the matter of the defender's discharge under their consideration at all. The minutes of meeting of the trustees have been produced, and there is only one minute during the period in question, and it has no reference to the matter.

I cannot concur in the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, that prior to the date of the discharge which we have now to consider there had been novation of the debt.

This discharge is dated 3d November 1896, and is granted by William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith in favour of the defender.

It proceeds on the narrative that they prior to 23d December 1895 had carried on business with the defender under the firm of A. W. Smith & Company, that the firm and partners were indebted to them at the said date as trustees of Alexander Smith junior, that the firm was dissolved at the said date by the retiral therefrom of the defender, and that they as the continuing partners undertook to pay, free, and relieve the defender of all in their character as trustees. It is said, forsooth, that a wide discretion was given to the trustees. Yes, but acting as trustees, and not when they are deciding for themselves and in their own interests whether they will preserve the property of their cestui que trust or not, or whether they will do that which in effect is supplying out of the beneficiary's own money a sort of composition which they pay to their creditors, or at least in great measure.

I should be very sorry indeed if any doubt were entertained about the principles upon which this case should be decided. It appears to me that it is luce clarius that the judgment of the Inner-House is right, and therefore I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed, with costs.

LORD SHAND.—I shall make only a few observations in this case, after what has fallen from his Lordship on the woolsack, for I concur entirely in all that has been said.

It has been submitted in argument that the terms of this trust-deed are the obligations due by the dissolved firm, and that they, as trustees foresaid, had accepted, as they thereby accepted, the present firm of A. W. Smith & Company, of which they were the sole partners, as their debtors in lieu of the dissolved firm and partners, and therefore they thereby discharged the said dissolved firm and the defender as a partner thereof and as an individual, of all sums due and addebted by them or him to the deceased Alexander Smith junior, or to them as trustees foresaid.

It is desirable to see under what circumstances this discharge was considered and signed. It appears, accordingly, from the minutes of meeting at which this was done, that Mr Parker, the agent of the trustees, very properly stated to them that as they themselves were the only partners of the firm it would be difficult for them as trustees in the trust to consider the matter impartially, and that they ought to assume several other trustees, who would consider the application for the discharge of the defender apart from the interest of A. W. Smith & Company in the matter, and that after assuming new trustees they should resign the trusteeship.

The agent further pointed out to them that the effect of their signing the discharge was to discharge a security held for the trust investments, and that they ought not to do so, and further, that if they were not also partners of A. W. Smith & Company they would not do so without an independent inquiry as to the security that would remain.

It further appears from the minute of meeting, that the trustees, after full consideration, took the matter into their own hands and resolved to grant the discharge, and the instrument being laid on the table they signed the same.

It was in these circumstances that the discharge was signed.

William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith were at the time being pressed by the defender to pay the debt and so operate his discharge, as they were bound to do. The Lord Ordinary thinks—and I agree with him—that they knew they could not pay the debt. It was pointed out to them what the effect would be as regards the trust-estate of their granting the discharge, and having regard to their conflicting interests as creditors and debtors they were not in a position to consider the matter impartially; nevertheless they took the matter into their own hands and signed the discharge. By so doing it appears to me that as trustees they knowingly and deliberately sacrificed the interests of the estate under their charge in their own personal interest as debtors to the trust. By so doing it appears to me that they not only committed a breach of trust, but a fraudulent breach of trust.

The next question for consideration is the position of the defender in very wide indeed—that they authorise practically a loan, not only to the firm as it existed at the time of the testator's death, but to that firm, if continued, whatever change may occur in the partners. I agree with your Lordship in thinking that it was an important change in the firm that one of the partners, the partner who seems to have taken the entire charge of the engineering department, had withdrawn from the firm, and I think, therefore, as your Lordship does, that on that ground it was ultra vires on the part of the trustees to continue or to give the loan to the new firm.

In the next place, there is undoubtedly this peculiarity in the case, and it is a very important one, that when the trust-deed was executed there were three trustees named in existence—William Smith, Hugh Osborne Smith, and the testator's widow. On the other hand, there were three partners—William Smith, Hugh Osborne Smith, both of whom were trustees, and Alexander Dawson Smith, who was not. When Alexander Dawson Smith retired from the business and William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith became the sole partners, they were also the sole trustees, the matter of this discharge, and I do not see that he was in any way to blame in taking it. It is true that the discharge was not in such terms as his ex-partners were bound to have procured and exhibited to him. They were bound to pay the debt, and so free and relieve him of it. It appears, however, on the face of the discharge, that they had not paid the debt, and that he was discharged only because the trustees alleged that they had agreed to accept the new firm and its partners as their debtors in lieu of the old firm and its partners. If the defender chose to be content with such a discharge, valeat quantum, I think he was entitled to take it.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that no fraud attaches to the defender as regards this discharge. He was not bound to know anything, and apparently knew nothing, of the proceedings of William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith, either as trustees or as partners of the firm after he had quitted it in December 1895.

I further agree with the Lord Ordinary that the fact that the defender was not participant in the fraud of William and Hugh Osborne Smith is not necessarily sufficient to support the discharge as far as he is concerned.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in his statement of the law on the matter as applicable to this case to the effect that if the defender was the debtor of the trust at the date of the discharge, and if the trustees were under no antecedent obligation to grant it, if it was gratuitous, and if in granting it they acted fraudulently and in breach of their trust, then the discharge cannot be maintained.

I think that all these conditions are complied with in this case.

I have already stated the grounds on which I think, differing from the Lord Ordinary, that the trustees were under no antecedent obligation to grant the deed, in respect that there was no novation of the debt, and that therefore the defender remained a debtor to the trust.

It appears to me that the discharge was entirely gratuitous. Its effect was simply to discharge the defender. So far as I can see, the trust-estate received no benefit or consideration, valuable or otherwise, in consequence of its having been granted, and I have already said that I think the trustees acted fraudulently in granting it. If that be so, however hard it may be on the defender, I do not think the discharge can be supported in law.

The only other matter to which I think it necessary to refer is, that in December 1896 the new firm granted a trust-deed for behoof of their creditors, that the pursuers acceded to the trust, and claimed and received several dividends from the estate.

It was strongly contended to us, on the authority of the case of Scarf v.

the widow having died in the meantime. The positions of creditors and debtors were united in them alone. It appears to me that in those circumstances they, as the sole creditors, not only could not lawfully lend to themselves as the sole debtors, but had no power to grant the discharge in favour of the firm of which they were themselves the sole partners. It is, I think, clear that the discharge was entirely without consideration, for it is idle to say that in accepting the firm of which the trustees themselves were alone partners as debtors the trust-estate was getting any security which it had not already. The result of the deed was practically to discharge the appellant of his indebtedness to the trust-estate without con-

Jardine[1] referred to by the Lord Ordinary, that the pursuers had thereby elected to accept the new firm as their debtor, with the necessary result of discharging the previous firm and its partners of their liabilities.

I think it only necessary to say that that case appears to me to differ in essential particulars from the present, which I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking cannot be distinguished from the case of Morton's Trustees,[2] and which we are bound to follow.

On the whole matter, I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, and decree pronounced in favour of the pursuers.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur entirely in Lord Adam's opinion, and shall only state the results as they present themselves to my mind in two propositions. On the first and main question, it is certain that the trustees as such received no consideration whatever for the discharge which they granted, and as the discharge was gratuitous it follows that the defender, as a person taking benefit under a gratuitous deed, can have no right other than what the granter was entitled to give. The granting of this discharge was a manifest breach of trust on the part of the trustees, and so the right of the defender, who gave nothing for the discharge, is subject to the infirmity of the trustees' title.

On the second point, I observe that in the case of Scarf v. Jardine[1] the defender was not liable by contract for the debt on which he was sued. He was a retired partner, and he was sought to be made liable, not for a debt incurred by him as a member of the firm, but for a debt incurred after he had retired, on the ground that he remained liable as a partner because he had not given notice of his retirement. In these circumstances the House of Lords was of opinion that the act of claiming from the representatives of the new firm was inconsistent with the only hypothesis on which the case against the defender could be sustained, viz., that the creditor held the old firm liable. In the present case Mr Smith was an original debtor in the obligation, because the trust money was lent to the three partners collectively, and the fact that his partners and successors in the business have been made liable through their trustee is not in any way inconsistent with the theory of this action, which is, that the three partners of the old firm were and are, conjunctly and severally, responsible for the loan. While at first sight the case of Scarf v. Jardine[1] may appear to be analogous to the present case, when it is further examined it is seen that there is a clear distinction in principle—I mean that the principle of election there given effect to has no application to a case where all the parties were originally liable as co-obligants in the obligation resulting from the loan.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

sideration, and the discharge was granted really in the interest or for the pecuniary benefit of the trustees themselves, who took the matter into their own hands and disregarded the judicious and sound advice of their law-agent. In my opinion this was a clear breach of trust, and the deed was invalid.

Upon the last point I shall only say that I do not think the following of this trust-estate, so as to recover the moneys which go to the credit of the appellant and reduce his liability for the debt now sued for, to a large extent, can be founded on as a proceeding that releases him in any way. It appears to me that it was a proceeding that was for his advantage. He gets the benefit of it, and I fail to find any circumstances which enable him to plead that he was thereby released from liability.

I have only to add that I concur in the observations made by Lord Adam and Lord M'Laren in their judgments on the reclaiming note.

LORD DAVEY.—I agree with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack that this is a particularly plain case. It appears to me that you have only to read the document which is impeached, namely, the so-called discharge signed by William Smith and his brother Hugh Osborne Smith, to see on the face of it what the transaction was. It recites that the firm is "dissolved" "by the retiral therefrom of the said Alexander Dawson Smith," and then it states,—"We, the said William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith, as the continuing partners, undertook to free and relieve the said Alexander Dawson Smith of all the obligations due by the dissolved firm, and that we, as trustees foresaid, have accepted, as we hereby accept, the present firm of A. & W. Smith & Co." (that is, themselves), "engineers, Glasgow, of which we, the said William Smith and Hugh Osborne Smith, are the sole partners, as our debtors, in lieu of the said dissolved firm and partners; therefore we, as trustees foresaid, have discharged and hereby discharge the said dissolved firm of A. & W. Smith & Co. and the said Alexander Dawson Smith as a partner thereof." In other words, we, as trustees, having as our debtors ourselves and Alexander Dawson Smith, elect to discharge Alexander Dawson Smith and to retain ourselves. Now, my Lords, can anybody acquainted, I do not say with the refined doctrines of equity, but with the commonest principles of law, treat that document as entitled to the slightest value in any respect? It is undoubted that Alexander Dawson Smith was a debtor to this trust-estate, and he relies upon this document as his discharge. My Lords, I agree with what Lord Adam said, that "By so doing" (that is, by signing the discharge) "it appears to me that, as trustees, they knowingly or deliberately sacrificed the interests of the estate under their charge in their own personal interest as debtors to the trust. By so doing, it appears to me that they not only committed a breach of trust, but a fraudulent breach of trust."

I will not say anything about the construction of the will, because I entirely agree with what has fallen from my noble and learned friend. There can be no doubt in my mind that a power to lend to a firm consisting of certain individuals does not authorise a loan to a firm differently constituted whether including more individuals or less. Still less does it authorise it when the suggestion is that the trustees having by the death of one of their number been reduced to two persons and the partnership by the retirement of one of the partners having been reduced to the same two persons, those gentlemen in their position of trustees and their position of partners take the trust-estate into their own hands and use it for their own business under the pretence that they have lent it to themselves.

I think it is perhaps due to Mr Levett that I should say one word as to his argument that by proving against the partnership estate the present trustees have debarred themselves from suing Mr Alexander Dawson Smith, the appellant. My Lords, it appears to me, as I have already said, that Mr Alexander Dawson Smith, having obtained his discharge by means of a breach of trust, cannot set up that discharge, and being a debtor to the trust-estate has not discharged himself, and remains liable. But, my lords, that is quite consistent with the power of the beneficiary to follow the trust-estate into the place where it has improperly got, namely, into the partnership funds, and claim the amount of the trust-estate against the partnership estate. It is well established that you may sue a person who is liable to replace trust-estate, and you may also pursue your other remedies against the trustees who have improperly dealt with it. My Lords, I need say no more about it, but merely add that I entirely agree that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

LORD BRAMPTON.—I entirely concur, and have nothing to add.

LORD ROBERTSON. — It would be strange if the law allowed a transaction so plainly unfair as that which is now in question. This trust-estate was made to release one of three debtors without his giving or providing to the estate anything whatever that it did not have before, this release being the act of the two remaining debtors who were the sole trustees, and were at the time insolvent.

The demerits of the proceedings, so far as the trustees are concerned, are too flagrant to require comment. They had no right gratuitously to release a debtor of the trust-estate, and they had no right, as I hold, under this trust-deed, to lend to any other firm than that existing at the testator's death; still less had they a right to do this, for the furtherance of their own convenience, by ridding themselves of a partner whom they found censorious of their own irregularities, and by carrying out their obligations to him at the expense of the trust-estate. The act was clearly a breach of trust, and I think the First Division had adequate grounds for holding it to be fraudulent.

I may in passing say that I am not deterred from this conclusion by the circumstance that those two trustees were not parties to the action, and were not witnesses. In the practice of Scotland it frequently happens (as in the case of wills and of forged instruments) that the fraud of a third party is the medium concludendi, and the mere fact of his fraud gives him no proper place as a party to the cause, and imposes no obligation on the party asserting his iniquity to offer his testimony.

This being the nature of the discharge, the appellant cannot hold his discharge, however innocent he may be, unless he gave valuable consideration—and of consideration he gave none. Everything which the new firm gave, their estate and the liabilities of its partners, the trust-estate had already—not, of course, to each item the identic and specific assets of the new firm, but the corresponding, and, so far as appears, equivalent assets of the old firm. The attempt of the appellant to found on this point only derives plausibility from splitting up what is really one transaction—the dissolving the old firm, and the making the new firm the sole debtors.

The appellant has endeavoured to found an argument on the change of circumstances which has occurred as disentitling the respondents to the remedy they seek. This seems to me to be a fallacy arising from the merely formal circumstance that the respondents' summons includes a reduction. This is not an action of rescission of a contract obtained by fraud, although, like such actions, it takes the form of a reduction—it is a demand for payment of a debt, backed with appropriate formal procedure for parrying a defence founded on a valueless discharge. It was within the rights of the creditors to take as much payment as they could get from the estates of the remaining debtors without impairing their rights to enforce the several liability of the third. Even if the appellant were right in saying that the respondents were not entitled to rank on the estate of the new firm, their doing so has in no way prejudiced the appellant, and cannot be pleaded by him as an answer to the present demand.

I am entirely satisfied with the judgment of the First Division, and consider the reasoning of Lord Adam and Lord M'Laren to be unimpeachable.

(IN the Court of Session, July 7, 1900, 2 F. 1140.)

This was a petition for interdict by Henry Callander of Prestonhall against his tenant David W. E. Smith, to prevent the latter from prosecuting a claim for compensation for improvements under the Market Gardeners Compensation Act, 1897.

On 15th March 1900, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) granted interdict in so far as related to alleged improvements executed prior to 1st January 1898, when the Act came into operation. On 9th July 1900, the Second Division adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

David W. E. Smith appealed.

The question turned on the construction of sections 3 and 4 of the Market Gardeners Compensation Act of 1897.*

Smith v. Callander.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I cannot say that much doubt has been infused into my mind upon the subject of this case, which appears to me to be capable of very easy solution.

It appears to me that the effect of the Act of 1897 is very plain. In the first place, I think no rights were intended to be conferred upon anybody retrospectively. The language of the 3d section seems to me to have a very plain meaning:—"Where after the commencment of this Act it is agreed in writing that a holding shall be let or treated as a market garden," then certain "provisions shall have effect," and one of them is the 3d subsection, which enlarges Part III. of the schedule of the former Act. The effect of clause 4 also appears to me to be very plain. The Legislature is providing anew for the condition of things as applicable to market gardens, and it says after the commencement of this Act, where you have a written agreement, then certain conditions shall apply—this is all after the commencement of the Act; and then, apart from a written agreement, the case is provided for where, although there is no written agreement, "a holding is at that date" (that is to say, "at the commencement of this Act"; the word "then" follows immediately after, but I make no distinction between "the commencement of this Act" and the time referred to by "then") "in use or cultivation as a market garden," then without the intervention of a written agreement, which is the first case provided for, a tenant under a lease, unless he has received notice of dissent from his landlord, shall have the same right of compensation in respect of improvements as if there had been a written agreement: "the provisions of this Act shall apply in respect of such holding as if it had been agreed in writing after the commencement of this Act that the holding should be let or treated as a market garden." What is the effect of that? It does not say that he shall

Sec. 1.—"This Act . . . shall be read and construed as part of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, hereinafter called the principal Act."

Sec. 3.—"Where after the commencement of this Act it is agreed in writing that a holding shall be let or treated as a market garden, the following provisions shall have effect:—

"(3) The following improvements shall, as far as regards such holding, be deemed to be comprised in Part III. of the said Schedule [of the principal Act]:—

"(iii.) Planting of strawberry plants."

Sec. 4.—"Where, under a lease current at the commencement of this Act, a holding is at that date in use or cultivation as a market garden with the knowledge of the landlord, and the tenant thereof has then executed thereon, without having received previously to the execution thereof any written notice of dissent by the landlord, any of the improvements in respect of which a right of compensation or removal is given to a tenant by this Act, then the provisions of this Act shall apply in respect of such holding as if it had been agreed in writing after the commencement of this Act that the holding should be let or treated as a market garden."

have compensation for everything that has been done upon the land since the commencement of the lease. What it says is that the provisions of the Act which have been specified shall apply as if it had been agreed in writing after the commencement of the Act that the holding should be let or treated as a market garden. Then what is the tenant to get? I turn back, and I find what is to happen in the event thus contemplated. Sec. 3 says, "the following provisions shall have effect." Those "following provisions" apply only (the contrary is hardly susceptible of argument) to improvements made since the date of the commencement of the Act. And that is the whole of the controversy.

I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary in his construction of the statute. It seems to me to be simply hopeless to attempt to read the language otherwise than as I have read it. One case contemplated by the framers of the statute is the case of a written agreement. The other case is that, at the time of the passing of the statute, the thing has already been done, and the condition of things is such that the tenant has already with the knowledge of the landlord cultivated the land as a market garden; the Act says that then "the same provisions shall apply," that is to say, that for all future improvements, although the landlord has not given his consent in writing, there shall be compensation at the end of the lease. That seems to me to be intelligible reading the mere words as they stand, and I confess that, having listened to the long and ingenious argument submitted to us by Mr Haldane, I have been unable to find anything that requires exposition or that is difficult of interpretation in the language of the statute so read. It appears to me that there is great difficulty in the construction which Mr Haldane has suggested, and I think, as a mere matter of language and the construction of the words in the Act, it would be impossible to maintain it.

For these reasons, I move your Lordships that the interlocutors appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord Ashbourne.—I entirely concur.

Of course, it is obviously competent for the Legislature, if it pleases, in its wisdom to make the provisions of an Act of Parliament retrospective; but before giving such a construction to an Act of Parliament one would require that it should either appear very clearly in the terms of the Act, or arise by necessary and distinct implication. Now, such reading as I have given to this short statute to my mind conveys very clearly that the provision on which the controversy arises is not retrospective. Clause 3 comes into operation where holdings are let as market gardens after the commencement of the Act, and the 4th section deals with the cases which are not covered by the 3d section—that is, leases current at the date of the commencement of the Act. But to prevent all misconception and to shew that it was not intended to go further in that direction, it says at the end of it that although the provisions of the Act are to attach to current leases under certain conditions, they are to do so as if there had been an agreement in writing made after the commencement of the Act, shewing that the governing words all through are, "after the commencement of the Act."

It is not necessary to go into any discussion of the meaning of the word "then," or any of the other topics that have been introduced. I agree with the construction given by the Lord Ordinary, and I assent to the motion which has been made by my noble and learned friend.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. It is not necessary in my view of this case to invoke the rule or principle under which a right to claim payment on the part of a tenant for improvements made prior to the passing of an Act of Parliament, and so to give an improbable retrospective effect to the Act, must be given expressly or by necessary implication by the provisions of the statute. It seems to me there is here no ground to support the tenant's claim even by ingenious and strained interpretation of the sections of the statute.

For the reasons stated by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack and by the Lord Ordinary in the note to his judgment, I agree that the meaning of the word "then" in sec. 4 of the statute of 1897 is "thereupon," or "thereafter," and that the clause includes and refers only to improvements made by the tenant after the date of the Act. But if this were not so, I think the result would be the same as found by the learned Judges of the Second Division.

LORD DAVEY.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is important to observe that market gardens, as was pointed out by Mr Haldane, are within the Act of 1883, and this Act of 1897 makes further and more beneficial provisions for market gardens by way of amendment of Parts I. and III. of the schedule to the previous Act. But those amendments are only made under certain conditions and in certain cases, and the question is, In what cases are those amendments to be made? Now, under sec. 3 of the Act it is very clearly pointed out that the provisions of that section apply only "where after the commencement of this Act" there is an agreement "in writing that a holding shall be let or treated as a market garden"; that is to say, that, so far as the landlord is concerned, he does for the first time treat or let the land as market garden after the commencement of the Act. There, necessarily, the amendment can only come into operation as regards improvements which are made after the commencement of the Act.

Then, my Lords, under sec. 4 the case is contemplated where there is "a lease current at the date of the commencement of the Act," under which land has in fact, with the knowledge of the landlord, but without his written consent or any written agreement, been treated as a market garden, and the tenant "has then executed thereon, without having received previously to the execution thereof any written notice of dissent by the landlord, any of the improvements in respect of which a right of compensation . . . is given to a tenant by this Act, then the provisions of the Act shall apply" as if there had been a written agreement. My Lords, I should have thought that the meaning of that clause was sufficiently obvious. It puts a market garden which has been allowed by the landlord to be treated as a market garden in the same position as regards this Act as if a written agreement had been made after the commencement of the Act to treat it as a market garden, but only on the condition that the tenant has "then executed thereon" improvements without having received from the landlord written notice of dissent. I am disposed to agree with the Lord Ordinary in construing the word "then" in that clause as meaning "thereafter." It may be that the other meaning which Mr Haldane attached to it, and which the Inner-House have favoured, is more like the prima facie meaning, but it is clearly capable of meaning "has thereupon," and I think the structure of the section requires it to mean that.

I see no reason or sense whatever in making the previous execution of the improvements a condition of the Act coming into operation. If it had any meaning at all, it would rather, I think, have the effect of making old improvements within the Act, and not new improvements. However that may be, a stronger objection to reading it as Mr Haldane read it is that it would put the landlord in the position of being liable to compensate for improvements by not having given a written notice of dissent at a time when he was not called upon to do so, as he could not, unless he gave his consent in writing to the improvement, be made liable.

For these reasons, I think that those words mean "has thereupon executed"; and the scheme of the Act is shortly this—to amend the schedules as regards market gardens in the Act of 1883, first, as to what I may call new market gardens, in cases in which there is an agreement in writing made after the commencement of the Act to treat them as market gardens, and, secondly, as to all market gardens in respect of subsequent improvements, provided the landlord has not, after the passing of the Act, given a written notice that he will not be liable for those improvements. That seems to me to render consistent the construction of the Act, and it is the construction which I advise your Lordships to place upon it.

LORD BRAMPTON.—I entirely agree.

LORD ROBERTSON.—I also agree, for the reasons which have been stated by the learned Judges of the Second Division.

INTERNATIONAL FIBRE SYNDICATE, LIMITED (Pursuers), Appellants.—Lawson Walton, K.C.—Crabb Watt—J. G. Joseph.

PETER DAWSON (Defender), Respondent.—Bousfield, K.C.—Younger.

Contract—Assignation of debt accrued on assignable contract—Delectus personæ.— Dear, the owner of a patent for a fibre decorticating machine, entered into a contract with Dawson, the owner of an estate in Borneo, by which it was agreed as follows:—Dear was to supply and erect one of the machines on Dawson's estate; and, on this machine working satisfactorily, Dawson was to pay the price of it to Dear, and terms were to be arranged for the further supply of machines by Dear to Dawson, who undertook to bring a specified area of his estate into fibre cultivation. After the machine first mentioned had been supplied and erected by Dear in implement of the contract, Dear assigned his patent, "licence, concessions and the like," to a limited company. In a schedule part of the price was allocated to "contracts and concessions." The company thereafter, with consent of Dear, brought an action against Dawson for payment of the price of the machine supplied, averring that the contract with him had been assigned by Dear to them. The defender pleaded, inter alia, No title to sue.

Held (in aff. judgment of Second Division) (1) That in so far as the pursuers' claim was for implement of the contract, they had no title to sue, as the contract implied delectus personæ and was not assignable; and (2) that in so far as the claim was for a debt which had accrued to the cedent before the assignation, the pursuers had no title to sue, as the debt was not assigned.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I think this case is quite clear. I entirely assent to the reasoning of Lord Kincairney, and it appears to me that the whole is summed up in the dilemma which I put to the learned counsel who last addressed your Lordships. Either this was or it was not an entire contract. If it was, it has not been doubted or questioned at the bar that there is a personal element in it which makes the entire contract as referred to in these papers not assignable at all; or if it is treated as something which had become a complete debt before the assignment so that it was practically assigned for £500, then it is clear upon the face of this contract, coupling it with the schedule which is referred to, that there is no assignment at all. Therefore the dilemma is complete—either it was a contract in its entirety, which was not assignable, or if it is treated as a chose-in-action separate from the contract, and separated from it in such a sense that there was a sum then payable, it is not assigned. I think that dilemma is absolutely complete, and it appears to me that that disposes of the case.

I move that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD ASHBOURNE, LORD SHAND, LORD DAVEY, and LORD BRAMPTON concurred.

LORD ROBERTSON.—It is conceded by the appellant that the contract out of which this claim arises was not assignable. The principle that contracts involving delectus personæ are not assignable is well rooted in Scots law as well as in the law of other countries. It may, however, be conceded to the appellant that it does not necessarily follow from this that a right may not arise out of an unassignable contract which is itself assignable. I prefer in a Scotch case to call such a right jus crediti rather than chose-in-action. The simplest case would be that of a money claim pure and simple which has accrued. Even in the case of such a claim, the assignee, while of course entitled to sue in his own name, is liable to all the answers which could have been made to his cedent. But the questions arising in the present case are, first, whether this claim for £500 of damages is such a money claim pure and simple, and second, whether it has been assigned. Now, the second of these questions seems to me so clear that I do not dwell on the first further than to observe that after what has been said the appellant must not consider it as clear. But on the second of these questions I do not find any assignation of debt or damages. It is quite true that the law does not require technical words in an assignation. But here the only thing assigned in the body of the assignation is "concessions," and even if this word be amplified by the schedule, then "contracts and concessions" are assigned. Now, at the date of this assignation the claim now sued on had already accrued, and on the theory of the appeal it was a claim separable from the contract. I find it impossible to read this as an assignation of a pecuniary claim. It is at best an assignation of the contract as a whole, and it is in my opinion impossible to apply it to the present claim.

APPEAL dismissed, and interlocutors appealed from affirmed.

CORPORATION OF THE CITY OF GLASGOW (Defenders), Appellants.—Shaw, K.C.—Lees.

JOHN PATERSON & SON, LIMITED (Pursuers), Respondents.—Salvesen, K.C.—Guy.

Arbiter—Informal reference to person of skill—Refusal by Arbiter to allow law-agents to appear—Award of lump sum where separate claims referred.—A firm of contractors and the corporation of a burgh agreed by informal missives to refer to an engineer, as arbiter, the question of "the amount to be paid" by the corporation to the contractors "in respect of the extra cost incurred by the necessary adoption of" the system of air pressure in the tunnelling for certain portions of a sewer, which the contractors had undertaken to construct for the corporation. The contract for the construction of the sewer contained no provision for the use of air pressure. While the reference was pending the contractors and the corporation agreed to refer to the same arbiter certain other disputed items—not relating to the use of air pressure—in the contractors' account. The arbiter issued an order for proof. In a note to this order he intimated that as the parties had agreed not to be represented by law-agents he would not allow them to be so represented at the proof, unless of mutual consent. The contractors refused to accept a proof on these conditions, denying that there was any such agreement. The arbiter then cancelled the order for proof, and thereafter issued a decree-arbitral by which he awarded a lump sum "as the total amount due in respect of work done by the claimants in connection with this contract." No details were given.

In an action by the contractors against the corporation for reduction of the decree-arbitral the arbiter deponed that his view of the reference, in so far as it related to the air-pressure work, was that he had to determine the sum that "ought to be paid" to the contractors for the extra work caused by the use of the air-pressure system, and that he made no inquiry as to the actual extra cost incurred by them through the adoption of that system.

Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) (1) that the parties had agreed to refer to the arbiter as a person of skill and experience to adjust, without the legal formalities of an arbitration, inter alia, the amount to be paid "in respect of the extra cost incurred" by the use of the air-pressure system, and that the arbiter was entitled to prevent the appearance of law-agents as being against the original understanding of the parties, and that, in any view, as arbiter he was entitled to do so; (2) that the arbiter was entitled to determine the amount that should be paid to the contractors in respect of the extra cost without taking evidence as to the amount which was actually expended by them; (3) that the decree-arbitral was not invalid because it did not distinguish the sum awarded on account of the use of the air-pressure system from the sum (if any) awarded under the second branch of the reference.

Paterson & Son, Limited, v. Corporation of Glasgow.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury).

Ld. Robertson.
Lord Lindley.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—With all respect for the Inner-House, I think they have not given sufficient effect to the evidence that was before them as to what the actual contract between these parties was. The story is in itself a simple one. The Corporation of Glasgow entered into a contract for the making of certain sewers in their streets. The date of that contract is not immaterial; it was in 1893. During the progress of the work, between January 1893 and January 1894, it was found that some difficulties arose in the execution of the contract according to the mode which it was assumed on both sides when the original contract was made should be pursued. The contractors stated that in their view it was impossible to continue by reason of the nature of the soil the execution of the works in the manner originally contemplated. As a consequence there was a correspondence between the contractors and the Corporation, and as a matter of fact it was arranged, subject to certain words which I will consider in a moment, that what was called the air-pressure system should be adopted, which undoubtedly would involve an extra cost upon the contractors if that system was pursued.

Originally the contention appears to have been that the contractors were bound by the contract to execute the work as well as they could under the terms of the contract, that the Corporation had got them fixed by a contract which they were bound to fulfil, and therefore there was no original obligation upon the Corporation to make any allowance for the extra cost which had become necessary, but after correspondence between the parties an agreement appears to have been come to. The date should be observed, because the dates of the original contract and the intervention of Mr Copland are separated by a whole year, which becomes important upon further consideration of what happened thereupon. In a minute of the 3d August 1894, we find:—"After careful consideration of the whole circumstances the subcommittee agreed to recommend that the request made by Messrs Paterson & Son be, without prejudice to the rights and claims of the Commissioners, complied with, and that, as this payment is in respect of, and applicable to, the extra cost incurred by Messrs Paterson & Son in executing their contract by means of the system of air pressure found by them to be necessary, Mr W. R. Copland be appointed arbitrator in the matter of the amount to be paid to Messrs Paterson & Son in respect of the extra cost incurred by the necessary adoption of the said system of air pressure—the cost of such arbitration to be borne equally by Messrs Paterson & Son and the Commissioners."

I may say in passing, with reference to another argument put forward on the part of the respondents, that that document is "approved" on the "17th of August 1894" by the Corporation; so that in respect of the authority to enter into this contract being brought home to the Corporation, it really is not necessary to proceed further. There is the deliberate adoption by the Corporation of this bargain.

The work proceeds and is apparently executed, and then comes the question which has given rise to this appeal. After a considerable delay, the arbitrator so selected hears the parties and is occupied in going into the accounts and ascertaining the amount due between the parties in the manner which was arranged by the parties themselves at the time, in order that he should have before him the materials upon which he should make his award. That appears to have been in the contemplation of both parties on the three days during which they were occupied—that was in November 1898.

It is said now by the respondents that the award which was then made or proposed to be made is to be set aside because the arbitrator refused to allow further proof to be given. In the view that I take of the matter the answer to that is a very simple one—that it is not true. He never refused to hear them. He offered to hear them; but they declined on two occasions to attend a meeting which he had arranged, because he insisted upon preserving an arrangement which he had entered into by the consent of both parties to refuse to hear professional advisers instead of the parties themselves.

I confess I had very great difficulty in following the reasoning of the learned Judges who reversed the judgment of Lord Kyllachy. They say in more than one passage in their judgments—two of them at least—that there was no evidence of any such agreement. To my mind the agreement is proved beyond doubt or question, and I cannot but think that there must have been some omission to bring before their Lordships the evidence upon which that agreement rests. It is abundantly proved, I think, both in the correspondence and by verbal statement. At page 89 Messrs Paterson & Son, Limited, in answer to a suggestion by Mr Whyte, that professional assistance should be called in because a new point had arisen and a point of law was involved, write thus:—"We have yours of yesterday's date with pressed copy of letter from Mr Whyte, and in reply beg to say that the other matters in dispute, besides the compressed air, were excluded at the time by the Corporation themselves from the reference as then existing." On that matter I may say in passing that that was perfectly true, but at a subsequent date there is clear evidence of remitting all matters in dispute between the parties. The letter goes on,—"A considerable time ago, on the suggestion of Mr Whyte, we agreed that the matter of the compressed air should be referred to you to adjust between us"—that is between Mr Whyte and themselves—"without the formalities of a legal arbitration, and with a view to an amicable settlement, so as to save legal and other expenses. We would like to know now if Mr Whyte departs from this position, because if so, we must reconsider the whole matter and the terms of its submission."

I am wholly unable to imagine a more complete answer to the suggestion that there was no such agreement. So far from there being no such agreement, the person who now insists upon it at that time in answer to a request by Mr Whyte that legal assistance might be permitted, says—one can read between the lines of such a letter, and what it means is this—If you depart from the arrangement we have made—that is to say, the arrangement to treat this as an amicable settlement and a reference without trusting to the legal forms of arbitration—we shall reconsider our position. It actually means this, that we shall decline to go on with the arbitration at all, and cancel our submission to arbitration. That is the meaning of it. How in the face of that letter it can be suggested—apart from the verbal evidence which states it beyond all dispute and question on the one side, and is hardly denied on the other—that there is no evidence of such an agreement, I am wholly unable to understand. I can only say that to my mind the agreement is positively proved without the smallest doubt. Under these circumstances it is untrue to say that the arbitrator has refused to hear any evidence. What he has refused to do is to depart from an arrangement which all the parties had agreed to. Under the circumstances I think he was perfectly right in saying,—"I am not going to depart from that: the agreement by which I was made arbitrator was on the express understanding that there was to be no legal assistance. I, as being a person familiar with this sort of thing, was to deal with and settle the whole matter without either the expense or the practical delay which sometimes occur in arbitrations conducted in legal form."

That seems to me to determine the question whether or not upon the mere refusal, which was the ground mainly put forward, there was any reason why this award should be set aside. It appears to me, on the contrary, that the arbitrator has done that which the parties agreed that he should do. If he had not done it he would have departed from that which the parties had agreed upon in the first instance; indeed, on that ground his award might very readily have been set aside, because then he would have been acting without the consent of the parties and taking a course which they had agreed should not be pursued.

But then comes another question—it is said on the face of this award upon the admitted facts that the arbitrator has not pursued the course which was agreed upon between the parties—that he has departed from the arrangement in this respect, that he has not either inspected or had proof of, or in any way entered into, the question of the amount to be paid by the one to the other in respect of the measure of value, the cost of labour and material, which has been expended in the extra cost of this compressed air system. Upon that point, to my mind the question is a very simple one. The whole object and purpose of referring the dispute to a person like Mr Copland was, that with his technical knowledge of those elements which make up the amount which is to be paid by the one to the other for this extra work, which in truth is the measure of value, he was to have the materials before him which the parties thought proper to produce. The answer to my mind is this, that he has taken—I do not care whether you call it the basis or whether you call it the mode of ascertaining the amount—I do not care what you call it—what he did was this, for three days he heard the parties upon all the matters relevant to that question which he had to consider, together with his technical knowledge and his own local knowledge of what the proper sums to be charged were, and it is not suggested that at the end of the third day anybody ever said that he was to have another meeting to consider his award, or another meeting to hear the parties. On the contrary, the hypothesis on both sides was that they had both been heard out, and when he makes his intended award known to the parties, then, and not till then, is this question raised, that he was bound to have another meeting and to have legal assistance provided upon both sides.

It seems to me, therefore, that every part of the case which has been put forward on the part of the respondents is answered. There was such an agreement as the appellants insist upon; the arbitrator proceeded, I think, substantially in the way that it was intended he should proceed, applying his technical knowledge to technical matters which were within his knowledge, and applying his local knowledge of the particular place where this work was to be done. He having done that, it appears to me it is far too late for the parties now to complain, the award having been made—or rather it having been published what the award would be—and to claim that they should have a new arbitration and commence these proceedings afresh. It seems to me that it would entirely destroy the value of any arbitration if that could be allowed; it would be a very bad precedent, and certainly would prevent people from entering into any such arbitrations, which are often carried on with great advantage to the parties, and without the expense attending a regular litigation. At anyrate, so far as your Lordships are concerned, I think we are all agreed that it is impossible to say that there is any misconduct here. I confess that I rather protest against the Scottish term "misconduct," which at first sight seems to imply corruption: it seems to me a very inappropriate word, but by judicial decision the Scottish Courts have included under it any mistake committed by an arbitrator in the mode of carrying on an arbitration. It appears to me that there has been no misconduct in any sense in this case. The arbitrator has arrived at the conclusion which he has arrived at upon the materials on which the parties themselves contemplated he would arrive at it, and the whole object of having an arbitration conducted in this fashion by a man of skill without the formal procedure of a legal arbitration was to induce him to do the very thing he has done—apply his own technical knowledge in the consideration of the books and accounts placed before him, knowing, as he must have known if he was the person both parties assumed him to be, what was the appropriate price of labour in such work as this, and the nature of the work. I know it has been said he never had this sort of work to do before. I do not know that there is any magic in this particular work. He knew work of this nature if he had never been engaged in it. It appears to me that that is one of the sort of things that people say after they have lost their cause—that the person who adjudicated upon it was not sufficiently acquainted with the subject-matter. The answer is, you have chosen him, and you must take his decision whether it is good or bad. That is indeed a complete answer to all the arguments which have been addressed to us on the part of the respondents. We are not ascertaining now whether this award was right or wrong—with that question we have nothing to do. I should think it is probably right; but what we are deciding here is, whether there has been anything in the course of this arbitration, and in the award made under it, which justifies any Court in sending it back or setting it aside. My view is that all the evidence is satisfactory to prove that the arbitrator has regularly and properly proceeded in the way it was expected he should proceed, and he has arrived at the conclusion in the way which both parties contemplated, and by the means by which both parties contemplated, he would arrive at the conclusion.

No. 6.

Paterson & Son, Limited, v. Corporation of Glasgow.

Under these circumstances there is no reason why this arbitration and the award should not proceed to its proper consummation, and I move your Lordships that the interlocutor of the Inner-House be recalled and the original judgment of Lord Kyllachy restored, and that the respondents should pay to the appellants the costs both here and below.

Paterson & Son, Limited, v. Corporation of Glasgow.

Lord Macnaghten, Lord James of Hereford, and Lord Brampton concurred.

Lord Robertson.—I cannot help thinking that the objections to this award are all more or less directly traceable to a misconstruction of the minute of reference. It has been assumed that what the arbiter had got to do under the first reference was to ascertain what had been the extra cost, or as the Lord Justice-Clerk puts it, the reasonable extra cost of the air pressure. This is in my judgment a misreading of the reference. The extra cost incurred was merely the consideration in respect of which a sum to be fixed by the arbiter was to be paid to the respondents. In this view the question of the actual expenditure by the respondents sinks into a position of very subordinate importance. What the arbiter said in effect was this—"I will assume, as you say it, that you expended all that money, but it was extravagant expenditure, and I decline to take it as affording any reliable criterion of what ought to be given." In so proceeding I think the arbiter was within his duties.

Now, if this be correct, the question upon which evidence was ultimately proposed was not the main issue, but had only a very indirect bearing on the result. It follows from this, first, that there was no duty on the part of the arbiter under the reference to find what had actually been spent, and second, that the question about agents in any evidence about actual expenditure becomes one of the most incidental procedure. But then it is said that the parties have by their pleadings committed themselves to a different view. I do not think that the terms of the rather inartificial pleadings support this contention. I read the admitted part of the respondents' pleadings as a statement of historical fact that the appellants agreed to the work being proceeded with on a time and material basis. But then this applies to a period anterior to the minute of reference, and it cannot alter the subject-matter agreed to be referred. And if it does not avail for this it has no further effect in the controversy.

The next objection to the terms of the award seems to me wholly untenable. The arbiter had by the reference of 1894 to deal with the question of air pressure, and by the reference of 1898 he had to deal with what are called the remaining items of difference. Now, the identification of the remaining items of difference took place in a way proposed by the respondents themselves, viz., by the appellants lodging the account, and along with it a statement of the items in that account which they disputed. There is not the slightest ground in fact for supposing that the arbiter dealt with any but the disputed items, and there is most certainly no legal presumption that he did so.

Then as regards the complaint that the arbiter has not separated the amount which he has allowed for the compressed air from the amount which he has allowed for the remaining items of difference, I think that, even on the strictest view of his duties, he was not bound to do so unless he was asked, the reference of 1898 and the proceedings of parties having merged or consolidated the two references. And the respondents' leading witness says in so many words that "neither by representation nor request, direct or indirect, was Mr Copland asked to distinguish the amounts in his decree which were applicable to the compressed air contract and to the general contract." On the other hand Mr Copland himself tells us that he had the materials at hand enabling him to satisfy such request had it ever been made. These facts become the more striking when we know that, according to a frequent practice in Scotland, the arbiter issued a memorandum of his proposed findings and the respondents made no request to know how much applied to either reference.

July 29, 1901. Paterson & Son, Limited, v. Corporation of Glasgow.

The other and more important objection as to law-agents is, I think, very judiciously handled by Lord Kyllachy. Prima facie it is for the arbiter to decide questions of procedure. Lord Rutherfurd Clark, whose precise and guarded statements of law have a special authority, says (in Holmes[1]),—"All the incidental questions which arise in the course of procedure are as much referred to his sole judgment as the final decision." Now, there is no stereotyped rule as to who are to practise before arbiters generally, or before any arbiter in particular. While for permanent Courts of justice this matter is settled by permanent rules, each arbiter must settle it according to the subject-matter which he has in hand, and the resulting considerations of convenience and justice. In some references to exclude lawyers would be unjust, in others to admit them would be absurd. Their presence at one stage of an arbitration might be useful, and at another stage of the same arbitration might be confusing. But in the present instance Mr Copland considered that he found the rule for this arbitration settled by the concurrent action of the parties themselves, and governed himself accordingly. I think he was right in so holding, but even if I thought that the parties were not bound to this course, I do not see any ground for the interference of the law Courts with an order as to the conduct of an inquiry into what I hold to have been merely one head of information as to the main question, and not the main question. In no view have we here a contravention of any of these general conditions which are necessary for doing justice, which form the only limitations on the procedure of voluntary tribunals not imposed by the express agreement of those who set them up. There are innumerable arbitrations in Scotland about matters agricultural and commercial in which things are gone about in a rough and ready way, and it would be subversive of good faith and of social convenience if Courts of law were to exact of such tribunals a kind of procedure which in many cases would be unnecessary and inappropriate.

Lord Lindley concurred.

Appeal allowed, judgment appealed from reversed, and judgment of Lord Kyllachy, Ordinary, restored, with costs both in the House of Lords and in the Court below.

Vaccination—Refusal to allow child to be vaccinated—Complaint—Relevancy—Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 108), sec. 18.—In a complaint charging a refusal to allow a child to be vaccinated, in contravention of section 18 of the Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, it is essential to set forth that the vaccinator tendered his services to the accused between ten and twenty days after the date on which written notice of the order to vaccinate, issued by the Parish Council, was given to the accused.

Sentence—Form of sentence.—Form of sentence disapproved in the conviction of a statutory offence, for which imprisonment was competent only in the case of failure to pay the penalty.

HIGH COURT. Lord Young. Lord Trayner. Ld. Moncreiff.

ON 29th March 1900 Solomon Westwood, 11 Brown Street, Buckhaven, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Cupar on a summary complaint at the instance of the clerk to the Parish Council of the Parish of East Wemyss, setting forth that the accused "has been guilty of an offence within the meaning of the 18th section of the Act 26 and 27 Vict. caput 108,† in so far as he refuses to allow his child Robina Westwood, aged 23 months or thereby, to be vaccinated by the vaccinator appointed by the said Parish Council to vaccinate the said Robina Westwood, in terms of order issued to the said vaccinator on 23d February 1900, as instructed by the said Parish Council at a meeting held on the 22d day of said month of February 1900, of which order the said Solomon Westwood was duly informed on said 23d day of February 1900 by letter addressed and posted to him by the complainer, all in terms of the said Act, whereby the said Solomon Westwood is liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings, and failing payment to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding ten days."

The accused stated objections to the relevancy of the complaint, which were thus set forth in the minutes of procedure:—"1. That no relevant statement of any offence under the Vaccination Act had been libelled; it was only an offence under section 18 of said Act if a refusal is made under the following circumstances:—(1) The accused must fail to return certificate. (2) A list must be returned by the registrar. (3) The Inspector of Poor must have submitted the list to the Parish Council. (4) The Parish Council must have issued an order for vaccination. (5) Notice in writing must have been sent to the respondent. (6) In pursuance of the order the vaccinator must have called not less than ten nor more than twenty days after the date of the notice. All of these steps must be libelled in the complaint to make it relevant, whereas only Nos. 4 and 5 have been so libelled. 2. That the place where the offence was committed was not stated in the complaint. 3. That the date of the offence was also omitted."

The Sheriff-substitute (Armour) repelled the objections. The accused then pleaded not guilty.

The Sheriff-substitute, after evidence had been led, pronounced the following conviction and sentence:—"The Sheriff-substitute, in respect of the proof adduced, convicts the said Solomon Westwood of the contravention charged, and therefore adjudges him to forfeit and pay to the complainer the sum of ten shillings of modified penalty, to be applied by him to the funds for the support of the poor of the parish of Wemyss, and allows the accused fourteen days to pay said sum: And in respect it is inexpedient to issue a warrant of poinding and sale, ordains the said Solomon Westwood to be imprisoned for the period of four days; and grants warrant to officers of Court to apprehend the said Solomon Westwood and convey him to the prison of Dundee, thereafter to be dealt with in terms of law on the lapse of said fourteen days."

Westwood brought a suspension, in which he pleaded that suspension ought to be granted in respect "(1) that the complaint is irrelevant and wanting in specification; (2) that it was incompetent and illegal to impose a sentence of imprisonment, except in the event of failure to pay the penalty imposed."

Argued for the complainer;—(1) The complaint was not relevant. It was necessary to libel all the preliminary steps, because it was only after all these steps had been gone through that an offence could be committed. (2) The sentence was illegal. It could not be construed otherwise than as imposing a penalty and a sentence of imprisonment cumulatively.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) It was not necessary, in order to a relevant complaint under section 18 of the Act, to specify that all the requirements of the Act had been gone through. The tender of his services by the vaccinator was not in a different position from the other statutory requirements. (2) The conviction and sentence might not be very happily expressed, but it plainly meant that there was to be imprisonment only if the fine had not been paid on the lapse of the fourteen days.

Lord Young.—I am of opinion that this charge is irrelevant. I think the public vaccinator, in obedience to the statutory requirements and the order of the Local Authority, between the 5th and 15th days of the month of March, ought to have tendered his services to the accused party, in this case the parent of the child. When this has been done the parent of the child is not entitled to refuse to allow his child to be vaccinated, unless on the ground either that the child has already been in fact vaccinated or that a certificate has been granted that the child cannot be vaccinated with safety. Should the parent without such excuse refuse to allow the vaccinator to vaccinate the child the statutory offence is committed. The statute provides for the offer within a stated period being made by the vaccinator, and only thereafter can the statutory offence emerge. It is not stated in this complaint that the offer was ever made, and on that ground I hold the complaint irrelevant. No. 1. Dec. 6, 1900. Westwood v. Taylor.

On the other point raised I offer no opinion, but would only remark upon the terms of the sentence, that such a form as is here used would best be avoided in future.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

Dec. 6, 1900.* Thomson v. Neilson.

Proof—Witness—Examination—Question as to person who has given facilities to police—Allowance of question subject to condition of non-disclosure of person's name.—At a trial in a Police Court on a summary complaint charging betting in a street contrary to the local Police Acts, a police-constable deponed in cross-examination for the accused that he had from the window of a house seen the accused commit the offence charged. The constable having been further asked to identify the house, the Procurator-fiscal objected to the question on the ground that the answer would lead to the public disclosure of the person who had given facilities to the police, but stated that he had no objection to the answer being communicated in writing to the Magistrate and to the agent for the accused—the latter to make no use of it in further cross-examination. The agent for the accused refused to accept the answer on this condition, whereupon the Magistrate disallowed the question. The accused having been convicted appealed.

The Court sustained the appeal, holding that the question was a competent and proper question, and the condition one which the Magistrate was not entitled to impose.

HIGH COURT. Lord Young. Lord Trayner. Ld. Moncreiff.

ON 12th April 1900 John Thomson, 551 Duke Street, Glasgow, was charged in the Northern Police Court, Glasgow, with betting in Hope Street, Glasgow, contrary to the Glasgow Police Acts, particularly the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892, section 20.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but was convicted, and fined £10, with the alternative of sixty days' imprisonment.

He obtained a case. The case stated, inter alia;—"In the course of the evidence for the prosecution, during the cross-examination of James M'Pherson, sergeant of police, Northern Division of Police, Glasgow, the law-agent for the accused asked the witness where he was at the time the alleged offence was being committed, which he had been describing, and of which he said he was an eye-witness. The witness replied that he was looking from a window in Hope Street, in a house entering from Sauchiehall Street, on the north side of Sauchiehall Street, close to Hope Street, three stairs up. On further questions being asked, which would have disclosed the house and name of the occupant of it, the acting fiscal objected to the witness giving particulars that would lead to the public identification of the house and its occupant, but at the same time stated that he had no objection to the witness writing on a slip of paper the name of the occupant of the house and the number of the street in which it was situated, and handing the same to the law-agent for the accused and the Court, on the understanding that the agent would not, in the course of his further cross-examination, publicly disclose the name and address of the person who had given the police facilities for taking observations from his house. The witness thereupon wrote on a slip of paper the name of the tenant and the number of the street, and offered the slip to the agent for the accused, but the agent declined to accept same on such condition. Whereupon I sustained the objection of the acting fiscal." The case further stated that a similar procedure took place during the cross-examination of William Cannon, a constable who was with Sergeant M'Pherson at the time spoken to by the latter.

The following question of law was stated:—"Whether I was right in sustaining the objection of the acting fiscal to the question put to the said James M'Pherson and William Cannon as before set forth?"

Argued for the appellant;—The question was competent, and the condition imposed on it was ultra vires. The appellant had thus been prejudiced by reason of competent evidence having in effect been disallowed.

The respondent (the Procurator-fiscal) argued that the matter was one within the discretion of the Magistrate, with which the Court would not lightly interfere.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of opinion that the question in this case was a competent question and a very proper question to put to the police-constables, and that the Magistrate was wrong in imposing any condition upon the allowance of the question, such as that the answer should be in writing and that the agent of the accused should not make use of it in cross-examining the witness, or disclose the information in any way.

This competent evidence having been disallowed, the appeal must be sustained.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative, sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction.

Police—Street—Regulation of hackney carriages—Bye-law—Ultra vires—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. exxxii.), sec. 304.—The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, sec. 304, empowers the magistrates to make from time to time "such orders and bye-laws as they shall think fit for all or any of the following purposes: (that is to say)" inter alia, "(1) For regulating the conduct of the owners and drivers of hackney carriages in their several employments: (7) For regulating all matters affecting or relating to the safety, comfort, or convenience of persons hiring or using hackney carriages and of the public."

Mackenzie v. Somerville.

The magistrates made a bye-law in the following terms:—"The driver of a hackney carriage shall not stand with the same longer than is necessary for taking up or setting down passengers on any part of the public streets not allotted as a hackney carriage stance, except at the dismissal of the theatres, assemblies, public meetings, and the like."

Held that the bye-law was not ultra vires of the magistrates.

A hackney cab-driver, in pursuance of a written order from the manager of a hotel to the driver's employers instructing them to send a cab to the hotel every day at a specified hour, was ordered by his employers to drive his cab to the hotel and take his orders from those in charge there. He was there told by the hotel boots to wait until he was discharged, and he waited accordingly for about an hour, when the boots told him that he was discharged. He had not been hired by anyone wishing to use his cab.

Held that the hotel manager's order did not constitute a hire of the cab, and that the cab-driver had rightly been convicted of a contravention of the bye-law.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Young.
Lord Trayner.
Ld. Moncreiff.

ON 28th May 1900 Robert Mackenzie, hackney carriage-driver, Edinburgh, was charged in the Burgh Court, Edinburgh, on a summary complaint, setting forth that he had "contravened the existing Orders and Bye-laws made, ordained, and enacted by the Magistrates of Edinburgh, for regulating the hackney carriages of Edinburgh, and the owners and drivers thereof, in terms of the powers conferred on them by 'The Edinburgh Municipal Police Act, 1879,' section 304, and particularly bye-law made by the said Magistrates on 15th December 1899,* in lieu of bye-law 35, which was repealed, in so far as, upon the 24th day of April 1900, in Princes Street, Edinburgh, opposite the Balmoral Hotel, he did stand with his hackney carriage on part of the public street not allotted as a hackney carriage stance for an hour, namely, from half-past two o'clock to half-past three o'clock in the afternoon, which was longer than was necessary for taking up or setting down passengers, said time and place above libelled not being at the dismissal of the theatres, assemblies, public meetings, or the like."

The accused objected that the bye-law mentioned in the complaint was ultra vires of the Magistrates. The Magistrate repelled the objection. The accused then pleaded not guilty, but, after evidence had been led, he was convicted, and fined 5s.

He brought a bill of suspension, in which he founded on an order (produced at the trial) sent to his employers, Messrs John Croall & Son, Limited, by the manager of the Balmoral Hotel on 9th April 1900, instructing Messrs Croall to send a cab to the hotel every morning at 8.30. The complainer averred that in consequence of this order he received written instructions from Messrs Croall to drive his cab every morning to the hotel at 8.30, and also at other hours specified during the day, and take his orders from those in charge at the hotel; that in accordance with these instructions he drove to the hotel at 2.30 on the day in question, and was told by the head boots at the hotel to wait until he was discharged; and that he waited accordingly until 3.30, when the head boots discharged him. The complainer did not aver that the proprietors of the hotel had paid anything to Messrs Croall for sending the cab to the hotel.

Argued for the complainer;—(1) The bye-law in question was ultra vires. It was not authorised by section 304 of the Act of 1879. (2)

* See rubric.

No. 3.

Mackenzie v. Somerville.

The complainer had not contravened the bye-law, assuming its validity. Construed literally, it would make it illegal for anyone to keep a cab waiting anywhere, at a house while he was calling, for example. But construing the bye-law reasonably, the complainer was entitled and bound to keep his cab waiting at the hotel door, in obedience to the orders of those in charge of the hotel. He had been hired by the hotel manager, who found it convenient to have a cab ready for any guest who might want a cab.

The respondent (the Procurator-fiscal) was not called upon.

LORD YOUNG.—I think that this is not a good objection. I think that the bye-law contains a very reasonable and sensible provision, the effect of which is that there shall be no standing by cabs on the streets of Edinburgh except on stances provided for the purpose, or for the convenience of persons who have hired cabs. This bye-law does not apply to the case of persons who have hired cabs, and an order to send a cab to this hotel is produced, and has been appealed to as justifying this cab-driver in keeping his cab at the door of the hotel from half-past eight in the morning till someone might require him. I cannot assent to that. This defender would be entitled to stand at the hotel if he was doing so in obedience to the lawful orders of a person who had hired him, but he is not entitled to stand waiting for someone to hire him, which is what he was doing here notwithstanding this so-called order. I think, therefore, this suspension should be refused.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

Public-house—Hawking exciseable liquors—Trafficking in streets—Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35), secs. 16 and 37.—The Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, enacts:—

Sec. 16—"Every person hawking spirits or other exciseable liquors shall thereby be guilty of an offence, . . . and on being convicted of such offence shall forfeit and pay a penalty not exceeding ten pounds," &c.

Sec. 37, inter alia—"The expression 'trafficking' shall mean and include bartering, selling, dealing in, trading in, exposing or offering for sale by retail."

"The word 'hawking' shall mean and include trafficking in or about the streets, highways," &c.

In a complaint charging a contravention of sec. 16 of the above Act, it was proved that the accused, who was a member of a club which supplied exciseable liquors to its members on Sunday, received money in a street from a man on a Sunday, went to and entered the club, and returned with a small bottle of whisky, which he handed to the man from whom he had received the money; that he procured whisky in this way for three different persons on the same Sunday; that none of these persons were members of the club; that one of them at least was previously unknown to the accused; and that the accused made a profit of 3d. on each transaction. The magistrate having found the charge not proved, the prosecutor appealed.

Held that the facts proved constituted a contravention of sec. 16 of the Neilson v. Dunsmore.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-General.
Lord Adam.
Lord M'Laren.

ON 15th September 1900 William Dunsmore, 16 Church Place, Glasgow, was charged in the Glasgow Police Court (Northern District) on a complaint at the instance of George Neilson, the Procurator-fiscal, setting forth that the accused "did, on 26th August 1900, hawk exciseable liquor, videlicet whisky, by trafficking therein, between the hours of eleven o'clock forenoon and twelve o'clock noon of said date, in Garscube Road, Glasgow, with two men, whose names and addresses are to the complainer unknown, by offering for sale, and selling and supplying to each of said two men a half-mutchkin or thereby of whisky, in a glass bottle, and also by trafficking therein between the hours of twelve o'clock noon and one o'clock afternoon, in Garscube Road aforesaid, and in a close at 20 Corn Street, Glasgow, with James M'Ilvride, of 14 Roslin Place, Glasgow, by offering for sale, and selling and supplying to the said James M'Ilvride a half-mutchkin or thereby of whisky, in a glass bottle, contrary to the Laws for the Regulation of Public-Houses in Scotland, and particularly the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 16 thereof:* whereby," &c.

The accused pleaded not guilty.

After evidence had been led the Magistrate found the charge not proven, and assoilzied the accused.

The Procurator-fiscal obtained a case for appeal.

The case stated that, proof having been led for the prosecution, the respondent stated that he had no witnesses, and did not desire to give evidence on his own behalf; and that the Procurator-fiscal having been heard, the respondent stated that he did not desire to address the Court.

The following were the facts stated in the case as proved:—Two police-constables, who gave evidence for the prosecution, had taken up a position (in plain clothes) at a window on the opposite side of Corn Street from the Working Men's Club after mentioned. The respondent was frequenting Corn Street and Garscube Road during the hours mentioned in the complaint on Sunday 26th August 1900. Between eleven o'clock forenoon and twelve o'clock noon, on that day in Garscube Road, at the corner of Corn Street, he received money from a man whose name and address had not been ascertained. The respondent then proceeded to a working men's club, situated at No. 6 Corn Street, of which he was a member, and at which exciseable liquor was supplied to members on Sundays. The respondent came out of the club in five or six minutes and joined the man in question, to whom he handed a half-mutchkin glass bottle, containing a clear liquid which looked like whisky. The respondent then loitered about in Garscube Road, when another man, whose name and address had not been ascertained, handed money to the respondent, who again visited the club, and returned and handed the man last referred to a half-mutchkin glass bottle, containing a clear liquid which looked like whisky. The respondent thereafter continued to loiter in Corn Street, where, between twelve o'clock noon and one o'clock afternoon, opposite the club door, James M'Ilvride, named in the complaint, handed him 1s. 6d. in money. The respondent thereupon entered the club again, and on coming out in a short time he joined M'Ilvride, who proceeded with him to the close, 20 Corn Street, where the respondent handed to M'Ilvride a half-mutchkin or thereby of whisky in a glass bottle. The respondent was thereupon apprehended and taken to the police station, where he volunteered the statement that he had received 1s. 6d. from M'Ilvride to get the whisky, and that he got about threepence on each of the other two transactions, and threepence on the transaction with M'Ilvride. There was no previous acquaintanceship between the respondent and M'Ilvride, who alleged that he applied to the respondent for whisky simply because he had seen the respondent supply others.

The case further stated that, but for the decision in the recent case of Dewart v. Neilson,[1] the Magistrate would have convicted the respondent of selling whisky to M'Ilvride in contravention of the Act.

The question of law was—"Whether the facts proved are sufficient to constitute a contravention within the meaning of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, section 16 thereof, and to warrant a conviction against the accused for hawking exciseable liquor?"

At the hearing of the appeal no appearance was made for the respondent.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The facts of this case are short and simple. The accused Dunsmore, on the forenoon of Sunday, 26th August 1900, was hanging about for nearly two hours in the neighbourhood of a working men's club in Glasgow. On three occasions he entered into conversation with persons who seem to have been passers-by, and who, as the result of the conversations, handed him money. He then on each occasion went into the club and got a certain amount of whisky served to him in it. On returning to the street he handed this whisky to the man who had last given him money, and he kept the money to himself. It is not said that any of the three men were members of the club, and we are bound to assume that they were not. Nor is it alleged that the club was a shebeen, or that the whisky was sold illegally in it, so that we must assume that the sales were made to Dunsmore as a member of the club. Under these circumstances it does not appear to me doubtful that Dunsmore, having got the whisky as a member of the club, and handed it on to each of three men for a money payment, was trafficking in the whisky within the meaning of the Act.

The case, however, does not stop there. On each of these three transactions Dunsmore made a profit of threepence. Evidence to this effect was given in the inferior Court in his presence, and he did not take the opportunity of going into the box and denying it. We must therefore accept the statement as true. Such being the facts we do not require to consider what the law would be if Dunsmore had gone to the club and got the whisky as a messenger. I may, however, say that I do not see how, without something being wrong at the club, any messenger from a person who was not a member could have been supplied. But we have no such case here. What we have to do with is a perfectly clear case of hawking exciseable liquor by trafficking in it on the public street.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The facts proved are that this man was loitering on the street near the club, received money from a man, went into the club, came out in five minutes, and was seen to hand a bottle of whisky to the man who had given him the money. This happened on two other occasions. On each occasion the accused made a profit of threepence, and it was proved that in the case of M'Ilvride, one of the three persons to whom the accused brought out whisky, there was no previous acquaintanceship between him and the accused. This is a very clear case of trafficking in liquor. With regard to the case of Dewart v. Neilson,[1] to which we were referred, I do not say anything against that decision. The facts of the case with which we are dealing are different.

LORD M'LAREN.—I have never been able to see why a club should not pay licence-duty for the sale of exciseable liquor, like any other person who trades in such liquor. I suppose that the theory is that when a member of a club gets a glass of whisky and soda, he is receiving a share in the distribution of the assets of the club. But, then, to make that theory complete it would be necessary that every other member of the club should receive an equal number of glasses in the course of the year, in order that he should receive his dividend in kind. But as the Inland Revenue does not claim licence-duty from clubs, great or small, one must assume that clubs are entitled to sell liquor to their members without contravening the licensing laws. Now, the only question put to us in this case is, whether the facts proved are sufficient to constitute a contravention of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, section 16, and to warrant a conviction against the accused of hawking exciseable liquors. This Court does not review the decision of a Magistrate on facts. Yet if there is a legal principle involved we can answer a question put to us in this form. Having regard to the facts which the Magistrate says he held to be proved, it is a very clear case of trafficking in liquor in the public street. The Magistrate says that the case of Dewart v. Neilson [1] stood in the way of his convicting. I do not find it necessary to consider the case of Dewart [1] very carefully, because the Judges who decided that case were of opinion that the person charged was only a messenger, who did not participate in any act of trafficking. The question whether that principle was rightly or wrongly applied on the facts of the case of Dewart [1] is one with which we have nothing to do. But this principle does nothing to solve the present case. The question of contravention only arises after Dunsmore, a member of the club, had obtained the whisky by a lawful contract of purchase and sale. I assume that Dunsmore was lawfully in possession of the whisky. That being so, if he chose to give it away to his friends, it might have been a good defence that he was not disposing of it for money or gain. But we must consider what was actually done. Dunsmore proceeded to dispose of the whisky at a profit. If that is not trafficking, I should despair of finding any definition that would exclude the most flagrant and plain infringement of the statute.

Lottery—Distribution of prizes by lot or chance—Mechanism operated by spring—Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. clxv.), sec. 22.—The Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892, sec. 22, enacts:—"No person shall keep, or be concerned in the keeping, management, or conduct of any place, or exercise, keep open, shew, or expose to be played, drawn, or thrown at, or in, either by dice, lots, cards, balls, or by numbers or figures, or by any other way, contrivance, or device whatsoever, any lottery."

The keeper of an ice-cream shop was charged with a contravention of this enactment. The following facts were proved:—The accused exposed on the counter of his shop a machine called the Automatic Tivoli Cigar Machine intended to be and actually used by his customers. The machine was put in operation by putting a penny in a slot, and by pressing a spring. The amount of the pressure applied to the spring determined the course taken by the penny inside the machine, and this in turn determined whether the person who had put in the penny got it back, lost it to the accused, or won from him a cigar valued at twopence. A certain amount of skill might be acquired in giving the requisite pressure to the spring, but it was not proved that the customers of the accused had any opportunity, or ever attempted, to acquire such skill. The accused was convicted.

Held on appeal that the machine as worked and used was a lottery within the meaning of sec. 22 of the Act, and that the accused had rightly been convicted.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Adam. Lord M'Laren.

On 2d October 1900 Carlo Santongeli, ice-cream dealer, 530 Gallowgate, Glasgow, was charged in the Eastern Police Court, Glasgow, on a complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal setting forth that the accused "did on the 8th day of September 1900, in the shop occupied by him at 530 Gallowgate, Glasgow, keep, shew, and expose, a lottery, consisting of a box enclosing a mechanical contrivance, with seven receptacles, put into action by any person inserting a penny in a slot, which penny is thrown upwards by a spring set in motion by the person desirous of trying for the prize offered on said lottery, viz., a cigar (as said prize may be determined by lot or chance by the said penny falling into the centre receptacle in said machine); and that said accused did, date above libelled, suffer Ernest Smith, of 18 Garriochmill Road, Glasgow, to exercise said lottery by the insertion of a penny in the slot, in which lottery cigars to the value of twopence, deliverable forthwith by the said accused, were offered as prizes aforesaid, contrary to the Glasgow Police Acts, particularly the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892, section 22,* whereby" &c.

* The Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. clxv.), sec. 22, enacts:—"No person shall keep, or be concerned in the keeping, management, or conduct of any place, or exercise, keep open, shew, or expose to be played, drawn, or thrown at, or in, either by dice, Santongeli v. Neilson.

The accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint on the ground that there was no proper description of a lottery under the Act in the body of the complaint. The Magistrate repelled the objection. The accused then pleaded not guilty, but, after evidence had been led, was convicted and admonished.

He obtained a case for appeal. The case stated that the accused on the date libelled kept on the counter in his shop, exposed so as to be available to customers, a box produced in evidence by the Procurator-fiscal, known as the Automatic Tivoli Cigar Machine. "That said box enclosed a mechanical contrivance with seven receptacles, put into action by any person inserting a penny in the slot, which penny is thrown upwards by a spring set in motion by the person desirous of trying for the prize offered—viz., a cigar—as said prize may be determined by the said penny falling into the centre receptacle in said machine; that said penny, when discharged by said spring, falls, according to the strength of the spring applied by the person using it, into one of the three channels or courses into which the face of the machine is divided. If the penny falls into the centre channel it drops into said centre receptacle (becoming then the property of the accused), and a ticket falls out of a slot below said centre receptacle, which entitles the said person operating to get forthwith a cigar valued twopence from said accused. If, however, it falls into either of the said side channels, it passes in and out, between a number of pins, and drops into one of the three receptacles immediately below each of said side channels. If it falls in the centre receptacle of said side channels it returns to the person operating through another slot immediately below same; but if it falls in either of the side receptacles of said side channel, then it drops into a till in the bottom of the machine, becoming then the property of the accused. That by practice a certain amount of skill may be gained in putting the amount of force into said spring necessary to send the penny into said centre channel; but if the penny enters either of the side channels it is then a matter of chance whether it will fall into the centre receptacle of said side channel and be returned to the person who inserted it in the slot, or fall into one of the side receptacles of said side channel, and drop into said till." Then followed a statement of facts shewing that the accused suffered Ernest Smith, mentioned in the complaint, to use the machine.

The following were the questions of law:—"First, Whether said complaint is relevantly stated, and second, whether, on the facts held by me as proved, I was right in finding that said machine was a lottery under section 22 of the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892, and in convicting said accused as I did?"

Argued for the appellant;—The complaint was irrelevant, because the species facti alleged shewed there was not a lottery, but at most a game. A lottery might, for instance, be determined by the throw of dice, but betting between two persons on the throw of dice was not a lottery, but a game. Here there were only two persons, and what was said to be done by means of the machine was betting (with odds in favour of the higher stake) between the member of the public who put his penny in the slot and the accused. It was against all common use of language to describe a mechanical contrivance of this kind as a lottery. 2. On the facts the Magistrate had held that "a certain amount of skill" might be acquired in so manipulating the spring as to secure a prize. In England, under the Gaming Act, 1802[1] (the language of which was similar to that of sec. 22 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1892), it had been held that if the determination of the prize was not entirely a matter of chance, there was no lottery, and, accordingly, that a distribution of prizes among the persons who would most successfully name the winners of certain future horse races was not a distribution "by chance," and so not a lottery.[2] Again, a prize for the most approximately correct prediction of the number of births and deaths in London during a particular week was not a lottery, since knowledge of statistics and skill in dealing with them entered into the matter.[3] On the other hand, where the charge was under the Betting Act, 1853, it was immaterial whether skill entered into the betting or not.[4] Cases under that Act had thus no application to the case of lotteries. The terms of the conviction and complaint in this case were inconsistent with the finding in fact that skill might be acquired in using the spring.

Argued for the respondent;—Practically the winning of a prize by this machine was a matter of pure chance; it was not sufficient that an infinitesimal element of skill should enter into the competition. In the "missing word" competitions an appropriate word had to be selected, but the number of possible words was so large that the Court were satisfied that chance was the main element, and that the competition was a lottery.[5] The combination of a number of persons did not appear to be necessary to constitute a lottery.[6] This was a "distribution of prizes by chance," and was as clearly a lottery as the distribution of coupons to purchasers of a pound of tea was in Taylor's[6] case. The context of the section shewed that what might be properly called games were to be treated as lotteries, e.g., things that were to be thrown at with a ball, and it was plain that less skill would enter into the working of this machine than in taking aim with a ball thrown by the hand.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The question depends upon the true construction of section 22 of the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act of 1892. The mechanism and what is done with it are clearly described by the Magistrate in the case. The box encloses a mechanical contrivance with seven receptacles, put into action by any person inserting a penny in the slot, which penny is thrown upwards by a spring set in motion by the person desiring to try for the prize offered, viz., a cigar. The penny when discharged by the spring, falls, according to the strength of the spring applied by the person using it, into one of three channels or courses into which the face of the machine is divided. If it falls into the centre channel, it drops into the centre receptacle (becoming the property of the accused), whereupon a ticket falls from a slot entitling the person operating to a cigar valued 2d. If the penny falls into either of the side channels it passes in and out between a number of pins, and drops into one of the three receptacles immediately below each of the side channels. If it falls in the centre receptacle of the side channel, it returns to the person operating through another slot immediately below the same; but if it falls in either of the side receptacles of the side channel, it drops into a till in the bottom of the machine, becoming the property of the accused. The Magistrate says that "by practice a certain amount of skill may be gained in putting the amount of force into said spring necessary to send the penny into said centre channel; but if the penny enters either of the side channels it is then a matter of chance whether it will fall into the centre receptacle of said side channel and be returned to the person who inserted it in the slot, or fall into one of the side receptacles of said side channel and drop into said till." To this state of facts we have to apply the words of section 22 of the Glasgow Police Act of 1892. These words are:—(His Lordship quoted the section). We have not here to determine what is comprehended under the term lottery by going to a dictionary or applying our common knowledge, because the things which for the purposes of this Act are or constitute a lottery are fully described in the section. If a thing is within the description of this section, then it is a lottery for the purposes of the Act whether or not it is a lottery for other purposes. The operation is performed by the pressing of the spring; the penny goes into different places according to the amount of pressure applied to the spring, and the course of the penny determines the winning or losing of the prize. Counsel for the appellant maintained that this was a matter of skill and not of chance, or that, in any event, skill entered into it as a material ingredient. It is true that the Magistrate mentions that a certain amount of skill may be brought to bear on the operation of this machine, but I do not think it is possible to read the description of the machine which the Magistrate gives, and to follow the clear exposition of its working we have had from the bar, without seeing that for practical purposes it is mainly and substantially a matter of chance where the penny will go. Its course is determined by mechanical forces, but it will be difficult, or practically impossible, for the ordinary frequenters of an ice-cream shop to calculate these, so that the precise direction which the penny will take is for all practical purposes a matter of chance. It is plain from the other parts of the section that things which are more dependent upon the skill or strength or knowledge of the operator, e.g., throwing balls or other things at objects put up, are lotteries within the meaning of it. I am therefore of opinion that the Magistrate was right in holding that this mechanism, as worked and used, was a lottery within the definition of section 22.

It was argued that the term lottery involves the idea of the distribution by chance of a fund to which a number of persons contribute. The idea of contribution and distribution, with a profit to the keeper of the lottery, is historically familiar, but to say that nothing can be a lottery which does not involve contribution and distribution is against the ordinary use of language. Almost everything which is struck at by section 22 takes place solely between the person who keeps the lottery and the person who deals with him. There may be more than two persons engaged, but more than two persons are not required.

LORD ADAM.—The question is, what is the meaning of the term lottery as used in section 22 of the Glasgow Police Act of 1892. Lottery as defined in the dictionaries (Century Dictionary) has two meanings—(1) the distribution of anything by lot, or the determination of anything by chance. This is the general sense. (2) A scheme for raising money by selling chances to share in a distribution of prizes. This is the secondary sense. The term as used in section 22 is employed in the first sense, and taken in that sense it covers this machine, which substantially is a game of chance and nothing else. It is said that a lottery must be a game into which no skill can enter, and that the moment skill becomes an ingredient it ceases to be a lottery. I agree that a game of skill is not a lottery, but I demur to the view that a minimum of skill possible in a game of chance prevents the game from being a lottery. This machine does not cease to be a lottery because someone—perhaps the proprietor—has by assiduous practice acquired a certain skill in operating it. It is exposed to the public to be used by the public, and members of the public have no opportunity of acquiring skill at it by practice. To them its working depends wholly on chance.

LORD M'LAREN.—I should not have been sorry if we could have seen our way to set aside this conviction. It seems to me that the putting of a penny in the slot of this machine on the chance of getting a cigar is such a very mild form of speculation that it can do no harm to anyone. But the question whether it is desirable to prosecute in cases of this kind is one for the magistrates, and is not a matter which can enter into the determination of this Court. I agree that this mechanism is to all intents and purposes an instrument of chance. It is true that a certain amount of skill may be acquired in the working of this machine, but the machine is not constructed to develop or to exercise skill. It would also be very unlikely that members of the public frequenting the restaurant should have such opportunities of practice as would develop skill in the use of the machine. I have more difficulty on the other question raised—whether this is a lottery. This enactment is not happily worded. It suggests that a lottery may be a material thing to be thrown at. I consider that in the true literary sense of the term, and also according to ordinary usage, a lottery is the distribution of a prize or a definite number of prizes among people who buy tickets on the chance of getting a prize. I agree, however, with what your Lordship has said about the construction of the statute. It is intended to apply to certain known forms of amusement. It treats as a lottery equally a thing which may be played, drawn, or thrown at, and covers such familiar applications of chance as are known to be made by instruments in which balls or counters of any kind are used and the result is determined by chance. In this extended sense of the word lottery, required by the context of this enactment, I am of opinion that the accused was guilty of a contravention of the statute, and that the conviction should be sustained. No. 5. Dec. 6, 1900. Santongeli v. Neilson.

Conviction and Sentence—Competency in form—Sentence on two or more persons.—A conviction and sentence on a summary complaint found the accused A and B guilty of the crimes charged: "Therefore fines and amerciates them in the sum of twenty shillings sterling each, . . . and unless said fines are instantly paid by them respectively, decerns and adjudges the said A and B to be imprisoned for the space of ten days each, unless said fines shall be sooner paid." The fines were paid.

In a suspension of the conviction on the ground that under it both A and B were liable to imprisonment if either failed to pay the fine, opinion (by Lord M'Laren) that the objection was good.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Adam. Lord M'Laren.

ON 11th January 1900, upon a summary complaint in the Police Court at Aberdeen, charging James Allan, spirit-dealer, Menzies Road, and Kenward Kinnair, barman, Victoria Road, both of Aberdeen, with assault and breach of the peace, Robert Lamb, procurator-fiscal, obtained a conviction and sentence in the following terms:—

"The Magistrate, in respect of the evidence adduced, finds the said James Allan and Kenward Kinnair guilty of the crimes of assault and breach of the public peace as charged: Therefore fines and amerciates them in the sum of twenty shillings sterling each, to be paid to the complainer and disposed of in terms of law, and unless said fines are instantly paid by them respectively, decerns and adjudges the said James Allan and Kenward Kinnaird to be imprisoned for the space of ten days each, unless said fines shall be sooner paid, and thereafter to be set at liberty; and for that purpose grants warrant to officers of law to convey them to the prison of Aberdeen, thereafter to be dealt with in due course of law."

On 13th November 1900 Allan presented a bill of suspension in which he craved the Court to suspend the above conviction and sentence, inter alia, "in respect that it ordered the imprisonment of both parties complained against in the event of either failing to pay the fine imposed upon him."

At the hearing the respondent, the procurator-fiscal, maintained that the complainer was barred by mora in bringing the suspension.

The only statement by the complainer in the bill of suspension as to the delay in bringing the conviction under review was a statement to the effect that owing to circumstances specified, the complainer's agent was, through inadvertence, too late in applying for a stated case, and "the complainer was thus prevented from bringing the conviction under review by way of a stated case."

On the question of mora the undernoted cases were cited.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—Only one of the objections stated to this conviction deserves serious consideration, viz., the objection to the form in which the adjudication of imprisonment was made. The question we have to consider is, whether the words used did not decern that both of the two persons convicted should be imprisoned if either of them failed to pay his fine. This objection might have been serious if it had been taken timeously. When we come, however, to look at the dates, we find that the sentence was on 11th January 1900, and that the bill of suspension was not presented till 13th November 1900. For more than ten months the suspender allowed the conviction to stand, and made no complaint. The fines were promptly paid, and though I do not attribute great importance to the fact that they were paid without protest, it makes the objection a highly technical one. I think that such an objection, with no substantial interest behind it, should, if it is to prevail, be stated within a reasonable time, and not only after an interval of more than ten months. Accordingly, I am of opinion that the suspension should be refused.

LORD ADAM.—The only objection of any weight submitted to us was as to the form of the sentence. If this objection had been taken timeously it might have been successful. As it is, no injustice has been done, so that the objection is quite technical. The cases cited by Mr Brown entirely support the view that such an objection must be brought without any undue delay. It is a matter for the Court to consider what delay is reasonable in the circumstances. I agree that a delay of ten months without explanation is unreasonable.

LORD M'LAREN.—If this bill of suspension had been brought within a reasonable time, I should have been disposed to regard the objection to the conviction as good. The conviction fines each of the persons convicted, and then provides that unless both pay the fines each shall suffer imprisonment. In this case no injustice resulted from the error, because the fines were paid. Nevertheless, if a suspension had been brought within a reasonable time, such a technical objection as this might have been fatal to the conviction. In the Court of Justiciary, where two or more persons are prosecuted under the same indictment, the practice is that each sentence is complete in itself, and it is better not to attempt to combine them as is done here.

Prima facie every convicted person who pays a fine must be held to have acquiesced in the sentence unless he has made a protest. In the absence of a protest indulgence will be granted only if he takes steps to Court to summon the party complained against to appear at a time and place to be specified in such warrant and summons (such summons being served at least six free days before the diet of appearance), to attend the hearing of such complaint. . . ."

The Public-Houses Act Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35), recites, inter alia, the Home Drummond Act, 1828, and enacts:—

Sec. 18—"In the case of any person complained of for any offence against the recited Acts or this Act, excepting for breach of certificate, it shall be lawful for any Sheriff or any one Justice or Magistrate to or before whom such complaint shall have been presented, unless by this Act otherwise provided, to grant warrant for summoning the person complained of, upon an inducie of not less than forty-eight hours, to appear to answer such complaint at a time and place to be therein specified. . . ."

Sec. 25—"Every person who, after the passing of this Act, shall commit any breach of certificate, or who shall in any other manner offend against either of the recited Acts or this Act, shall be prosecuted, and all penalties, together with the expenses of prosecution and conviction to be ascertained on conviction, shall be recovered, unless by the Act otherwise specially directed or authorised, before the Sheriff or any two or more Justices of the Peace of the county, or any magistrate of the burgh having jurisdiction in the county or burgh as the case may be, in which such offender shall reside or such offence shall have been committed, at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, or of such other party as shall be specially appointed to prosecute such class of offences by the Justices of the Peace of the county, in General Quarter Sessions assembled, or the magistrates of the burgh, as the case may be, and which appointment they are hereby specially authorised to make; and such Justices of the Peace in General Quarter Sessions, or magistrates, as the case may be, shall from time to time fix a reasonable sum in name of salary, or a reasonable rate of remuneration by fees for prosecutions, and all other business under this Act, to be paid annually to such procurator-fiscal or other party appointed to prosecute as aforesaid. . . ."

Sec. 26—"Every offence committed against the recited Acts and this Act, or any of them, may, except where inconsistent with the provisions and conditions of this Act, be tried and determined in a summary manner . . . before the Courts, and subject to the provisions and conditions provided in the said recited Acts or either of them. . . ."

Sec. 30—"For the purpose of trying offences against the recited Acts or the 7th November 1900 at 11 o'clock A.M., and the diet was held on the 13th day of November at 12 o'clock noon, not leaving six free days between the service and the diet. The complainer, residing at Dunoon, had to travel to the Court of Inveraray, and required the full inducie to arrange and prepare for his defence. The inducie of the complaint was irregular and illegal, and was a substantial deviation from statutory enactment. The Sheriff, however, repelled both the above preliminary pleas."

Argued for the complainer;—(1) The procurator-fiscal of the Sheriff Court had no title to bring a complaint for a contravention of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862. Where a person had been specially appointed to prosecute under sec. 25 of the Act, as had been done here, he alone had a title to prosecute. The provision as to the payment of the prosecutor, and the whole scheme of the Act, made it clear that prosecutions were to be entrusted exclusively to a specially appointed officer. The working of the Act in the county would otherwise be thrown into confusion. (2) There ought to have been at least six clear days' inducie. No doubt, so long as sec. 18 of the Act of 1862 stood inducie of at least forty-eight hours were sufficient. But that part of sec. 18 had been repealed, which let in sec. 23 of the Home Drummond Act. The Statute Law Revision Act, 1893, neither saved the procedure of sec. 18, for that was repealed, nor did it save the procedure of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, for that procedure had never applied, being excluded by sec. 18.

this Act, except in cases of breach of certificate and of imposing penalties and declaring forfeitures under the same, the expressions 'Magistrates of any Burgh,' 'Magistrate,' and 'Magistrates,' shall include any Judge officiating in any Court for the trial of police offences under the provisions of any local or general Police Act; and all such offences committed within the jurisdiction of any such Judge may be tried by and before him in any such Court at the instance of the procurator-fiscal or other party acting as prosecutor under the twenty-fifth section of this Act. . . ."

The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), enacts:—

Sec. 3—"The provisions of this Act may be applied to," inter alia—

"(2) All proceedings to be taken before any Sheriff, Justices or Justice, or Magistrate, in Scotland for the prosecution of any person who has committed or is charged with having committed any offence or act for which, under the provisions of any Act of Parliament he is liable, upon summary conviction before any Sheriff, Magistrate, Justices or Justice, to be imprisoned or fined, or otherwise punished, or to be ordered to do or perform any act, and to be imprisoned in default of performance."

Sec. 6—"On such complaint [i.e., under the Act] being laid before the Court, it shall be lawful for the Court to grant warrant to cite the respondent . . . to appear before the Court on inducie of not less than forty-eight hours. . . ."

The Statute Law Revision Act, 1893 (56 Vict. cap. 14), sec. 1, repealed, inter alia, the portion above quoted of sec. 18 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, subject to the proviso that "the repeal of any words or expressions of enactment described in the said schedule shall not affect the binding force, operation, or construction of any statute, or of any part of a statute, whether as respects the past or the future . . . nor shall this Act affect any principle, rule of law or equity, or established jurisdiction, form or course of pleading, practice, or procedure, or the general or public nature of any statute. . . ."

No. 7.

Dec. 10, 1900. Stirling v. Dickson.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The jurisdiction of the Sheriff to try complaints for contravention of the Act of 1862 was clear on the face of sec. 18, and the instance of the procurator-fiscal of the Sheriff Court to prosecute complaints before the Sheriff would be excluded only by express language or necessary implication,[1] neither of which was to be found here. (2) The general provision of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864 had made the special provision of sec. 18 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act of 1862 superfluous, and the only effect of the repeal of sec. 18 by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1893, was to sweep away this superfluity. The saving clause of the Act of 1893 was intended to save, and saved, general rules as to procedure such as that in the Summary Procedure Act of 1864.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—We have called for a reply on two points only. These two points are—(1) Whether there was the proper induciæ. (2) Whether the Sheriff's procurator-fiscal was entitled to prosecute.

In regard to the induciæ I think all complication disappears upon a consideration of the sections applicable to the point. The Public-Houses Acts, 1862, by section 18 provided for a forty-eight hours' induciæ in these cases. It was argued that this part of the section having been repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act of 1893, the long induciæ applicable to other cases came to apply to this, because there was no other induciæ provided. But we have in the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, a provision applicable to all statutory offences not otherwise provided for. I have no doubt that the part of section 18 referred to was repealed because the general provision of the Act of 1864 rendered it unnecessary.

As to the title of the procurator-fiscal, it seems to me that the only reasonable reading of section 25 is, that in each of the three Courts mentioned in the section the procurator-fiscal of that Court is to prosecute, and that it is competent for the Sheriff's fiscal to prosecute in the Sheriff's Court. It has been said that there is no provision made for his expenses, the expenses of the Justice of Peace fiscal or Magistrates' fiscal being alone provided for. But I do not think that this circumstance can affect the construction of the words which confer jurisdiction upon the Sheriff and provide for prosecution before him.

LORD ADAM.—I concur. The only observation I wish to make is about the title to prosecute. There are three Courts enumerated in the section—the Sheriff, Justice of Peace, and Magistrates' Courts. Then it is said the prosecution may be at the instance of the procurator-fiscal or other party specially appointed by the Justices in the county or Magistrates in the burgh. There is no power given to the Sheriff to appoint a prosecutor in his Court pro hac vice. Further, it is only to the Justices and Magistrates that power is given to fix a salary or fees for the payment of the procurator-fiscal or person appointed by them. It follows that the procurator-fiscal in the Sheriff Court has no means provided for his payment. The conclusion I draw is that the Legislature did not wish to encourage prosecutions in the Sheriff Court, but at the same time it did not deprive that Court of jurisdiction or the procurator-fiscal of power to prosecute before it. No. 7.

Dec. 10, 1900. Stirling v. Dickson.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in what has been said by your Lordship in the chair, and in the additional observations of Lord Adam. I think it extremely probable that the framers of this Act had in view that the provisions of the Act would be enforced mainly by the Justices' and the Magistrates' Courts; but I agree that it conferred jurisdiction upon the Sheriff, and gave a right to the Sheriff's procurator-fiscal to prosecute before the Sheriff Court.

I wish to add, that if ever there was a case where it was right to bring the prosecution before the Sheriff, I think this was such a case. It was a case which was suitable to be tried before an experienced Judge and a lawyer.

THE COURT refused the bill.

Fishing—Salmon-fishing—Solway—Complaint—Relevancy—"Owner"—Time—Penalty—Salmon Fishery Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 109), sec. 11—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 33.—The Salmon Fishery Act, 1861—an English Act—sec. 11, enacts, —"No fixed engine of any description shall be placed or used for catching salmon in any inland or tidal waters; and any engine placed or used in contravention of this section may be taken possession of or destroyed; and any engine so placed or used, and any salmon taken by such engine, shall be forfeited, and in addition thereto the owner of any engine placed or used in contravention of this section shall, for each day of so placing or using the same, incur a penalty not exceeding ten pounds; and for the purposes of this section a net that is secured by anchors, or otherwise temporarily fixed to the soil, shall be deemed to be a fixed engine. . . ."

The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 33, enacts that the provisions of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1861, "shall extend and apply to salmon fisheries in the waters and on the shores of the Solway Firth, situate in Scotland, as the same may be fixed by authority of this Act, and to the rivers flowing into the same, in so far as such provisions relate to the use of fixed engines for the taking of salmon: provided that all offences against such provisions shall be prosecuted and punished as directed by this Act."

A summary complaint set forth that the accused "did, between 2d July and 8th August 1900," at a specified locus in the Scottish portion of the Solway, "place and use for catching salmon" certain fixed engines described, "and did by means thereof take and kill 64 fish of the salmon kind" contrary to the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1861, sec. 11, made applicable to the locus libelled by the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 33; and prayed to have the accused adjudged to suffer the penalties provided by the "said Act."

Objections—(1) that the complaint charged as an offence something, viz., the taking of salmon, which was not an offence under section 11 of the Act of 1861; (2) that the specification of the time of the alleged offence was insufficient; and (3) that the prayer was ambiguous—held to be ill founded.

Held, further, that a complaint charging a contravention of section 11 of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1861, as applied to Scotland by the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 33, need not set forth that the accused was the "owner" of the engines specified in the complaint.

Opinions that the "owner" in the sense of the Act is the person having the control of the engines.

Fishings—Salmon-fishing—Sentence—Penalty—"Shall"—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 32.—The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 32, enacts,—"The penalties incurred under this Act shall in all prosecutions at the instance of the clerk of any District Board be payable to and recoverable by such clerk, and shall in all other cases be paid and applied in such manner as the Sheriff or Justices may direct. . . ."

A person charged at the instance of the clerk of a District Fishery Board with a contravention of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, was convicted and adjudged to pay a penalty to the Clerk of Court.

In a suspension held that the direction to pay the penalty to the Clerk of Court was a direction for the convenience of the accused, the duty of the Clerk of Court being to hand over the money to the Clerk of the District Board, and that the sentence was unobjectionable.

Record—Note of Documentary Evidence—Book—Plan—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 16.—The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 16, enacts,—". . . The record shall set forth, in the form of the Schedule (I) to this Act annexed, . . . the names of the witnesses, if any, examined, . . . with a note of any documentary evidence that may be put in."

At the trial upon a summary complaint two witnesses when giving evidence used a business book to refresh their memory by referring to it, and a third witness gave his evidence with reference to a plan in his possession. The book and the plan were laid on the table and left there by the witnesses. No motion was made that the book or plan should be noted on the record, and they were not so noted.

Held that the omission to note the book and plan on the record did not invalidate the conviction.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Adam. Lord M'Laren.

ON 5th September 1900 Alexander Marshall, fisherman, Fisher's Hut, Caerlaverock Parish, Dumfriesshire, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries, on a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, at the instance of Charles Steuart Phyn, solicitor, Dumfries, clerk to the Nith District Fishery Board, setting forth that the accused "did between 2d July and 8th August 1900, in tidal waters on the Blackshaw Bank on the side of the River Nith in the parish of Caerlaverock, Dumfriesshire, which flows into the Solway Firth, place and use for catching salmon two ranges of fixed engines known as paidle nets, one of the ranges containing three pockets or chambers, and the other two pockets or chambers, and did by means thereof take and kill 64 fish of the salmon kind, contrary to the Act 24 and 25 Victoria, cap. 109, section 11, made applicable to the locus above libelled, conform to the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, section 33,* as amended by the Act 26 and 27 Victoria, cap. 50, section 3: Whereby the said Alexander Marshall is liable to forfeiture of said nets, and, in addition thereto, to a penalty of £10 for each day of so placing or using the same, and for the expenses of prosecution, and, failing payment of said penalty and expenses, to poinding or imprisonment for recovery thereof in terms of the 28th section of the said Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, said imprisonment being modified in terms of the 6th section of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881."

The complaint prayed the Sheriff to grant warrant to cite the accused, "and thereafter to convict him of the aforesaid contravention; and to adjudge him to suffer the penalties provided by the said Act."

Marshall stated objections to the relevancy and competency of the complaint. The Sheriff-substitute (Campion) repelled these objections. Marshall then pleaded not guilty, but after evidence had been led, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this conviction and sentence:—"In respect of the evidence adduced, convicts the said Alexander Marshall of the contravention charged; and therefore adjudges him to forfeit and pay to the Clerk of Court the sum of £7 of modified penalty, with the sum of £3 sterling of expenses; and, in default of payment thereof within one week from this date, in respect it is inexpedient to issue a warrant of poinding and sale, decerns and adjudges the said Alexander Marshall to be imprisoned for the space of one month from the date of his imprisonment, unless the said sums shall be sooner paid, and thereafter to be set at liberty; and, for that purpose, grants warrant to officers of law to apprehend and convey the said Alexander Marshall to the prison of Maxwelltown, thereafter to be dealt with in due course of law."

Marshall brought a suspension.

The grounds of suspension, and the arguments of the parties at the hearing, sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Judges.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The objections taken to this conviction are numerous, but it appears to me that there is no substance in any of them.

1. It was objected that the complaint did not state that the present complainer was the owner of the nets, and it was maintained that this was an essential ingredient in the charge. The question whether it was so depends on the construction and effect of section 11 of the Act 24 and 25 Vict. c. 109. This is an English Act which is made applicable to the Scotch side of the Solway, and the Scotch rivers flowing into it, by the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, section 33. The form of section 11 is very material —(His Lordship read the section). It is plain that the offence is the placing or using a fixed engine for the catching of salmon, and in the earlier part of the section effective proceedings are authorised in rem, viz., the seizure and destruction of the fixed engine. Next the section goes on to say that, "in addition thereto the owner,"—that being the first mention of any person—"of any engine so placed or used shall incur a penalty." This provision as to persons is "in addition" to the provisions directed against the fixed engines. Down to this point the offence might be committed by anybody, but here the "owner" is introduced and proceedings prescribed against him. It seems to me that the word "owner" in the statute is used in a somewhat large sense. It does not, in my view, necessarily mean the person in whom the technical right of property in the nets is vested.

No. 8.

Marshall v. Phyn.

The meaning of the statute in my judgment is that the person against whom proceedings are to be taken shall not be, e.g., a servant fishing in the employment of another, but the person who has lawful possession and control of the nets, whether he is technically the proprietor of them or not. Accordingly, I am of opinion that it is not necessary to a good complaint that it shall state who is the owner. To put a strict construction on the term "owner" would be to render the section almost nugatory, for it would place an onus on the prosecutor which in many cases it might be impossible to discharge. Although the prosecutor might not know who the owner of the nets was, the person who had been using them and was prosecuted would know, and if a plea of this kind was to be set up, the proper time to state it would be when the proceedings were instituted.

2. It was objected that something is alleged in this complaint which is not an offence, viz., that fishing had been practised, and sixty-four fish of the salmon kind had been taken and killed. The Act, it was urged, did not make this an offence, the offence struck at being the placing or using of fixed engines. As I read the complaint, however, the substantive charge is the placing and using nets for the purpose specified, and the statement that sixty-four fish were taken and killed, though it may have been unnecessary, is merely an amplification of the statement that the net was used.

3. It was next objected that the complaint did not sufficiently specify the date of the offence, as it was essential that the accused should know whether he was charged with committing the offence during the whole time between 2d July and 8th August, or merely on one or more days during that period. The complaint states very plainly that the offence was committed between 2d July and 8th August, and inasmuch as the offence is alleged to have been committed by means of fixed engines, the natural, if not the only reasonable, meaning is that the nets were used continuously throughout the period between the dates mentioned, i.e., twenty-nine days in July and seven in August.

4. The next objection was that two enactments are, as it was said, mixed up—the offence and the penalty being taken from the English Act, and the procedure from the Scotch Act of 1862. The two Acts were passed in the same session of Parliament, and they are plainly parts of one scheme of legislation. Section 33 of the Scotch Act simply applies the rules as to the use of fixed engines, which under the English Statute hold for the southern shore of the Solway, to the north shore of the Solway, and the rivers flowing into it there. There might otherwise have been difficulties as to jurisdiction, and the offence and penalty created by the English Act are carried over to the north side by the Scotch Act, and the machinery of prosecution is Scotch.

5. The next objection to the conviction, in respect that it adjudges the modified penalty to be paid to the Clerk of Court instead of to the Clerk of the Fishery Board. The objection is based on section 32 of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, which provides that "the penalties incurred under this Act shall in all prosecutions at the instance of the clerk of any District Board be payable to and recoverable by such clerk." It is noteworthy that this provision, as the rest of the section shews, applies not only to penalty but also to expenses. The direction in the conviction that the penalty shall be paid to the Clerk of Court does not imply that he is to keep the money. It is a direction for the convenience of the accused person, enabling him to pay the money at once to the Clerk of Court, instead of having to search out the prosecutor, the Clerk of the District Board, who may live many miles away. The Clerk of Court is merely a stakeholder, his duty being to hand over the money to the person entitled to it, the Clerk of the District Board.

6. The last objection is founded upon an alleged rejection of evidence. It is material to observe the statements of the complainer on which this objection is based. These statements are as follows:—"During the conduct of the trial the witnesses Archibald Fisher and David Fisher produced in evidence a note-book which contained entries shewing the extent of their business, and the witness George Jackson produced in evidence and gave evidence as regards a plan shewing the locus. These productions have not been noted, as they should have been, under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts." The expression "produced in evidence" is not a technical expression, and from the explanation given at the bar it appears that the witnesses mentioned, when giving evidence, produced a book and refreshed their memory by referring to it. It was a business-book, not a probative document. Its only use was to afford means of giving weight to the parole evidence. It is not the practice of witnesses to put in documents. That falls to be done by the party or his agent. We are told that the witness laid the book on the table, where it was left. But that is not enough. In order to make a relevant averment it would have been necessary to state that, the party having by his agent asked that the document should be received and made part of the process, the Sheriff refused to allow it to be received. The same observations apply to the plan. No motion appears to have been made that it should be received in evidence. Further, it was not a case where the exact locus was of importance, e.g., a case of distinguishing between sea and river, and if it had been the plan would not have proved the locus.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion.

As to the objection based on the procedure at the trial, viz., that certain books produced in evidence were not noted as is required under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, the Act provides merely that a note should be taken of any documentary evidence that may be "put in." A witness may refer to documents merely to refresh his memory, and may take them away. It is not necessary that a document should be noted unless it is put in process, and with the producing of evidence in process the witness has nothing to do. That is the business of the parties, or the agents of the parties. It is not said here that either the books or the plan were put in or tendered as evidence.

The objections founded on the terms of the complaint are equally unsubstantial. It is said that the time referred to in the complaint is ambiguous, inasmuch as it may mean during the whole time or on one or more days during the time. I read the complaint as clearly meaning that the nets were used during the whole period named. It is said there are two offences set forth. But a careful reading of the complaint shews that there is really only one offence stated—the placing and using of fixed engines—and that the expression about taking or killing 64 salmon is inserted merely as explanatory, i.e., as explaining the result of using the fixed engines. Another objection taken to the complaint was that it ought to have set forth that the complainer was owner of the nets, since it was only the owner of the nets in question that could be convicted under the statute. A reference to the statute shews that the real offence struck at is the placing or using of fixed engines, and that it is only when the statute comes to prescribe penalties that the "owners" of the nets come in. It would certainly be for the person using the nets to prove that he is not the owner of them, and here it is not even said that the nets did not belong to the complainer.

No. 8.

Dec. 11, 1900.
Marshall v. Phyn.

In regard to the penalties both the Scots and English Acts were libelled. There are penalties provided in the English Act, and it must be taken that by section 33 of the Scots Act these penalties are carried over when it provides that the provisions of the English Act shall extend and apply to salmon fisheries on the Scotch shore of the Solway. The last objection taken had reference to the direction that the fine should be paid to the Clerk of Court. Section 32 of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, provides that the penalties incurred under the Act "shall in all prosecutions at the instance of the clerk of any District Board be payable to and recoverable by such clerk." This is permissive. It is different from cases in which the statutory provision is imperative. It does not seem to me to exclude the fines being paid in the first instance to the Clerk of Court and by him transmitted to the Clerk of the District Board.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think it would be too strict a construction to hold this complaint irrelevant or defective because it does not libel in terms that the defender is owner of the nets. I have doubts whether, under section 11 of the Act 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 109, a prosecution can be directed against anyone except the owners of the nets,—meaning, as I take it, the persons having the control of the nets. As to the proceedings first prescribed under section 11, the language of the section is impersonal, but clearly the persons who have the property in the nets are the persons upon whom the loss from the destruction or forfeiture of the nets would fall. The Act then proceeds to provide that "in addition" thereto there are to be proceedings against the owners. If the accused means to say he is not the owner the onus is on him to prove it. This is the general rule wherever in an indictment anything is libelled as the property of anyone.

In regard to the objection that productions were not noted, I observe that the record sets forth that certain productions were made for the complainer, and so it appears that the Sheriff was not forgetful of the duty of noting documents put in evidence. There is therefore an onus on the complainer of shewing that the documents in question were put in evidence. The Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1864, section 16, provides that the record shall set forth in the form of the Schedule I. to the Act a note of any documentary evidence that may be "put in." In the Schedule I. there is an instruction to this effect,—"Note also the production of any documents produced in evidence by either party." The expression "put in" is thus explained to mean "produced in evidence." To make a good objection to a record on the ground that a document produced in evidence was not noted, it would be necessary that the complainer should state that the document in question was tendered and admitted but not noted, or that it was tendered and refused. It is not so stated here. There is a case—Strachan v. Watson[1]—where a conviction was set aside on the ground that there had been an omission to note a plan which had been made part of the evidence. While I concurred in that judgment I was not a strong partisan for it. I was not present at the first hearing, and merely accepted what the Judges who were then present did in sending the case back to the Magistrate for a report. The decision went entirely on the facts as reported by the Magistrate. Prima facie a plan is only explanatory of the evidence given on oath. I doubt whether a plan is ever "documentary evidence" in the strict sense of that expression, except perhaps in the case of a person who is charged with stealing the plan. My opinion is, that as there is no power of review on the merits, there must, in order to open up the decree, be a definite statement that the document was offered in evidence.

Dec. 11, 1900.
Marshall v. Phyn.

In regard to the conviction, it is noteworthy that according to the form of conviction set forth in the schedule of the Summary Jurisdiction Act it is unnecessary to say to whom the penalties are to be paid. The conviction, then, would have been good if nothing had been said about the person to whom complainer was to pay the penalties. The addition of the words "to the Clerk of the Court" is innocuous, as it only informs the accused that he will be discharged by paying the money into Court. It is then the duty of the Clerk of Court to find out who is the ultimate recipient of the fines.

THE COURT refused the bill.

ANDREW WALLACE (Inspector of Poor of Govan), Appellant.—Deas.

Vaccination—Procedure where child removed from parish of birth before order for vaccination executed—Ultra vires—Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 108), secs. 1, 5, 18, and 30—Regulations by Board of Supervision, 15th December 1864, Art. 7.—The Vaccination Act, 1863, enacts,—Sec. 5, "The Parochial Board [now, by the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, the Parish Council] of every parish or combination . . . shall, in the exercise of the functions conferred upon them by this Act, conform to the regulations which may from time to time be issued by the Board of Supervision in relation thereto, which regulations the Board of Supervision is hereby authorised and required to make and issue."

Sec. 18 enacts that "the registrar of each district shall once in every six months transmit to the inspector of poor of the parish or combination in which such district is situated, a list of the names and addresses of such persons as have failed to transmit or lodge a certificate of vaccination in terms of this Act, and on the receipt of such list the inspector of poor shall lay the same before the Parochial Board of such parish or combination, and thereupon the Parochial Board shall issue an order to the vaccinator appointed by them to vaccinate the persons named in such list . . . and if any such person or the parent . . . of any such child shall refuse to allow the operation to be performed, he shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty," specified.

By article 7 of Regulations issued by the Board of Supervision, 15th December 1864, entitled "Proceedings under sec. 18 of the Vaccination Act," it is provided,—"If any child named in the registrar's list shall have left the parish for another known place of residence in Scotland before an order to vaccinate such child has been issued and executed, the inspector of the poor shall give immediate notice of the fact and of the circumstances connected therewith to the inspector of the parish to which such child shall have gone, whose duty it shall be to use all lawful endeavours to have the said child vaccinated."

Held that article 7 of the Regulations was intra vires of the Board of Supervision, and (2) that in the case provided for in that article it was competent for the Parish Council of the parish to which the child had gone to take proceedings for the vaccination of the child, in terms of section 18 of the Act, and to prosecute the parent for failure to vaccinate in contravention of that section.

Held further, that looking to the terms of sections 1 and 30 of the Act, it was not competent for a parish to take proceedings for the vaccination of a child which had left the parish.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Adam. Lord M'Laren.

ON 28th June 1900 James Summers was charged in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, on a complaint at the instance of Andrew Wallace, Inspector of Poor for the parish of Govan Combination. The complaint set forth,—"That James Summers, presently residing at Ellerslie, Laurel Street, Partick, in the parish of Govan Combination, and lately residing at 111 Hill Street, Glasgow, in the parish of Glasgow, has been guilty of an offence within the meaning of the Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863,* particularly secs. 8 and 18 thereof, in so far

* The Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. c. 108), enacts,—

Sec. 1—"Within two months after the passing of this Act the parochial board of every parish or combination of parishes in Scotland shall appoint a registered medical practitioner or practitioners to be the vaccinator or vaccinators within such parish or combination."

Sec. 5—"The parochial board of every parish or combination, and each vaccinator, and any other officers engaged in the administration of the laws for relief of the poor in any parish or combination, shall, in the exercise of the functions conferred upon them by this Act, conform to the regulations which may from time to time be issued by the Board of Supervision in relation thereto, which regulations the Board of Supervision is hereby authorised and required to make and issue."

Sec. 8 made provision for parents or guardians causing children to be vaccinated, and obtaining certificates of vaccination.

Sec. 18—"The registrar of each district shall once in every six months transmit to the inspector of the poor of the parish or combination in which such district is situate a list of the names and addresses of such persons as have failed to transmit or lodge a certificate of vaccination in terms of this Act, and on the receipt of such list the inspector of the poor shall lay the same before the parochial board of such parish or combination, and thereupon the parochial board shall issue an order to the vaccinator appointed by them to vaccinate the persons named in such list; and notice in writing of such order shall be given to such persons, or, if children, to their father as the Inspector of Poor for the parish of Glasgow having received from the registrar of Kelvin District of the parish of Glasgow a list, dated 22d February 1900, of the names and addresses of the persons who had failed to transmit to or lodge with said registrar a certificate of vaccination in terms of said Act, which list contained the name and address of the respondent as the father of Evelyn Summers, aged three years and six months or thereby, born in the said Kelvin District, the said Inspector of Poor for the parish of Glasgow on or about 23d February 1900 forwarded said list and intimated to the complainer that the respondent now resided in his parish, viz., at Ellerslie, Laurel Street, aforesaid, and reported to him in order that he might attend to the vaccination of said child in terms of said statute and the regulations of the Board of Supervision, now the Local Government Board, whereupon the complainer duly submitted said list and intimation to the Parish Council of Govan Combination, and said Parish Council, under the hand of the complainer as inspector of poor foresaid, issued on or about 10th May 1900 an order to Dr Gilbert Campbell, 12 Hamilton Crescent, Partick, the vaccinator appointed to the said Parish Council of Govan Combination, to vaccinate the said Evelyn Summers, and notice of such order, partly written and partly printed, was delivered at the house of the respondent on or about the 10th day of May 1900, and in pursuance of said order the said Dr Gilbert Campbell called on or about the 29th day of May 1900, at the house of the respondent situated at Ellerslie, Laurel Street aforesaid, in the parish of Govan Combination, for the purpose of vaccinating the said Evelyn Summers, but the respondent refused to allow such operation to be performed, notwithstanding the fact that the said Evelyn Summers had not previously been vaccinated, nor or mother or the persons having care of them; and in pursuance of such order the vaccinator shall vaccinate the persons named therein, or any of them, at any time not less than ten nor more than twenty days after the date of such notice, unless such persons shall previously have been vaccinated, and a certificate of their vaccination or insusceptibility shall have been transmitted to the registrar; and if any such person, or the parent or person having the care of any such child, shall refuse to allow such operation to be performed, he shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings, and failing payment to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding ten days."

Sec. 30—Inter alia, "The expression 'vaccinator' shall mean the medical practitioner appointed by any parish or combination to act as such in such parish or combination."

Article 7 of regulations, entitled "Proceedings under section 18 of the Vaccination Act" issued by the Board of Supervision, of date 15th December 1864, is in the following terms:—"If any child named in the registrar's list shall have left the parish for another known place of residence in Scotland before an order to vaccinate such child has been issued and executed, the inspector of the poor shall give immediate notice of the fact and of the circumstances connected therewith to the inspector of the parish to which such child shall have gone, whose duty it shall be to use all lawful endeavours to have the said child vaccinated, and a certificate of such child's vaccination transmitted to the registrar of the district within which the said child was born."

The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 58), sec. 21, enacts that "every reference in any Act of Parliament, scheme, deed, or instrument, to a parochial board . . . shall be read and construed as referring to a parish council . . ."

had a certificate of her successful vaccination or insusceptibility to the vaccine disease been sent to the registrar in terms of the said Act, nor has a certificate been yet transmitted to the said registrar," whereby the respondent was liable in the penalty specified.

The respondent objected to the relevancy of the complaint on the following grounds, as stated in the case for appeal after mentioned :— "(First) That when the Inspector of Poor of the parish of Glasgow received from the Registrar of Kelvin District of that parish the list, dated 22d February 1900, of the names and addresses of the persons who had failed to transmit to or to lodge with the said registrar a certificate of vaccination in terms of the said Vaccination (Scotland) Act, he should have submitted the said list to the Parish Council of Glasgow, who should have then issued an order to the vaccinator appointed by them to vaccinate the respondent's child, and have given notice in writing of such order to the respondent, as the father of said child; and in pursuance of such order the said vaccinator should have vaccinated, or should have offered to vaccinate, the said child, within the period, and all as prescribed by the said Act; and (second) that it was not competent for the Inspector of Poor of the parish of Glasgow, in respect of the regulations of the Local Government Board, issued under section 5 of the said Vaccination (Scotland) Act, or otherwise, to devolve these duties on the Parish Council of Govan on account of the respondent having removed from the parish of Glasgow to the parish of Govan, where he then was and still is resident; and (third) that the proceedings under the said Vaccination (Scotland) Act for prosecution of the respondent and recovery of penalties for failure to vaccinate should have been at the instance of the Inspector of the Parish Council of Glasgow."

On 20th September 1900 the Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) sustained the objections for the respondent, and dismissed the complaint.

The Inspector of Poor obtained a case for appeal. The case narrated the complaint, and set forth the objections for the respondent above quoted, and the following questions of law :—"(1) Whether, in view of the provisions of the Vaccination Act, and the regulations of the Local Government Board issued in the terms of section 5 of that Act, the proceedings for the vaccination of the respondent's child (after the registrar's list had been received by the Inspector of Poor of Glasgow) should have been taken by the Parish Council of Glasgow; or (2) Whether it was competent for that Council or their Inspector of Poor to send the said registrar's list and intimate the default of the respondent to the Inspector of Poor of the parish of Govan, and for the Govan Parish Council to adopt proceedings for the vaccination of the said child; and (3) Whether it was competent for the Inspector of Poor of the parish of Govan to prosecute the respondent for failure to vaccinate and recover the statutory penalty."

Argued for the appellant;—It was plain, from sections 1 and 30, that the vaccinator appointed to a particular parish could not act as such beyond the limits of that parish. This being so, no proceedings for the vaccination of the child could be taken at the instance of the Parish Council of Glasgow, and if the Sheriff-substitute was right, neither could the Parish Council of Govan take proceedings, so that the Act would be defeated in every case in which a child was removed from its parish of birth before an order to vaccinate was executed. By the Act vaccination was made compulsory in every case, and the method of carrying this out was merely executorial, so that it was within the powers of the Board of Supervision to make the regulations in question by which the procedure of section 18 of the Act was adapted to the case of the removal of the child from its parish of birth before it had been vaccinated. The proceedings in this case were taken in conformity with article 5 of these regulations, and could only be invalid on the ground that the regulation was ultra vires of the Board of Supervision. The regulations had been acted upon, and their validity never questioned, since 1864.

Argued for the respondent;—The offence here charged was a statutory offence, and unless the conditions required by the statute to constitute it were present there could be no contravention. The offence charged was under sections 8 and 18 of the statute. In the former section there was no provision as to criminal proceedings, so that the complaint in this case must stand or fall by section 18. Ex facie of the complaint the conditions of that section were not fulfilled. There was nothing in the section to authorise an inspector of poor to transmit a notice of failure to lodge a certificate of vaccination to the inspector of poor of another parish, or to authorise the latter to act upon such notice as if it had emanated from the registrar of a district within his own parish. All the steps prescribed for compulsory vaccination under the section were to be taken in the parish. If this were so, the regulations passed by the Board of Supervision could not be invoked to create a statutory offence where, apart from them, there would have been none. It was not necessary to say the regulations were ultra vires to all purposes, but certainly they were so if and so far as they created new offences. It was not the case that the purpose of the Act would be defeated if this view were sound, because the respondent would have been liable to a penalty of the same amount under section 17 as that imposed by section 18, if proceedings had been timeously taken under the former section.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-General.—The first question is, whether the proceedings for the vaccination of the respondent's child (after the registrar's list had been received by the Inspector of Poor of Glasgow) should have been taken by the Parish Council of Glasgow, and I am of opinion that this question should be answered in the negative. These proceedings could only have been taken by the Parish Council of Glasgow and their vaccinator exercising what may be termed an extra-territorial jurisdiction, which they do not appear to me to have any power, under the Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, to do. By section 1 of that Act the parochial board of every parish or combination of parishes in Scotland is required to appoint a registered medical practitioner or practitioners to be "the vaccinator or vaccinators within such parish or combination," and by section 30, the interpretation clause of the Act, it is declared that "the expression 'vaccinator' shall mean the medical practitioner appointed by any parish or combination to act as such in such parish or combination." The power of the vaccinator is therefore, in my judgment, confined to the parish or combination. It happens that in the present case the distance between the parishes is not great, but the principle involved is the same as if the parent of an unvaccinated child had moved, taking the child with him from a parish in the north to a parish in the south of Scotland.

had a certificate of her successful vaccination or insusceptibility to the vaccine disease been sent to the registrar in terms of the said Act, nor has a certificate been yet transmitted to the said registrar," whereby the respondent was liable in the penalty specified.

The respondent objected to the relevancy of the complaint on the following grounds, as stated in the case for appeal after mentioned :— "(First) That when the Inspector of Poor of the parish of Glasgow received from the Registrar of Kelvin District of that parish the list, dated 22d February 1900, of the names and addresses of the persons who had failed to transmit to or to lodge with the said registrar a certificate of vaccination in terms of the said Vaccination (Scotland) Act, he should have submitted the said list to the Parish Council of Glasgow, who should have then issued an order to the vaccinator appointed by them to vaccinate the respondent's child, and have given notice in writing of such order to the respondent, as the father of said child; and in pursuance of such order the said vaccinator should have vaccinated, or should have offered to vaccinate, the said child, within the period, and all as prescribed by the said Act; and (second) that it was not competent for the Inspector of Poor of the parish of Glasgow, in respect of the regulations of the Local Government Board, issued under section 5 of the said Vaccination (Scotland) Act, or otherwise, to devolve these duties on the Parish Council of Govan on account of the respondent having removed from the parish of Glasgow to the parish of Govan, where he then was and still is resident; and (third) that the proceedings under the said Vaccination (Scotland) Act for prosecution of the respondent and recovery of penalties for failure to vaccinate should have been at the instance of the Inspector of the Parish Council of Glasgow."

On 20th September 1900 the Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) sustained the objections for the respondent, and dismissed the complaint.

The Inspector of Poor obtained a case for appeal. The case narrated the complaint, and set forth the objections for the respondent above quoted, and the following questions of law :—"(1) Whether, in view of the provisions of the Vaccination Act, and the regulations of the Local Government Board issued in the terms of section 5 of that Act, the proceedings for the vaccination of the respondent's child (after the registrar's list had been received by the Inspector of Poor of Glasgow) should have been taken by the Parish Council of Glasgow; or (2) Whether it was competent for that Council or their Inspector of Poor to send the said registrar's list and intimate the default of the respondent to the Inspector of Poor of the parish of Govan, and for the Govan Parish Council to adopt proceedings for the vaccination of the said child; and (3) Whether it was competent for the Inspector of Poor of the parish of Govan to prosecute the respondent for failure to vaccinate and recover the statutory penalty."

it was within the powers of the Board of Supervision to make the regulations in question by which the procedure of section 18 of the Act was adapted to the case of the removal of the child from its parish of birth before it had been vaccinated. LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The first question is, whether the proceedings for the vaccination of the respondent's child (after the registrar's list had been received by the Inspector of Poor of Glasgow) should have been taken by the Parish Council of Glasgow, and I am of opinion that this question should be answered in the negative. These proceedings could only have been taken by the Parish Council of Glasgow and their vaccinator exercising what may be termed an extra-territorial jurisdiction, which they do not appear to me to have any power, under the Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, to do. Wallace v. Summers.

The second question is, whether it was competent for the Parish Council of Glasgow or their Inspector of Poor to send the registrar's list and intimate the default of the respondent to the Inspector of Poor of the parish of Govan, and for the Govan Parish Council to adopt proceedings for the vaccination of the child,—and the answer to this question appears to me to depend upon the construction and effect of section 5 of the Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, and of No. 7 of the Regulations made and issued by the Board of Supervision on 15th December 1864. Section 5 of the Act provides that parochial boards, vaccinators, and other officers engaged in the administration of the laws for the relief of the poor in any parish or combination "shall, in the exercise of the functions conferred upon them by this Act, conform to the regulations which may from time to time be issued by the Board of Supervision in relation thereto, which regulations the Board of Supervision is hereby authorised and required to make and issue." The power, and indeed the duty, to make regulations is here expressed in large language, and seems to me to authorise such regulations as are contained in No. 7, which requires that "if any child named in the registrar's list shall have left the parish for another known place of residence in Scotland before an order to vaccinate such child has been issued and executed, the inspector of the poor shall give immediate notice of the fact and of the circumstances connected therewith to the inspector of the parish to which such child shall have gone, whose duty it shall be to use all lawful endeavours to have the said child vaccinated, and a certificate of such child's vaccination transmitted to the registrar of the district within which the said child was born." The normal case provided for by section 18 of the Act is that in which the parent and child are still in the parish or combination in which the child was born, and the inspector on receiving the list from the registrar has to lay it before the parochial board of that parish or combination, who thereupon issue the order to the vaccinator to vaccinate the persons named in the list. The section does not expressly provide for the case of a child having "with its parents removed to another parish or combination," and I think that this is just the kind of case which would naturally and adequately be provided for by regulations made under section 5. If this were not so, the Act would in many cases become a dead letter. Regulation No. 7 appears to me to supply the machinery for carrying out the provisions of the Act in such a case, and I consider that it authorised the course which was adopted in this case. The regulation has now been in operation for more than thirty-six years, and this is the first occasion, so far as I am aware, upon which either the power of the Board of Supervision to make it, or its applicability to such a case as the present, has been called in question. It would require some strong reasons to induce us to disregard or set aside a manifestly advantageous regulation which had been acted upon for so long a time.

The third question is, whether it was competent for the Inspector of Poor for the parish of Govan to prosecute the respondent for failure to vaccinate, and recover the statutory penalty, and for the reasons already given, I consider that this question should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD ADAM and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Answer the first question in the case in the negative and the second and third questions in the affirmative: Sustain the appeal; reverse the determination of the Sheriff-substitute, and remit to him to proceed, and decern." Complaint—Relevancy—Specification—Statutory Offence—Specification of sections of statute constituting offence—Public-House—Breach of certificate—Home Drummond Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. cap. 58), sec. 23.—A summary complaint set forth that the accused, "who holds a certificate for the sale of exciseable liquors at" a hotel specified "has been guilty of an offence against the laws for the regulation of public-houses in Scotland, in so far as he did between 1 and 2 o'clock in the morning" of a day specified "sell or give out from the said hotel" certain quantities of whisky to certain persons named.

Held, on appeal, that the complaint was irrelevant, in respect that it neither alleged that the things said to have been done by the accused were done in contravention of his certificate, nor specified any section or sections of the Public-Houses (Scotland) Acts as having been contravened.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Ld. Kyllachy. Lord Low.

ON 5th November 1900 Frederick Harold Rule, hotel-keeper, Mar Hotel, Alloa, was charged in the Police Court at Alloa, on a summary complaint at the instance of Charles Thomson, burgh prosecutor. The complaint set forth as follows:—

"That Frederick Harold Rule, hotel-keeper, residing at the Mar Hotel, Shore, in the burgh of Alloa, who holds a certificate for the sale of exciseable liquors at the Mar Hotel aforesaid, has been guilty of an offence against the laws for the regulation of public-houses in Scotland, in so far as he did, between 1 and 2 of the clock in the morning of Tuesday, 16th October 1900, or about that time, sell or give out from the said Mar Hotel to" three men named and designed as residing at places specified in Alloa, "or one or more of them, a quantity or quantities of spirits, being whisky, and such offence is the first offence.

"May it therefore please your honours to grant warrant to officers of law to summon the said Frederick Harold Rule to appear before the magistrate officiating in the Police Court of the said burgh, to answer to this complaint, and to be dealt with in terms of the Public-House Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, and the Acts therein recited."

Rule objected to the relevancy of the complaint on the following grounds:—"1. The offence is not a common law one, and no statute is specified as having been contravened. 2. It is not stated that the persons alleged to have been supplied were not travellers or persons requiring to lodge in the premises, and if they were such persons, no offence was committed under the certificate."

The Magistrates repelled the objections, and found the complaint relevant.

Rule having pleaded not guilty, evidence was led. Thereafter the Magistrates pronounced a conviction and sentence in the following sarily mean the person in whom the technical right of property in the nets is vested.

The meaning of the statute in my judgment is that the person against whom proceedings are to be taken shall not be, e.g., a servant fishing in the employment of another, but the person who has lawful possession and control of the nets, whether he is technically the proprietor of them or not. Accordingly, I am of opinion that it is not necessary to a good complaint that it shall state who is the owner. To put a strict construction on the term "owner" would be to render the section almost nugatory, for it would place an onus on the prosecutor which in many cases it might be impossible to discharge. Although the prosecutor might not know who the owner of the nets was, the person who had been using them and was prosecuted would know, and if a plea of this kind was to be set up, the proper time to state it would be when the proceedings were instituted.

2. It was objected that something is alleged in this complaint which is not an offence, viz., that fishing had been practised, and sixty-four fish of the salmon kind had been taken and killed. The Act, it was urged, did not make this an offence, the offence struck at being the placing or using of fixed engines. As I read the complaint, however, the substantive charge is the placing and using nets for the purpose specified, and the statement that sixty-four fish were taken and killed, though it may have been unnecessary, is merely an amplification of the statement that the net was used.

3. It was next objected that the complaint did not sufficiently specify the date of the offence, as it was essential that the accused should know whether he was charged with committing the offence during the whole time between 2d July and 8th August, or merely on one or more days during that period. The complaint states very plainly that the offence was committed between 2d July and 8th August, and inasmuch as the offence is alleged to have been committed by means of fixed engines, the natural, if not the only reasonable, meaning is that the nets were used continuously throughout the period between the dates mentioned, i.e., twenty-nine days in July and seven in August.

4. The next objection was that two enactments are, as it was said, mixed up—the offence and the penalty being taken from the English Act, and the procedure from the Scotch Act of 1862. The two Acts were passed in the same session of Parliament, and they are plainly parts of one scheme of legislation. Section 33 of the Scotch Act simply applies the rules as to the use of fixed engines, which under the English Statute hold for the southern shore of the Solway, to the north shore of the Solway, and the rivers flowing into it there. There might otherwise have been difficulties as to jurisdiction, and the offence and penalty created by the English Act are carried over to the north side by the Scotch Act, and the machinery of prosecution is Scotch.

5. The next objection to the conviction, in respect that it adjudges the modified penalty to be paid to the Clerk of Court instead of to the Clerk of the Fishery Board. The objection is based on section 32 of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, which provides that "the penalties incurred under this Act shall in all prosecutions at the instance of the clerk of any District Board be payable to and recoverable by such clerk." It is noteworthy that this provision, as the rest of the section shews, applies not only to penalty but also to expenses. The direction in the conviction that the penalty shall be paid to the Clerk of Court does not imply that he is to keep the money. It is a direction for the convenience of the accused person, enabling him to pay the money at once to the Clerk of Court, instead of having to search out the prosecutor, the Clerk of the District Board, who may live many miles away. The Clerk of Court is merely a stakeholder, his duty being to hand over the money to the person entitled to it, the Clerk of the District Board.

6. The last objection is founded upon an alleged rejection of evidence. It is material to observe the statements of the complainer on which this objection is based. These statements are as follows:—"During the conduct of the trial the witnesses Archibald Fisher and David Fisher produced in evidence a note-book which contained entries shewing the extent of their business, and the witness George Jackson produced in evidence and gave evidence as regards a plan shewing the locus. These productions have not been noted, as they should have been, under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts." The expression "produced in evidence" is not a technical expression, and from the explanation given at the bar it appears that the witnesses mentioned, when giving evidence, produced a book and refreshed their memory by referring to it. It was a business-book, not a probative document. Its only use was to afford means of giving weight to the parole evidence. It is not the practice of witnesses to put in documents. That falls to be done by the party or his agent. We are told that the witness laid the book on the table, where it was left. But that is not enough. In order to make a relevant averment it would have been necessary to state that, the party having by his agent asked that the document should be received and made part of the process, the Sheriff refused to allow it to be received. The same observations apply to the plan. No motion appears to have been made that it should be received in evidence. Further, it was not a case where the exact locus was of importance, e.g., a case of distinguishing between sea and river, and if it had been the plan would not have proved the locus.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion.

As to the objection based on the procedure at the trial, viz., that certain books produced in evidence were not noted as is required under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, the Act provides merely that a note should be taken of any documentary evidence that may be "put in." A witness may refer to documents merely to refresh his memory, and may take them away. It is not necessary that a document should be noted unless it is put in process, and with the producing of evidence in process the witness has nothing to do. That is the business of the parties, or the agents of the parties. It is not said here that either the books or the plan were put in or tendered as evidence.

The objections founded on the terms of the complaint are equally unsubstantial. It is said that the time referred to in the complaint is ambiguous, inasmuch as it may mean during the whole time or on one or more days during the time. I read the complaint as clearly meaning that the acts

ARTHUR GREIG AND OTHERS, Applicants.—Watt, K.C.—Burt.

Appeal—Stated Case—Statutory conditions of obtaining case—Power to dispense with fulfilment of conditions—Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 3.—Persons who had been convicted on a summary complaint in a Police Court presented a note for an order on the Magistrate to state and sign a case for appeal. The respondent (the prosecutor) objected that it was incompetent for the Magistrate to state and sign a case in respect that the applicants had not lodged a bond of caution or made consignation and had not paid the Clerk of Court's fees within three days of the date of the conviction, as required by sec. 3 of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875. It appeared that the applicants' law-agent had done everything in his power to find the Magistrate and the Clerk of Court within the three days, but without success.

The Court, in the special circumstances, pronounced an order on the Magistrate to state and sign a case for appeal.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-General.
Ld. Kyllachy.
Lord Low.

THIS was a note presented to the High Court of Justiciary by Arthur Greig, butcher, Foulford Road, Cowdenbeath, and eight other persons, who had, on 23d November 1900, been convicted in the Police Court at Cowdenbeath, by Bailie Andrew Wilson, on a charge of theft (in which James Finlay, sergeant of police, acted as prosecutor), and fined 2s. 6d. each.

The note stated that Bailie Wilson had refused to state and sign a case for appeal against the conviction, and prayed for an order on him and on Finlay to shew cause why a case should not be stated in terms of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875.*

* The Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62), enacts :—

Sec. 3. "On an inferior Judge hearing and determining any cause, either party to the cause may, if dissatisfied with the Judge's determination as erroneous in point of law, appeal thereagainst. . . . by himself or his agent applying in writing within three days after such determination to the inferior Judge to state and sign a case, setting forth the facts and the grounds of such determination, for the opinion thereon of a superior Court of law as hereinafter provided ; and on any such application being made, the following provisions shall have effect," inter alia—

"(1) The appellant shall not be entitled to have a case stated and delivered to him unless within the said three days he shall—

"(1) Lodge in the hands of the Clerk of Court a bond with sufficient cautioner for answering and abiding by the judgment of the superior Court in the appeal and paying the costs should any be awarded by that Court, or otherwise, in the discretion of the inferior Judge, shall consign in the hands of the Clerk of Court such sum as may be fixed by

Greig v. Finlay.

According to the statements in the note the alleged theft consisted in the applicants' leaving a restaurant without paying for suppers which had been supplied to them at a cost of 3d. each. They stated that one of their number was about to pay for the suppers when a quarrel arose in the restaurant, in consequence of which they left, and through inadvertence omitted to make payment; that payment was made two days afterwards; and that the charge of theft was not preferred against them until some days later.

The reasons stated in the note for granting the order craved were as follows:—"(1) On the day of the trial, and after the conviction of the appellants, their law-agent wrote to the Clerk of Court for a copy of the complaint and deliverances thereon. These were never sent. The law-agent had previously in Court verbally required that a case should be stated, and that his objections to the conduct of the case should be recorded. Since the copy complaint and deliverances were not forthcoming, the law-agent of the appellants wrote a letter on the 26th November 1900 to the inferior Judge, the said Andrew Wilson, requiring him to state and sign a case, on the grounds, inter alia, that the complaint was not relevant, and that the facts proved did not amount to theft, and did not warrant a conviction. On the same date the said law-agent also wrote to the Clerk of Court intimating the demand he had made upon the inferior Judge. The appellants' law-agent, who is in practice in Dunfermline, took the train to Cowdenbeath and called on the Clerk of Court, but found he had gone to Lassodie on business—a place some miles distant, and with no train or 'bus connection with Cowdenbeath—and was not to return until late in the evening. The appellants' law-agent had gone to Cowdenbeath for the express purpose of fulfilling all the requirements of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875. Finding that the Clerk of Court was not to be found, he called upon the said Andrew Wilson, but found that he too was from home. He left the letter at the house of the said Andrew Wilson, requiring a case to be stated, and added a postscript that he had called on the Clerk of Court, but found him out, and that he was prepared to find caution or consignation, whichever he preferred. He also added a postscript to his letter to the Clerk of Court to the same effect. If there was any failure to comply with the requirements of said Act, it was in no way due to the fault of the appellants. (2) On the facts stated the application was not frivolous, as the conviction was bad, and involved a slur upon the characters of the appellants, some of whom are in responsible positions. (3) Caution has been found, and the clerk's fees have now been paid."

Argued for the applicants;—It was an implied condition of the requirements of section 3 of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, that the Magistrate and the Clerk of Court should be reasonably accessible, and the applicants, through their agent, having done all that was in their power to fulfil these requirements, they were the inferior Judge to meet the penalty awarded, if any, and the said costs of the superior Court.

"(2) Pay the Clerk of Court his fees for preparing the case."

Sec. 5. "When an inferior Judge shall refuse to state and sign a case the appellant may within three days of such refusal apply by a written note to the superior Court to which the case would, if stated and signed, have to be transmitted under this Act, for an order on such Judge and on the other party to shew cause why a case should not be stated. . . ."

entitled to have a case stated.[1] It was impossible to fulfil the statutory requirements in the absence both of the Magistrate and the Clerk. The facts proved at the trial plainly did not amount to theft.

Argued for the respondent (Finlay);—The requirements of the statute were imperative, and the Court had no power to dispense with fulfilment of them[2]; the bond of caution might have been left in the Clerk of Court's office with his fees. On the facts stated in the note no question of law was raised; the Court therefore would not order a case to be stated.[3]

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—We do not require to form any opinion as to the probable fate of a stated case,—i.e., as to whether this conviction was right or wrong,—but merely to determine whether a case should be stated to give the appellants a chance to be heard. The statute prescribes certain conditions which require to be fulfilled in order to entitle a party to demand a stated case, and it enacts that an appellant shall not be entitled to have a case stated unless he complies with these conditions. If these conditions can in no circumstances be dispensed with or modified the appellants must fail. But I apprehend that if a person has done all that it was possible for him to do towards fulfilling the requirements of the statute, and if from certain classes of circumstances over which he had no control he has failed to fulfil these conditions, he may be entitled to have a case stated. What did the appellants do towards complying with these conditions? On the day of the trial, and after the conviction of the appellants, their law-agent wrote to the Clerk of Court asking for a copy of the complaint and deliverances thereon. These, for some reason unexplained, were never sent. Next the law-agent of the appellants, on 26th November, wrote a letter to the Magistrate requiring him to state and sign a case. On the same day the law-agent also wrote to the Clerk of Court intimating the demand which he had made upon the Magistrate, and his efforts did not stop there. He took the train to Cowdenbeath and called on the Clerk of Court, but ascertained that he had gone to Lassodie. When the Clerk of Court could not be found, the agent called on the Magistrate, but learned that he also was from home. The failure of the appellants to comply with the conditions precedent to obtaining a case thus resulted from the fact that neither the Clerk of Court nor the Magistrate could be found. We must take it that the agent went prepared to fulfil all the conditions required by the statute—either to lodge a bond of caution with the Clerk of Court, or otherwise to consign in the hands of the Clerk of Court. It is noteworthy that the alternative of lodging a bond of caution or of consigning is in the discretion of the Magistrate, and the amount to be consigned is also fixed by the Magistrate. But as the Magistrate could not be found, his decision could not be obtained upon either of these points. Again, how could money be consigned in the hands of the Clerk of Court when he could not be found? I consider that when all these things were done with the view to obtaining a case, it would be oppressive so to construe the statute that the appellants, who appear to be law-abiding citizens of Cowdenbeath and the neighbourhood, should be precluded from obtaining a stated case. I may add that if the appellants' statement of what occurred is correct, there was no theft, but the Magistrate will doubtless be careful accurately to state the facts when giving a case.

Greig v. Finlay.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I should be sorry to decide anything tending to relax the restrictions by which the right of appeal is in these cases fenced, and there is, of course, no doubt that within three days after the conviction certain requirements must be fulfilled by the convicted person who desires to have a case stated. But the requirements so presented are obviously of such a nature that they cannot be fulfilled if neither the Magistrate nor the Clerk of Court can be found. Accordingly it is, I am disposed to think, an implied condition of the statutory requirements that during the three days the Magistrate and Clerk shall be reasonably accessible, at least that they shall be so during business hours. Upon the facts stated, and not disputed, I am of opinion that the agent for these men made reasonable efforts to find the Magistrate and the Clerk, and failed to find either of them.

That, I think, is a sufficient ground for making the order which is here sought.

LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion. The substantial accuracy of the statements of the appellants in this note is not disputed. The important fact is, that on 26th November the appellants' agent went personally to Cowdenbeath with the object of there and then complying with the statutory conditions. There is no reason for supposing that if he had found the Magistrate or the Clerk of Court all the statutory conditions would not have been complied with. As a matter of fact he could find neither of them, as they were both away from home. I therefore think that the appellants' agent did all that he could be reasonably expected to do in order to comply with the statutory requirements, and he was unable to effect his purpose simply because it was impossible, owing to circumstances beyond his control, to do so. In these circumstances I think that it is clear that the appellants cannot be held to have lost their right to have a case stated, and in so holding I do not think that we are going in any way contrary to the authorities which have been cited.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Order the inferior Judge, Andrew Wilson, to state and sign a case in terms of the statute, and decern."

478—Reformatory Schools Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. 117), sec. 14.—The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 478, gives a person charged upon a complaint under the Act right to have the hearing adjourned for a period of forty-eight hours, if a copy of the complaint has not been delivered to him personally forty-eight hours before the hearing.

A boy, thirteen years and eleven months old, was charged in Fraserburgh Police Court with theft upon a complaint under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. His father was dead, but his mother was alive. She was resident in Aberdeen, but a maternal uncle of the boy's lived in Fraserburgh. A week before the trial the boy and his uncle were informed by the police that they were making investigations with a view to bringing the charge. The boy was apprehended on the morning of the trial. A copy of the complaint had not previously been delivered to him or to anyone on his behalf. The uncle, having been informed by the police of the boy's apprehension, and of the hour at which the trial would take place, was present in Court when the case was called. No intimation of the boy's apprehension was sent to his mother. The boy pleaded guilty, and was convicted and ordered to be detained in a reformatory school for three years. The Magistrate did not inform the boy of his right, under the Act, to an adjournment. The boy, with consent of his mother, brought a suspension on the grounds that the Magistrate ought to have adjourned the case, and that the order for detention in a reformatory school was illegal, having been pronounced without notice to the mother. In the bill the boy stated that his uncle had requested that the case should be adjourned, in order that he might obtain a law-agent, and that this request had been opposed by the prosecutor and refused by the Magistrate. The prosecutor denied these statements. He averred further that the boy's mother had died since the bringing of the suspension. At the hearing the boy's counsel stated that he did not desire an inquiry into the facts.

Suspension refused, the Court holding that under section 478 of the Burgh Police Act (Scotland) Act, 1892, there was no absolute duty on the Magistrate to inform the accused of his right to an adjournment, and that, in the circumstances, there was no ground for suspending the conviction.

High Court. Lord Justice-General. Ld. Kyllachy. Lord Low.

On 22d November 1900 John Byth Taylor, factory worker, 1 Charlotte Street, Fraserburgh, a pupil, aged thirteen years and eleven months, was charged in the Police Court at Fraserburgh, on a summary complaint under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, at the instance of the Burgh Prosecutor, setting forth that the accused had stolen £3 from a dwelling-house in Fraserburgh.

He pleaded guilty, and the Magistrate pronounced the following conviction and sentence:—"The Magistrate, in respect of the judicial confession of the within-designed John Byth Taylor, finds the said John Byth Taylor, aged thirteen years and eleven months, guilty of the crime of theft, and therefore orders him to be sent to the Rossie Reformatory School for Boys, Montrose, being a certified reformatory school under the Act 29 and 30 Victoria, c. 117, the managers whereof are willing to receive him, there to be detained for a period of three years, and grants warrant for transmitting and detaining him there accordingly: Finds that the said John Byth Taylor is a Protestant."

Taylor, with consent of his mother as his guardian and tutor-at-law, presented a bill of suspension.

The complainer stated;—(Stat. 1) "On or about 14th November 1900 the complainer was arrested by the police in Fraserburgh upon an alleged charge of stealing £3. . . ." (Stat. 2) "The complainer is a pupil. His father . . . is dead. His mother, who is his sole guardian and tutor-at-law, resides at No. 15 Richmond Street, Aberdeen. The complainer has an uncle, Abercrombie Bogue Davidson, a brother of his mother, residing in Fraserburgh. The police and the respondent knew of the places of abode of the complainer's mother and uncle respectively."

The respondent (the Burgh Prosecutor) lodged answers. He did not dispute the substantial accuracy of the foregoing averments, with the exception of the averment that the police knew the address of the complainer's mother. He stated that she had died since the bringing of the bill of suspension.

The complainer made the following further averments, and the respondent the following answers thereto:—

(Stat. 3) "Upon the date of complainer's arrest as aforesaid, the complainer's said uncle heard thereof, and immediately went to the police-office and made inquiries, and thereupon called for and consulted John Leslie M'Callum, solicitor, of Robert Anderson & Company, solicitors, Fraserburgh. Mr M'Callum then took charge of the complainer's interests."

(Stat. 4) "The complainer's agent accompanied the complainer's said uncle to the police-office upon the same day, and informed the police that he was attending to the complainer's interests. The police then stated that the complainer had been released, as the information against him was not sufficient. The police also informed the complainer's agent, in presence of his uncle, at the same time, that in the event of the complainer being again apprehended in connection with the said charge he would receive immediate intimation from them of that fact."

(Stat. 5) "That on the morning of 22d November 1900, and about half-past nine, the complainer, without any previous warning, was reapprehended by the police and brought before James Mitchell, as one of the Magistrates of the burgh of Fraserburgh, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon of the same day, on the charge already mentioned."

(Stat. 7) "Notwithstanding the said undertaking of the police, no intimation of any kind was sent by the police or by the respondent to the complainer's agent of the fact of his reapprehension. No intimation thereof was made to his mother, his legal guardian. Apart from any undertaking, it was the duty of the respondent to communicate with the complainer's mother."

The respondent, in his Answers 3, 4, 5, and 7, admitted that complainer's uncle and Mr M'Callum called at the police-office on the day of the first apprehension. He did not dispute that the complainer had then been released. He denied that the police gave any undertaking that they would communicate with Mr M'Callum in the event of the complainer being reapprehended. He admitted that the complainer was reapprehended on the morning of 22d November, and that no intimation of the reapprehension was sent to Mr M'Callum or to the complainer's mother. "The complainer had deserted his home, and the police did not know where his mother resided."

(Stat. 8) "No copy of the said complaint was served on or delivered to the complainer, or delivered to anyone on his behalf." (Ans. 8) "Admitted. Explained that both the complainer and the said Abercrombie Bogue Davidson were perfectly acquainted with the nature of the charge."

(Stat. 9) "That about half-past ten o'clock upon said date the respondent sent an officer of the Court to the complainer's uncle, the said Abercrombie Bogue Davidson, with a verbal intimation that complainer was to be brought before the Court that day at eleven o'clock. Upon learning at the Court that the complainer was being prosecuted, and finding that the complainer's agent was not present, the complainer's said uncle inquired of the police whether complainer's agent had received intimation of complainer's reapprehension, and he was informed that such intimation had not been sent. The complainer's said uncle then went for complainer's agent, and not being able to find him at the time, returned to the Court and requested the said Magistrate to adjourn the case until such short space of time as would enable him to arrange for the attendance of the complainer's said solicitor at the Court. His attendance could have been secured within half an hour. The respondent opposed this request, and the said Magistrate refused it." (Ans. 9) "Admitted that intimation was sent to the said Abercrombie Bogue Davidson that the complainer was to be brought before the Court and charged with the theft at eleven o'clock on said 22d November. Said intimation was sent at ten o'clock in the morning. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the said Abercrombie Bogue Davidson attended the Court, and before the complaint was read . . . stated that the boy had got beyond the control of his parents and that he and the said Mr M'Callum had been endeavouring to get him sent to the 'Mars' training ship. On the suggestion of the burgh prosecutor the hearing of the case was delayed that Mr Davidson might go for Mr M'Callum. Mr Davidson left the Court for that purpose, and after being absent for about a quarter of an hour, he returned and stated that Mr M'Callum could not be found."

(Stat. 10) "Thereupon the complainer was asked to plead guilty, and he did so in the absence of his law-agent, and without any opportunity being afforded him of getting legal advice." (Ans. 10) "Admitted that the complainer pled guilty. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the complaint was read over to the complainer in the usual way, and the question was put to him by the Magistrate, 'Are you guilty or not guilty?' and the complainer answered 'Guilty.'"

(Stat. 13) "That after the complainer had pled guilty as aforesaid, the respondent moved the Court to convict the complainer of said charge and to send him to a reformatory. Whereupon the complainer's said uncle objected to this course, and again requested an adjournment until an opportunity had been given to obtain the services of the complainer's said law-agent. The respondent opposed the granting of this request, and the said Magistrate, declining to grant it, there and then ordered the complainer to be sent to Rossie Reformatory School for Boys, Montrose, and to be detained there for three years." (Ans. 13) "Denied. Explained that after the complainer had pleaded guilty the said Abercrombie Bogue Davidson repeated the statement which he had previously made about the complainer having got beyond the control of his parents and friends, and that he and Mr M'Callum had been endeavouring to get him sent to the 'Mars' training ship. No adjournment was asked for, nor was it even suggested that the case should be adjourned. The respondent then addressed the Court, and confirmed what had been stated by the said Abercrombie Bogue Davidson as to the complainer's habits and conduct, and, as the best method of dealing with the complainer, he suggested that he should be sent to a reformatory under section 2 of the Reformatories Schools Act, 1893. The said Abercrombie Bogue Davidson did not state any objection to the respondent's suggestion being followed. . . ." The respondent further stated that the complainer had previously been convicted of theft.

The complainer stated that he was not guilty of the offence charged.

The complainer, founding on the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, section 478,* and the Reformatory Schools Act, 1866,[1] pleaded; —(1) The whole proceedings complained of being illegal, unjust, and oppressive, the same ought to be set aside, with expenses. (2) The presiding magistrate having wrongfully declined to adjourn the hearing of the case when requested by or on behalf of the complainer to do so, the procedure subsequent thereto is inept, and falls to be quashed. (3) Separatim, the order for detention of the complainer in a reformatory being in violation of the provisions of the statute thereanent, the same should be suspended in any event.

The respondent pleaded;—(1) The proceedings complained of having been regular and legal in all respects, and the complainer having been validly convicted, the suspension should be refused with expenses. (2) The complainer's statements, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the suspension should be refused.

At the hearing counsel for the complainer stated that he did not ask for an inquiry into the truth of the facts in dispute.

Argued for the complainer;—Under section 478 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, the terms of which were similar to those of section 11 of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, the complainer had a right to an adjournment of forty-eight hours, and the Magistrate, in not informing him of this right, had acted oppressively, entitling the complainer to have the conviction suspended.[2] Apart from that the whole circumstances disclosed a case of undue haste amounting to oppression.[3] The fact that the complainer had pleaded guilty was not a bar to suspension.[4] Further, the order sending the complainer to a reformatory was illegal, there being no notice to the complainer's mother, and a sentence of imprisonment not having been pronounced on him.[5]

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 478, enacts,—"Any person brought before the Court by a warrant of apprehension, or under the authority of this Act, shall be entitled to require a copy of the complaint, and also to require that the hearing shall be adjourned for a period of not less than forty-eight hours; and such requisitions shall be complied with if made before the examination of any witness on the merits shall have commenced; but no such requisition shall be competent where a copy of the complaint, or a summons stating the nature of the charge, shall have been delivered to the accused personally forty-eight hours before the hearing."

Taylor v. Tarras.

The argument for the respondent sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Judges.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The points raised in this case resolve themselves into two. First, whether there was any statutory obligation, or any obligation resulting from the decisions of this Court, requiring the Magistrate to inform the accused that under the provisions of section 478 of the Burgh Police Act he was entitled to demand an adjournment of at least forty-eight hours; and second, whether, apart from such statutory obligation, there was such haste and want of opportunity to prepare the defence that it would not be safe to allow the conviction and sentence to stand.

On the first point it seems to me to be clear that there was no statutory obligation on the Magistrate to inform the accused of his rights under section 478.

The section gives to the accused a right to require an adjournment, but it does not in terms impose any obligation upon the Magistrate to inform the accused of the right so conferred. It is a different question whether under certain circumstances it may become the duty of the Magistrate to do what he is not required by the statute to do, and I quite agree in what has been said in the decisions to which we were referred as to its being the duty of the Magistrate under certain circumstances to inform the accused of his statutory right to adjournment, especially if there was any danger of injustice being done by undue haste. But the decisions do not seem to me to go any further than this, and if this be so, I quite agree with the law laid down in them.

But the case before us raises no such special circumstances. The accused was a boy who had previously been convicted of theft and was in danger of becoming a habitual thief; he had broken loose from parental control, and was apparently living on his wits. The charge was not suddenly sprung upon him. A week before the trial both the boy and his uncle, who shewed a most commendable interest in him, were informed by the police that they were making investigations with a view to bringing the charge. Ample time was thus given to communicate with a solicitor and to prepare a defence, if any defence was possible. The police authorities seem further to have fully acted up to their understanding with the boy's uncle and to have duly informed him when the boy was about to be brought to trial. At the uncle's request the case was continued to allow him to obtain the services of his solicitor. He went, and came back saying the solicitor was not to be found. No further adjournment was asked for, and none was given. The charge was then read over to the boy, and the Magistrate asked him if he was guilty or not guilty, and the boy then pleaded "Guilty." It appears to me that a wholly different question might have arisen if the boy had pleaded "Not guilty." If in that case delay was requisite to enable him to prepare his defence and obtain witnesses or procure legal assistance, a wholly different duty might have lain on the Magistrate. But I cannot see in the present case what good an adjournment could have done. The boy required no legal advice to answer what he knew better than anyone else—whether he was guilty or not guilty. He answered that he was guilty, and there is no reason to doubt that this answer was true. No delay was necessary in such circumstances.

As to the part of the sentence which directs that the boy should be sent to a reformatory, I did not understand the suspender's counsel to formulate any separate legal proposition in regard to it. To be sent to a reformatory seems to me to be in the circumstances the best thing that could have happened to the boy. We are told that his mother has died since these proceedings began, and that his uncle has not offered to receive him into his home. Accordingly, if we were to sustain this suspension we would practically turn the poor boy adrift upon the streets, whereas under the education and discipline of the reformatory school it is to be hoped that he may ultimately become a useful member of society.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the suspension should be refused.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I agree. I think it might have been better if there had been an adjournment, at least to the following day. But when we are asked to hold that the failure to inform the accused of his right to ask for an adjournment is per se a sufficient ground for upsetting this conviction, that raises another question. I am not prepared to affirm generally the existence of any such duty as is alleged. With respect to the circumstances of this particular case, all I need say is, that I do not consider that the circumstances involve any case of oppression or any failure of justice.

LORD LOW.—I have experienced considerable difficulty in this case. If the suspender's counsel had taken their stand upon the averments made in the bill of suspension and offered to establish them, it would have been very difficult in my opinion for the Court to do otherwise than remit the case for a report on the facts.

The statement for the suspender sets forth that the boy's uncle, finding that his law-agent was not present in Court, went to bring him, and not being able to find him, returned to the Court and requested the Magistrate "to adjourn the case until such short space of time as would enable him to arrange for the attendance of his solicitor. His attendance could have been secured within half an hour. The respondent opposed this request and the said Magistrate refused it." Further, it is stated that after the boy had pleaded guilty, and the prosecutor had moved for sentence, the uncle intervened and again requested an adjournment "until an opportunity had been given to obtain the services of his law-agent. The respondent opposed the granting of this request, and the Magistrate, declining to grant it, there and then" pronounced the sentence complained of. If these statements had been substantiated they would undoubtedly have raised a very serious question. But the suspender's counsel stated that they did not ask for an inquiry into the facts, and that being so we have been left to gather the facts from the statements made in the pleadings and by counsel, and I have no doubt that we now know with sufficient accuracy what admittedly took place. I need not recapitulate the circumstances, because they have been fully stated by your Lordship in the chair, and I entirely agree in the conclusion at which you have arrived.

It cannot be said that any positive rule was violated in the conduct of this case, but an appeal was made to the discretion of the Court on the ground that matters were conducted with such undue haste as to amount to a denial of justice.

The apprehension and trial, however, did not really come as a surprise either to the accused or to his uncle, because they had known for some days that the police were investigating a charge of theft against the lad, and that if they found sufficient evidence he would be put upon trial. In the interval the law-agent was consulted, and the only thing which seems to have been suggested was that the lad should be got into the "Mars" training ship. There is no doubt that he has been guilty of dishonesty, and if the sentence was to be set aside, and he were to be now again thrown upon the world, one would not have much hope of his future, whereas if he is detained for some years in a reformatory school he may then begin life afresh with the prospect of leading an honest life.

THE COURT refused the bill.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-General.
Ld. Kyllachy.
Lord Low.

ON 15th November 1900 Andrew Gardner, 119 High Street, Linlithgow, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Linlithgow, on a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, at the instance of Richard Bremridge, Registrar under the Pharmacy Acts, 1852 and 1868, in name and by authority of the Council of the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain, with the concurrence of William H. Henderson, Procurator-fiscal of the county of Linlithgow. The complaint set forth that the accused "has been guilty of an offence within the meaning of the 1st and 15th sections of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, in so far as on or about the 3d day of November 1900, or on one or more of the days of said month, the said Andrew Gardner, not being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist, or a chemist and druggist within the meaning of the said recited Act, and in or near the shop or premises at No. 67 High Street, Linlithgow, unlawfully, and contrary to the 1st and 15th sections of the said recited Act, did sell by retail to John Rutherford Hill, residing at No. 36 York Place, Edinburgh, a poison within the meaning of the said recited Act, to wit, a quantity of opium which at the time when sold by the said Andrew Gardner to the said John Rutherford Hill, as aforesaid, formed an ingredient in a quantity of laudanum or tincture of opium sold by the said Andrew Gardner to the said John Rutherford Hill, whereby the said Andrew Gardner became liable in a penalty of £5 sterling, and failing payment of the penalty imposed, to imprisonment in terms of sections 6 and 8 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881."

Gardner pleaded guilty.

The Sheriff-substitute (Macleod) pronounced the following conviction and sentence:—"In respect of the judicial confession of the said Andrew Gardner, convicted and hereby convicts the said Andrew Gardner of the offence charged, and therefore adjudged and hereby adjudges him to forfeit and pay the sum of Two pounds of modified penalty, with the sum of One pound two shillings of expenses, and in default of immediate payment thereof, granted and grants warrant for recovery of the said sum by poinding of his goods and effects, and summary sale thereof on the expiration of not less than forty-eight hours after such poinding, without further notice or warrant, and appointed and hereby appoints a return or execution of such poinding and sale to be made within 8 days from this date, under certification of imprisonment for the period of 3 days in default of payment or recovery of the said sums, with the expenses of diligence before the time allowed for such report."

Gardner brought a suspension.

The grounds of suspension, and the statutes on which the questions turned, are sufficiently set forth in the opinion of the Lord Justice-General.[1]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—(After narrating the conviction)—The complainer maintained that the sentence is bad, upon the ground that it authorised imprisonment, and alternatively that it does not as a preliminary require execution by arrestment as well as by poinding.

He admitted that prior to the abolition of imprisonment by the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, imprisonment might have followed upon failure to pay a sum awarded under the Pharmacy Acts as a civil debt, but he contended that in order to warrant imprisonment now, it must be expressly authorised by statute, and that by the Pharmacy Acts it is not only not expressly authorised but is excluded by implication. He further maintained that the Sheriff should have granted warrant for arrestment as well as for poinding, and that assuming imprisonment to be competent, it could only follow upon failure to recover by arrestment as well as by poinding, and that the omission of this additional mode of recovery prior to imprisonment was fatal to the sentence. In order to judge of the validity of these objections it is necessary to advert to the terms of the Pharmacy Acts and of the Summary Procedure Acts.

The Pharmacy Act, 1868, section 15, declares that for every such offence as is therein specified (one being the offence to which the complainer pleaded guilty), the offender shall "be liable to pay a penalty or sum of £5, and the same may be sued for, recovered, and dealt with in the manner provided by the Pharmacy Act for the recovery of penalties under that Act."

By section 12 of the Pharmacy Act, 1852 (15 and 16 Vict. cap. 56), it is declared that penalties under it may in Scotland be recovered by action before the Court of Session in ordinary form or by summary action before the Sheriff, or in royal burghs before the Magistrates, and that it shall be lawful for the Sheriff or Magistrate in pronouncing judgment for the penalty or penalties and costs "to insert in such judgment a warrant, in the event of such penalty or penalties or costs not being paid, to levy and recover the amount of the same by poinding."

By section 18, subsection 6, of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, it is, inter alia, declared that in all cases where, under the authority of any Act of Parliament, a penalty is recoverable by action, civil process, or diligence, the judgment of the Court shall authorise execution by arrestment, poinding and sale, and imprisonment, "unless recovery by imprisonment is excluded by the terms of the Act," and may be in the form No. 6 in the schedule; and that where, under the authority of the Act of Parliament, a penalty is declared to be recoverable by arrestment, poinding, or distress and sale, or imprisonment, or by any combination of those forms of diligence other than as above provided for, the judgment may be expressed in the said form No. 6 so far as applicable, and no warrant for imprisonment shall be issued upon a judgment in such form until after the period allowed for execution by arrestment or poinding, except in the event mentioned in form No. 6. It appears to me that upon these enactments it is clear that imprisonment is competent unless it is to be held as excluded by the Pharmacy Acts. The complainer maintained that it is excluded by these Acts, because they do not expressly authorise it, but I consider that this contention is not well founded.

If, however, the legislative provisions on the subject had stopped here, I should have thought it at least a question whether it would not have been necessary to authorise execution by arrestment as well as by poinding and sale before having recourse to imprisonment. I should also have considered that the power of imprisonment was affected by the general abolition of imprisonment for civil debt operated by the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880. But section 8, subsection 1, of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881, declares that, subject to the provisions of section 6, in all proceedings under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, where a warrant of poinding and sale is competent, a warrant of imprisonment in default of recovery of sufficient goods shall likewise be competent for a period not exceeding three months, and that the Court shall specify the term of imprisonment in the warrant. This, which is the last statutory provision on the subject, expressly provides for imprisonment, and makes no mention of arrestment, and therefore it appears to me that the warrant for imprisonment in default of recovery of sufficient goods must mean recovery by the method specified in the section, viz., poinding and sale, and that it is not now essential that execution by arrestment shall be authorised (as under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864) as well as by poinding and sale. In other words, the provisions of the Act of 1864, in so far as affected by the Debtors Act of 1880, are practically restored, subject to the modifications (1) that execution by arrestment shall no longer be necessary, and (2) that the period of imprisonment shall be definite. No. 13. Mar. 15, 1901. Gardner v. Bremridge.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the suspension should be refused.

LORD KYLLACHY and LORD LOW concurred.

No. 14. Mar. 18, 1901. Hogg v. Davidson.

Public-house—Hawking excisable liquor—Responsibility of master for servant—Vanman—Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35), sec. 16.—A vanman, in the employment of and in charge of a van belonging to a licensed grocer, sold and delivered a pint of whisky from the van to A on a public road. A had not ordered the whisky previously. It was part of certain excisable liquors which the vanman had taken from his master's licensed premises in the morning. The master was not present when the whisky was sold to A. The vanman was in the habit of keeping a book in which the liquor taken out by him in the morning was noted. Liquor taken out by him was frequently returned by him to his master as being unsold or undelivered. The master occasionally examined the vanman's book, and the vanman's actings were known to him.

Held that the master, as well as the vanman, had, in respect of the sale to A, rightly been convicted of hawking excisable liquors in contravention of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord M'Laren. Lord Pearson.

ON 24th September 1900 David Hogg, licensed grocer, and William Drummond, vandriver, Carnwath, Lanarkshire, were charged in the Justice of Peace Court at Lanark, on a summary complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Court, setting forth that the accused "did, on 31st August 1900, from a van on the public road leading from Biggar to Dolphinton, both in the county of Lanark, at a part thereof" specified, "sell and deliver one pint of exciseable liquors, and particularly whisky, to David Black, wire-fencer, Dolphinton Green, Dolphinton, Lanarkshire, and did thereby hawk the same, contrary to section 16 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, whereby," &c.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but after evidence had been led were convicted of the contravention charged, and fined £5 each of modified penalty, with the alternative of thirty days' imprisonment.

Hogg obtained a case. The following were the facts stated in the case:—On the day in question Drummond sold and delivered one pint of whisky to Black, and thereby hawked the same at the place libelled. The whisky had not been previously ordered by Black. Hogg was not present at the time or place of sale. Drummond was at the time a vanman in the employment of, and in charge of a van belonging to, Hogg. The sale took place from this van. The vanman was in the habit of keeping a book, which he described as his order-book; this book was occasionally examined by Hogg. Frequently liquor sent out in the morning was returned by the vanman to Hogg as being unsold or undelivered. The liquors were supplied from Hogg's licensed premises in Carnwath. The vanman's actings were known to Hogg.

The question of law was:—"Are the facts held to have been proved sufficient to justify the conviction of the said David Hogg of the contravention charged?"

The undernoted cases[1] were cited by the appellant at the hearing. The respondent was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that this conviction must be upheld. The vanman in the regular course of his employment took out liquor from his master's premises. He took with him on his rounds a book in which he entered a note of the liquor which he took out, and for which he had to account when he returned. The liquor might be delivered to customers who had ordered it, or it might be sold to chance customers, or it might be carried home again. In this case we have it found as a matter of fact proved to the satisfaction of the Justices that the whisky libelled was sold to one who had not given an order for it previously. And we are further told that the vanman's actings were known to the appellant.

That these facts are sufficient in law to entitle the Magistrate to hold that the appellant had trafficked in exciseable liquors, contrary to section 16 of the Public-Houses Act of 1862, I have no doubt whatever.

LORD M'LAREN.—The only point in this case is, that it is said there was not sufficient evidence that the appellant Hogg had authorised his vanman to make the sale of liquor in question.

No doubt the legal maxim qui facit per alium facit per se does not strictly apply in criminal cases. But there is a class of delicts in which, as in cases under the Licensing Acts, the offence is the acting in contravention of the trade conditions to which by Act of Parliament the master of the business is bound to conform. In such cases, where the actual sale is by a servant, the servant is presumed to sell in the ordinary course of his employment, and it is for the master to displace that presumption by proving that the servant acted either outwith the scope of his employment or in contravention of express and particular orders.

In the present case what is disclosed is a system of hawking by the servant in the course of his employment, and the master has not displaced the presumption that he was cognisant of the system, and therefore responsible for his servant's conduct in the particular act libelled.

LORD PEARSON.—The appellant here employed his vanman as his agent to sell exciseable liquors, and the facts shew that the vanman had a great authority. If that is so, the offence attached both to the master and the man.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

The following facts were proved:—The accused on the day libelled started on his usual round in the country with a quantity of milk, the produce of his own dairy. Finding that his supply was running short, he called at a dairy and asked for two gallons of sweet milk. He was supplied with that quantity of milk, which he put into an empty can. He did not ask for or obtain a warranty with this milk, being content to rely upon his knowledge of the dairyman, from whom he had frequently obtained milk in similar circumstances. He thereafter met the prosecutor, of whose official position he was aware. The prosecutor having demanded twopence worth of sweet milk, the accused was proceeding to supply him with milk from a can containing the produce of his own dairy, as to the genuineness of which he had personal knowledge, but the prosecutor insisted on getting milk from the can containing the purchased milk. The accused then sold twopence worth of milk from this can to the prosecutor after informing him that the milk was not the produce of his own cows, and warning him that it might or might not prove to be sweet milk. The milk sold to the prosecutor contained 13 per cent of added water.

The Sheriff-substitute acquitted the accused on the ground that the prosecutor had been supplied with the milk which he insisted on getting after warning that it might not prove to be sweet milk.

Held, on appeal, that the Sheriff-substitute had rightly acquitted the accused.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord M'Laren. Lord Pearson.

ON 28th December 1900 Thomas Gunning, dairyman, Old Liston, in the parish of Kirkliston, Midlothian, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Linlithgow on a summary complaint at the instance of John Frew, sanitary inspector for the county of Linlithgow, who had been appointed by the County Council of the county of Linlithgow, being the Local Authority under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 to 1899, to enforce these Acts. The complaint set forth that the accused "did on 5th December 1900, on the public road or highway in Kirkliston, in the county of Linlithgow," at a point specified, "sell to the complainer to his prejudice twopence worth of sweet milk, which was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the complainer, in respect that it contained thirteen per cent or thereby of added water, contrary to the 6th section of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, as amended by the 2d section of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879."

The accused pleaded not guilty, and after evidence had been led the Sheriff-substitute (Macleod) acquitted him.

Frew obtained a case. The case set forth as follows:—

"2. The following facts were proved to my satisfaction:—

"(a) Early on the morning of 5th December 1900 (the date libelled), the respondent set out in his own van from his dairy on his usual rounds through the county of Linlithgow, to deliver milk to his customers. At the beginning of his journey he had about thirty-two gallons of sweet milk, the produce of his own cows, contained in nine or ten cans and barrels of various sizes, holding from one-half gallon upwards. In particular he used one large barrel for delivering sweet milk to those customers who came to his van for small quantities, while the smaller vessels were convenient when he had to leave his van and carry the milk to customers' houses.

No. 15. Mar. 18, 1901. Frew v. Gunning.

"(b) About eleven o'clock in the forenoon of that day, the respondent had got as far as Dalmeny, and finding that his own sweet milk would not be sufficient to supply the usual customers whom he had still to serve, he called at a dairy near Dalmeny, asked there for two gallons of sweet milk, and was supplied with that quantity of milk. The two gallons of milk thus obtained the respondent poured into the large barrel above referred to, in order that he might more conveniently supply those customers who came for sweet milk to his van. The barrel was quite empty when respondent began to pour into it the milk which he had thus purchased. The respondent did not ask for nor obtain a written warranty with the purchased milk. He had frequently got his deficiency supplied at the same dairy, and was content to rely upon his knowledge of the person with whom he was dealing.

"(c) From Dalmeny the respondent proceeded to Kirkliston (about two miles distant), where he arrived about three quarters of an hour later, and there, at the place libelled, the appellant accosted the respondent with a demand for twopence worth of sweet milk. The official position of the appellant was well known to the respondent, and the nature of the transaction about to be entered into was further evidenced by the presence of two police-constables.

"(d) The respondent at once proceeded to comply with the appellant's demand. He took the lid off a small can which contained sweet milk, the produce of his own cows, and as to the genuineness of which he had personal knowledge, and was about to give the appellant twopence worth therefrom. The appellant, however, refused to accept milk from that small can. If the appellant had accepted what the respondent offered him he would have got sweet milk.

"(e) The appellant insisted on getting from the respondent the article contained in the large barrel above referred to, whatever it might prove to be. The respondent accordingly proceeded to supply the appellant therefrom, but before doing so he (i.) informed the appellant that the milk in his large barrel was not the produce of his own cows, but had been purchased by him; and (ii.) warned the appellant that it might or might not prove to be sweet milk. The said warning was conveyed by the respondent to the appellant in the following words, or words of similar import: 'This milk is not mine and if there is anything wrong with it I am not to blame,' or 'the fault is not mine.' Notwithstanding this warning, the appellant still insisted on getting the article contained in this large barrel, and the respondent accordingly supplied him, giving him the quantity usually given to a customer who asks for twopence worth of sweet milk.

"(f) After the purchase was completed, the appellant notified the respondent of his intention to have the milk analysed by the public analyst. The statutory requisites were all complied with, and subsequent analysis revealed the fact that the article purchased by the appellant from the respondent was not sweet milk, but milk which had been adulterated by 13 per cent of added water.

Frew v. Gunning.

"3. As the appellant was supplied with the article which he insisted on getting after warning from the respondent that it might or might not prove to be the article for which he originally asked, viz., sweet milk, it appeared to me that the proper course was to acquit the respondent, and this I did.

"The question of law for the opinion of the High Court of Justiciary is:—

"Whether I erred in acquitting the respondent upon the ground narrated in paragraph 3 of the foregoing statement?"

At the hearing on the appeal the respondent was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question here is, whether the Sheriff erred in acquitting the respondent, he being satisfied that the respondent warned the appellant that the milk in that particular barrel was not his, and that the respondent supplied the article which the appellant insisted on getting. In these circumstances the Sheriff thought proper to acquit the respondent. Now, I can understand that the carrying of two barrels with different qualities of milk, one for sale to inspectors and the other for sale to customers in general, opens the way for fraud. But until there is some proof of fraud, by its being shewn that customers were actually supplied with the inferior quality, we cannot consider it. This is a stringent statute. Many dealers in milk have to buy milk from other dealers when their own supply gives out, and a statute so stringent as this is not to be pressed further than is reasonable.

Where fraud is suspected I suggest that the right way to proceed would be to take means to ascertain whether the person accused has sold to customers any quantities of the article sold to the inspector. If he is found doing so, he can then be convicted of the previous sale on evidence as to the specimen bought by the prosecutor.

But to convict of a sale where the person selling could not legally refuse to sell, and where the person selling distinctly intimated that he could not sell the article as being what was demanded, would, I think, be most unjust.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. If this were a case of a dairyman selling his own milk, or milk of which he had knowledge, I would be inclined to hold that the statement by the seller that he did not warrant the milk was a mere evasion and could not be accepted. But this is not the case here. The Sheriff has found in fact that the respondent started with an ample supply of his own milk, but that, on running short, he had bought two gallons—not a large quantity—from another dairyman to eke out his own supply. When the inspector came he told him he could not guarantee the quality of the milk in that particular barrel owing to the circumstances mentioned. I think that the Sheriff was justified in holding that there was here a bona fide sale of an article, the quality of which was not, and could not be, guaranteed, and that the dairyman was not chargeable with a contravention of the statute.

LORD PEARSON concurred.

Police—Street—Regulation of traffic—Bye-law—Notice—Order—Ultra vires—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 385.—The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 385, enacts,—"The magistrates may from time to time make bye-laws and issue notices and orders," inter alia, "(3) Prescribing the streets in or through which particular kinds of traffic shall not be permitted." Under the Act bye-laws require to be confirmed by the Sheriff and the Secretary for Scotland; there is no such requirement in the case of notices and orders.

The magistrates of a burgh, professing to act under section 385 of the Act, issued a notice and order permanently prohibiting all bicycle and tricycle traffic in the main thoroughfare of the burgh.

Held that the notice and order was ultra vires and ineffectual, in respect that, on a sound construction of section 385, in the case of a regulation intended to be permanent, the procedure must be by bye-law.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord M'Laren. Lord Pearson.

AT a meeting of the Police Commissioners of the burgh of Stromness, held on 12th June 1899, it was resolved that cycling should be prohibited in five streets forming the main thoroughfare of the burgh, and that the Magistrates should issue an order under section 385 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act,* on the subject.

At a meeting, held on 15th June, the Magistrates, having considered the subject of cycling in the streets of the burgh, and also the minute of meeting of the Commissioners of 12th June, approved of a notice on the subject referred to in that minute. This notice was approved by the Commissioners at a meeting held on the same day.

The notice was in the following terms:—

"Notice to Cyclists.—The Magistrates of the burgh of Stromness hereby give notice, in terms of section 385 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, that all bicycle and tricycle traffic in the streets" above referred to "is prohibited from and after Monday, the 19th day of June curt., 1899, and every breach of this order shall be deemed

Under sec. 318, bye-laws under the Act (with certain exceptions not here material), before coming into operation, require to be confirmed by the Sheriff and by the Secretary for Scotland, and sec. 319 makes provision for the advertisement of notice of the intention to apply for confirmation, and authorises the hearing of objections to the proposed bye-law. There are no such provisions in regard to notices and orders.

Mar. 18, 1901. Baikie v. Charleson.

William S. Baikie, steamboat agent, Stromness, having, on 2d August 1900, been convicted of a contravention of the order, brought a suspension, inter alia, on the ground that the order was ultra vires.

At the hearing the respondent cited the undermentioned authority.[1]

LORD M'LAREN.—This is not a case in which we have to consider a question of character or conduct, though in point of form it is a suspension of a conviction and sentence. The purpose of the case is to raise the question of the validity of an order by the Commissioners of Police of Stromness prohibiting certain vehicles being driven beyond a walking pace through a set of streets constituting the only thoroughfare in the burgh suitable for vehicular traffic. Under section 385 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, certain things may be done by the Magistrates of burghs for the regulation of street traffic. (1) They can regulate the traffic, or any particular traffic, in streets within the burgh; (2) they can divert temporarily out of any street or streets traffic of every kind, or particular kinds of traffic; (3) they can prescribe the streets in or through which particular kinds of traffic shall not be permitted. These things are to be done by the Magistrates from time to time making bye-laws and issuing notices and orders. If a bye-law is made it has to be confirmed by the Sheriff before it comes into operation, and before such confirmation notice of the intention to apply for confirmation must be given in the newspapers. On a sound construction of this enactment it does not confer authority on the Magistrates to do all these things either by way of bye-law or by way of notice and order according to the pleasure of the Magistrates. Giving fairplay to section 385, it means that regulations are to be made by bye-law or by order according to the nature of the case. Where it is a case of temporarily regulating or prohibiting traffic through a street under repair, or on some public occasion, they can do so by notice to the inhabitants or by order. But where the magistrates desire to make the prohibition permanent they must proceed by bye-law, which must be confirmed by the Sheriff. It is noteworthy that in the case second mentioned in section 385—the only case in which the regulation is expressed to be by way of order and notice—the example given is one of regulation for temporary purposes. From this it may be inferred that where the regulation is to be permanent or of long duration it cannot be made by mere order and notice. It must be kept in view that the streets were intended to be free to all classes of the community. Some people prefer to go in carriages, some on horseback, and some on cycles, according to their means and ability, and to exclude the entire section of the community who favour this convenient though modern form of locomotion from the use of the only available street in the burgh is a strong measure. The regulation may possibly be right, but a regulation of that kind should only be passed with deliberation, and subject to the checks which the statute prescribes. I am therefore of opinion that the Magistrates have not taken the right way of dealing with this question, that the notice was insufficient, and that the conviction proceeding on what, in this view, was an unauthorised prohibition, should be quashed.

Baikie v. Charleson.

LORD PEARSON.—In my opinion the opening words of section 385 are to be read distributively. It may be difficult to lay down any precise line of distinction between cases in which a bye-law is necessary and cases in which it is enough to proceed by way of notice or order. I think, however, that a regulation permanently excluding a certain kind of traffic from the main thoroughfare of a burgh is clearly within the class of cases in which it is necessary to proceed by bye-law.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Section 385 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, contemplates that in regulating street traffic the magistrates of a burgh may proceed in certain cases by bye-law and in certain cases by notice and order. Curiously enough it is expressly stated in article 2 of section 385 that regulations under it shall be by notice and order, and in that subsection the regulations referred to are definitely described as temporary. This is an indication of the intention of the Legislature as to when a bye-law is necessary and when a notice and order is sufficient. There are many temporary occasions, as when a drain bursts or a fire breaks out, when a regulation would be nugatory if it was necessary to proceed by bye-law to make it efficient. In such a temporary case the magistrates may act by order and notice. But the case we have here is not one of urgency, and its duration is indefinite. That being so, it is in my opinion a case for parties being heard and proceedings being taken by bye-law, so that the decision of the magistrates may be subject to review by the Sheriff.

THE COURT suspended the conviction.

PETER MACNAUGHTON, Appellant.—Clyde.—W. J. Robertson.
ROBERT MACAULAY SMITH (Procurator-Fiscal, Edinburgh Police Court), Respondent.—Guthrie, K.C.—F. T. Cooper.

Police—Cleaning of Common Stair—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Extension Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. clix.), sec. 41, subsec. (5).—The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Extension Act, 1882, sec. 41, subsec. (5) enacts:—"The occupiers of every house, flat, or storey having entrance by a common stair, shall cause the stair and landing immediately below the flat or storey possessed by them to be swept every lawful day, and washed at least twice a week. . . . If any flat or storey of the tenement be unoccupied, the occupiers of the flats or storeys above shall cause the stairs and landings below such empty flat or storey to be swept and washed downwards to the next house which shall be occupied."

A club, in addition to its main premises, occupied a flat in an adjoining tenement. Entrance from the main club premises to this flat was obtained by a doorway through the gable wall between the tenements. Before the occupancy of the flat by the club, the entrance to the flat, as well as to the other flats of the tenement, was obtained from a common stair. The club made no use of this common stair, and the doorway therefrom, which formerly gave access to the flat, had been boarded up with wood battens.

The secretary of the club was convicted of a contravention of the above enactment in having failed to have the stair and landing immediately below the flat belonging to the club washed.

Held on appeal that the mere fact that the club had ceased to use the common stair did not relieve it of its obligation under the statute to have the stair washed, and that the conviction was right.

Macnaughton v. Smith.
HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord M'Laren. Lord Pearson.

ON 28th January 1901, Peter Macnaughton, S.S.C., secretary of the Union Club, Limited, occupying premises at 25 Hanover Street, Edinburgh, was charged in the Police Court at Edinburgh on a summary complaint at the instance of the Procurator-Fiscal, setting forth that, "contrary to the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Extension Act, 1882, section 41, subsection (5),* he, as representing the management of said Union Club, being the person having access to a flat or storey thereof by the common passage or stair at No. 27 Rose Street, Edinburgh, did fail to have said stair washed between 1st and 12th December 1900."

Macnaughton pleaded not guilty, but, evidence having been adduced, was convicted and fined 2s. 6d., with the alternative of one day's imprisonment.

He obtained a case. The case stated:—"The Union Club, Limited, of which the appellant is the secretary, occupies premises entering from the street at No. 25 Hanover Street. These premises consist of four flats and basement, and have a back entrance from Rose Street Lane. In addition to the main club premises, the club occupies the first flat of a tenement situated at the corner of Rose Street and Hanover Street. The ground flat of that tenement consists of shops entering from Hanover Street, and entrance to all the other flats previous to the occupancy of the said first flat by the club was obtained from a common stair, No. 27 Rose Street. The said first flat is used by the club in conjunction with, and as part of, the club premises, and entrance thereto is obtained from the club premises by an open arched doorway through the gable wall between the tenements. The club makes no use whatever of the common stair, No. 27 Rose Street. The doorway therefrom which formerly gave access to the flat, has been boarded up with half-inch wood battens painted similarly to the walls of the staircase. The back entrance of the club in Rose Street North Lane is 35 yards, and the front entrance in Hanover Street is 40 yards, from the common stair in question. The club premises have not been entered from that stairway for several years, and could not be so entered without removing the existing wooden partition."

The questions of law were:—"(1) Whether in the circumstances stated the club premises have entrance by a common stair within the meaning of section 41, subsection (5), of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Extension Act, 1882, so as to bring the club under the obligation to wash the stair? (2) Whether the facts proved warrant the conviction?"

The argument for the appellant sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Judges.[1]

The respondent (the Procurator-Fiscal) was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entertain no doubt that in this case the conviction was right.

The Union Club took possession of a flat having an entrance upon this stair, and it has that entrance still. The club may choose not to use it, and for its own convenience may have filled up the doorway, but its right to have an entrance to the stair remains. If the club has that right, the fact that it does not use the entrance does not affect the liability of the club as occupier of a flat having a right of entrance by the stair to clean the stair. It has a right which no one can dispute, and it cannot place the burden of the duty attaching to that right on the other occupiers of the stair merely by not exercising the right.

One argument for the appellant's view is founded upon the provision of the section that where any flat is unoccupied, then the duty of cleaning the stair shall devolve on the occupier of the flat above. I can quite understand the policy of the Legislature in making this exceptional provision on sanitary considerations and considerations of convenience. The Legislature evidently thought that where a flat was temporarily unoccupied, it was inadvisable that the police should have to search out the owner or some third party on whom to place the duty of cleaning that portion of the stair. But this is not an unoccupied flat; that provision, therefore, is not here in point.

In the next place, the appellant relied on the case of Daish,[1] and it is proper that I should notice that case. If it had been decided in precisely similar circumstances, we should have felt bound to defer to the opinion there expressed. But the circumstances there were entirely different. In Daish's[1] case the true entrance to the house was by a main-door which was built for that house. The house had also a door into the passage giving access to the back-green, and as regards the portion of the passage between his door and the back-green there was no dispute that Daish was liable. The only question arose as to the portion of the passage between his door and the front door of the tenement, which no doubt Daish could use, but which he had no need to use. The Court held that that portion of the passage had not been provided for his use, but for the use of the occupants of the stair. He was therefore found not liable for the cleaning of it. That case has no application here. The appellants are occupiers of a flat which has an entrance to this stair, and they are liable under this statute for the cleaning of their portion of the stair.

Lord M'Laren.—In this case the appellants argue that they do not require to clean the stair because they do not use the stair. That is no answer to the charge against them under the statute. In order to avoid liability it would be necessary for them to be able to say that they had surrendered their right of entrance by that stair to the other occupants, and that the latter had accepted their surrender and agreed to relieve them of liability for the cleaning.

Then it is said that there is a provision in the statute that in the case of a flat being unoccupied the other tenants shall clean the whole stair. The answer to that contention is that this is not the case of an unoccupied flat, and that provision has therefore no application.

In regard to the argument founded on Daish's[1] case, I consider that there was such a difference in the physical structure of the building there described as to prevent that decision having any bearing on the decision of the question before us in the present case.

Lord Pearson concurred.

The Court answered the questions in the case in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

H. M. Advocate v. Dick.

Bribery—Malversation of Office—Magistrate—Licensing Court.—An indictment set forth that in March 1900, the panel, being then a member of the Town-Council of Glasgow, did corruptly solicit and receive from G, then an applicant to the Magistrates of Glasgow for a certificate for a public-house licence, the sum of £600 as a bribe, "in consideration of which you undertook to procure the granting of the said certificate by the said Magistrates," and the said application for a certificate having been refused at the Licensing Court in April 1900, "and you having been thereafter, on 17th May 1900, appointed a Magistrate" of Glasgow, and the said G having, in the month of August 1900, "stipulated with you that you must repay the said sum of £600, or undertake to procure the granting of the said certificate at the then ensuing Licensing Court in October 1900 upon his renewing his application for the same, you did then and there, in consideration of your retaining the said sum of £600, corruptly undertake to procure the granting of the said certificate"; and the said G having presented a new application "you did, in consideration of the said bribe of £600, and in pursuance of your corrupt undertaking aforesaid, in breach of your duty as a Magistrate and to the malversation of your office, corruptly vote in favour of, and endeavour to procure, the granting of the said certificate."

Held by Lord Young that the indictment was irrelevant, the receiving of the £600 by the panel when he was a Town-councillor but not a Magistrate not being per se a crime, and there being no relevant averment that he had taken a bribe after he had become a Magistrate, or that before his appointment he had received money which was given and taken in anticipation of his appointment, and intended to influence his conduct after it was made.

Bribery—Solicitation of bribe by Magistrate—Attempt to commit a crime—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 61.—An indictment set forth that the accused being a Magistrate of Glasgow did corruptly solicit from M, an applicant for a certificate for a public-house licence a bribe of £500 "as a consideration for your corruptly voting for, and endeavouring to procure, the granting of" a certificate for a public-house licence, "and you did thus attempt to obtain the said bribe of £500 from the said M in breach of your duty as a Magistrate and to the malversation of your office."

Held by Lord Young that the indictment was irrelevant, in respect that it alleged nothing more than expression of willingness to commit a crime.

HIGH COURT (Glasgow). Lord Young.

JAMES WILSON DICK, Strathview House, Maryhill, Glasgow, was indicted at the instance of the Lord Advocate, the charge against him being—"(1) that on 25th March 1900, at 1 Ure Place, Glasgow, and on 26th and 27th March 1900, within Strathview House aforesaid, you, being then a member of the Town-Council of Glasgow, did corruptly solicit, and on said 27th March, within Strathview House aforesaid, corruptly receive, from Edward Gillan, spirit-merchant, 1 Ure Place, Glasgow, then an applicant to the Magistrates of the royal burgh of Glasgow for a certificate for a public-house licence for premises situated at 109 Earlston Avenue, Glasgow, the sum of £600 sterling as a bribe, in consideration of which you undertook to procure the granting of the said certificate by the said Magistrates, and the said Edward Gillan's application for a certificate having come before and been refused at the Licensing Court held in April 1900, and you having been thereafter, on 17th May 1900, appointed a Magistrate of the royal burgh of Glasgow, and the said Edward Gillan having in the month of August 1900, and within Strathview House aforesaid, stipulated with you that you must repay the said sum of £600 or undertake to procure the granting of the said certificate at the then ensuing Licensing Court in October 1900 upon his renewing his application for the same, you did, then and there, in consideration of your retaining the said sum of £600, corruptly undertake to procure the granting of the said certificate by the said Court, and the said Edward Gillan having presented a new application for said certificate to the said Magistrates, and the same having come before the said Magistrates, of whom you were then one, assembled in Licensing Court within the lesser City Hall, Glasgow, on 16th October 1900, you did, time and place last mentioned, in consideration of the said bribe of £600, and in pursuance of your corrupt undertaking aforesaid, in breach of your duty as a Magistrate, and to the malversation of your office, corruptly vote in favour of, and endeavour to procure, the granting of the said certificate of licence; and (2) that between 1st September and 16th October 1900, at 196 Main Street, Maryhill, Glasgow, and within your office at 33 College Street, Glasgow, you, being then a Magistrate of the royal burgh of Glasgow, did corruptly solicit from Charles James McElhaw, spirit-merchant, 170 Great George Street, Hillhead, Glasgow, then an applicant to the said Magistrates for a certificate for a public-house licence for premises situated at 108 Saltmarket, Glasgow, a bribe of £500 sterling as a consideration for you corruptly voting for and endeavouring to procure the granting of the said last-mentioned certificate at the then ensuing Licensing Court, to be held on 16th October 1900, and you did thus attempt to obtain said bribe of £500 from the said Charles James McElhaw, in breach of your duty as a Magistrate and to the malversation of your office."

At the first diet, on 16th April 1901, the panel, as noted by the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe), "stated objections to the relevancy generally, and in particular on the first charge, in respect it is not libelled (a) on the 25th, 26th, or 27th March 1900—the dates of the alleged solicitation by and payment to the accused—the accused was a Magistrate or member of the Licensing Court of the city of Glasgow, but that, on the contrary, it is apparent from the terms of the indictment that he was not; nor (b) that said alleged payment was conditional on anything to be done by the accused in the event of his becoming a Licensing Magistrate, or that it was conditional on anything which might happen or be done subsequent to the Licensing Court of April 1900; nor (c) that the accused was in the month of August 1900, or subsequently, or at any time, under any obligation to repay to the said Edward Gillan the said sum in respect of the discharge of which by Gillan he was induced to undertake to vote in support of his application, and in respect that, in the absence of relevant antecedent circumstances inferring corruption, it does not form a relevant charge merely to state that the accused voted 'corruptly' without any specification: And on the second charge that dates insufficiently specified, and that mere solicitation not followed by any completed act of bribery or corrupt act is not a relevant charge at common law, and that no statute is libelled,—which are hereby reserved for the consideration of the Court at the second diet."

At the second diet, before Lord Young, at Glasgow, on 26th April, argued for the panel;—(1) The first charge was irrelevant. In May 1900, when the panel was alleged to have received the £600, he was not a Magistrate of Glasgow, and he, at that date, had no concern with the granting of licence certificates. It was stated in the indictment that the consideration which he gave for the £600 was that he undertook to procure the granting of a certificate in favour of Gillan, the person who was said to have given him the £600. The panel, not being at that date a Magistrate, but merely a Councillor, the consideration specified could mean only that he would use his influence towards getting the Magistrates to grant the licence. But it was not bribery, nor an indictable offence of any sort at common law, for a man to receive money in consideration of his promise to use his influence in persuading someone else. It might have been different if the indictment had averred that the panel had received the £600 in consideration of his promise himself to vote for Gillan's application, if and when he, the panel, became a Magistrate; but that was not the case which was averred. What was averred was that in August 1900, after the panel had become a Magistrate, Gillan stipulated with him that he was either to repay the £600 or to undertake to procure the granting of a certificate to Gillan at the Licensing Court in the following October, and that he fulfilled that stipulation by voting for Gillan's application in October. But if, on Gillan's application being refused in April, the panel had repaid the £600, such repayment would have been an entirely voluntary act on the panel's part; consequently the so-called stipulation in August was truly without consideration, and the panel's vote in October, therefore, was not given in consideration of a bribe. The mere general averment that the panel had voted corruptly, which was all that remained, was plainly irrelevant. If the receipt of the money was not at its date bribery, the circumstance that the panel subsequently became a Magistrate would not make it bribery.[1] Further, the receipt of the £600, even if the panel had been a Magistrate when he received it (assuming that he ever received anything), would not have amounted to malversation of his office of a Judge.[2] No doubt the Magistrates of a city were Judges, but sitting as the Licensing Authority they were not exercising judicial functions; their functions in that capacity were purely administrative.[3] The early Scots statutes dealing with the offence of bribery in a Judge—from 1424, cap. 45, to 1579, cap. 93—consequently had no application to the present. For the same reason the case of Fife,[4] in 1687, was inapplicable. (2) The second charge likewise was irrelevant. In the first place, the latitude of time was too great, and, secondly, mere solicitation, apart from any completed act of bribery, was not a crime.

The Advocate-Depute argued;—(1) The first charge was that the panel had acted corruptly in discharging his duties as a Magistrate.[5] The granting of public-house certificates was a judicial act; the Magistrates or Justices, sitting in a Licensing Court, were discharging judicial functions.[6] In England an information would lie against a Justice for corrupt practices.[7] It was not maintained that it was a crime for the panel to receive money while he was a Town-councillor merely. That was not the crime charged. The crime charged was that the panel, after he had become a Magistrate, corruptly undertook in August to procure the granting of the certificate in consideration of the money previously received, and subsequently, in October, in pursuance of this corrupt undertaking corruptly voted for granting the certificate. That was a crime.[1] It made no difference that the money was received before the panel became a Magistrate, since the bargain was renewed and carried into effect after he became a Magistrate. (2) The second charge was relevant. The latitude of time was not undue. Further, there was a relevant averment of a crime. If it was a crime for a Magistrate to accept a bribe in consideration of the abuse of his office, it was likewise a crime for him to solicit a bribe offering that consideration. Under section 61 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, an attempt to commit any indictable crime was itself an indictable crime.

LORD YOUNG.—The indictment contains two charges which I will consider separately on the strictly legal question, which alone I can decide, whether the conduct thereby imputed to the prisoner amounts to an indictable offence.

The first charge is that in March 1900 the prisoner, being then a member of the Town-Council of Glasgow, corruptly solicited and received from Edward Gillan, then an applicant to the Magistrates of Glasgow for a certificate for a public-house licence, £600 as a bribe, in consideration of which he undertook to procure the granting of said certificate by the Magistrates; that the certificate being refused by the Magistrates at the Licensing Court held in April, and the prisoner having thereafter (on 17th May) been appointed a Magistrate, Gillan, "in the month of August" stipulated with him that "he must repay the said sum of £600 or undertake to procure the granting of the said certificate at the then ensuing Licensing Court in October upon his renewing his application for the same"; that the prisoner undertook "to procure the granting of the said certificate," and that Gillan having presented a new application, which came before the Licensing Court on 16th October, the prisoner did "corruptly vote in favour of, and endeavour to procure, the granting of the said certificate."

The objection stated to the relevancy of this charge is in substance that in March, when the prisoner is alleged to have solicited and received £600 from Gillan, and in consideration thereof undertaken to procure the granting of his application to the Licensing Court held in April, he was not a Magistrate, or a member or officer of the Licensing Court, and had not as a town-councillor or otherwise any duty or concern with the granting of licence certificates; that his receipt of the money in March and his failure in April to satisfy the expectations of the giver did not make him debtor to the giver for that sum, or the recipient of a bribe when (i.e., in August) he is alleged to have undertaken to procure the granting of a new application, or when (i.e., in October) he is charged with corruptly voting for it.

In answer to this objection the Advocate-Depute, while conceding

[1] Fife, cited in Hume on Crimes, i., p. 407.

No. 18.

April 26, 1901.
H. M. Advocate v. Dick.

(rightly, as I thought) that a town-councillor, who is not a magistrate, has no duty or concern with the granting of licence certificates, and that the reception of money by him from an applicant for a certificate as a consideration for using his influence to procure the granting of it, however discreditable such conduct may be, is not an indictable offence, contended that although the crime imputed to the prisoner consisted only in what he did after he was appointed a Magistrate (i.e., after 17th May), yet in judging of it account must be taken of what he did before, viz., that he solicited and received money from an applicant who desired his influence with those who could grant his application although he was not one of them, and which money he had not returned; that what he is charged with doing when a Magistrate is that in August, when told that he must either repay the money which he had thus received from the disappointed applicant, or undertake to procure the granting of a new application by him, he preferred and so undertook the latter alternative, and in October acted on that undertaking by voting for the new application. This the Advocate-Depute contended was equivalent to the soliciting and receipt by the prisoner of a bribe after he became a Magistrate.

Town Magistrates and County Justices to whom is committed the duty of granting or refusing certificates for licences are at liberty to act upon their individual knowledge and the result of such inquiries as they individually may think proper to make as to the worthiness or fitness of applicants and the suitability of premises with respect to locality and otherwise; and there is, so far as I know, no objection to their taking such advice as they think proper, and no law to hinder those whom they are willing to hear volunteering their opinions. This of course is not permissible to, or with, Judges administering justice, who it is superfluous to say cannot so act or be so approached. I asked the Advocate-Depute if he could refer to any authority for the proposition that a private individual who solicited or accepted a money or other consideration for using such influence as he possessed to obtain for the giver from the Magistrates of a burgh or any such body a licence certificate, a contract for work, or an appointment to an office, thereby committed an indictable crime, and received, as I expected, an answer in the negative. The conclusion necessarily is that on 17th May 1900, when the prisoner was appointed a Magistrate, he was free of crime. Of the propriety or impropriety (as distinguished from criminality) of his conduct prior to that date, as imputed, it is not my duty to express an opinion.

The first date subsequent to 17th May 1900 on which the prisoner is charged with doing anything is "the month of August 1900," when it is averred that in consideration of being allowed to retain the money which he had received in March for his private influence, which proved unavailing, he undertook to give his influence and vote as a Magistrate in favour of the disappointed applicant if he renewed his application. This undertaking it is averred that he fulfilled on 16th October by supporting the new application.

It is not alleged that, at any time subsequent to March, Gillan gave or promised to give anything whatever to the prisoner. Take it that in August Gillan said to the prisoner that he might keep what he got from him in March, would that be giving a bribe? I do not think so. If a creditor said to his debtor that he would forgive him his debt if he did so and so, I should not, as at present advised, be prepared in this Court and in the administration of criminal law to characterise that as giving a bribe. But it is not necessary for me to decide that question now, being of opinion that, taking the facts to be as stated in the indictment, the relation of debtor and creditor did not exist between Gillan and the prisoner, and that there was no discharge of any claim legal or moral, and recognisable in a Court of law, which the former had against the latter.

No. 18.

H. M. Advocate v. Dick.

In what I have hitherto said I have assumed that a burgh Magistrate who accepts a bribe given as an inducement to support an application for a licence certificate commits a crime indictable at common law, and that the giver of such bribe also does so. But on that assumption, being of opinion that the indictment I am considering is irrelevant, it is unnecessary that I should now decide or even express an opinion on the soundness of the assumption which was disputed by the counsel for the prisoner on grounds worthy of serious consideration. It is sufficient here to decide, as I do, that there is no relevant averment that the prisoner took a bribe when a Magistrate, or before his appointment had received money which was given and taken in anticipation of it, and intended to influence his conduct after it came.

The second charge is that in September or October 1900 the prisoner unsuccessfully solicited a bribe of £500 from an applicant for a licence certificate. The relevancy of this charge was objected to on grounds too obvious to require expression. The Advocate-Depute's defence of it was that it really amounted to a charge of attempting to commit a crime, viz., the crime of the taking of a bribe by a Magistrate. If it is a crime at common law for a Magistrate to express his willingness or desire to take a bribe of a certain amount if he can get it, then to do so would be not attempt to commit but actual commission of crime. But the expression of willingness or desire to do anything which it would be a crime to do is not indictable at common law. Suppose a broker or dealer expressed to someone whom he thought likely to further his views that he was willing and indeed desirous, if opportunity occurred, to purchase stolen goods, and that nothing followed, would that be indictable as an attempt to commit the crime of reset? I am unable in any view of this novel and indeed unprecedented charge to sustain it as relevant.

There may be grounds—although I am, I hope excusably, not aware of them—for thinking that the public interest requires more protection than the common law rules and practice of the criminal law afford against the misconduct of Magistrates in cities and burghs and Justices in counties in such matters as I have had occasion to refer to. It is for the Legislature, not for this Court, to consider this. On the legal question before me I am of opinion that this indictment is irrelevant.

THE following was the interlocutor:—"The Court sustained the objections stated to the relevancy of the indictment; deserted the diet against the panel simpliciter; and dismissed him from the bar."

Deforcement—Warrant.—It is not essential to the crime of deforcement that the officer should have the principal warrant in his possession at the time of the alleged offence, if the accused knows that the officer is an officer of the law engaged in execution of his duty in serving the warrant.

JOHN CUNNINGHAM, checkweighman, Watson Place, Hamilton, and nine other persons were charged in the Sheriff Court at Hamilton, on summary complaint setting forth that the accused, "acting in concert with each other, and with a large number of other persons to the complainer unknown, did, on 6th August 1900, in Austine Street, Cadzow Colliery Rows, Hamilton, with the view of preventing the service of a summary ejection complaint issued from the Sheriff Court at Hamilton at the instance of Cadzow Coal Company, Limited, coal-masters, Cadzow Colliery, Hamilton, against Thomas Neilan, miner, 52 Austine Street, Cadzow Colliery Rows, Hamilton, which contained a warrant of the Sheriff of the county of Lanark to cite the said Thomas Neilan to appear and answer the said complaint in the Court-House at Hamilton on the 9th day of August 1900, at ten o'clock forenoon, stand closely packed together upon the steps leading to the door of the house occupied by the said Thomas Neilan, of 52 Austine Street aforesaid, as well as on the roadway in front of and round about said door, thus blocking the way to said door, and did kick John Dobson Taylor, sheriff-officer, 5 St Vincent Place, Glasgow, who was charged with the duty of serving said complaint, on the left knee, thrust pins or needles into his legs, curse, swear, and shout at him, wave their arms about in a threatening manner, and repeatedly push or thrust him back from the door of said house when he attempted to reach it for the purpose of serving said complaint, and this they did well knowing, or having good reason to know, that the said John Dobson Taylor was an officer of the law, and was engaged in the execution of his duty as such in serving said complaint, by all which the said John Dobson Taylor was driven off and prevented from serving said complaint and warrant, and was thus deforced by the said" accused.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but after evidence had been led the Sheriff-substitute (Davidson) found each of them "guilty of the crime charged, except the kicking, thrusting the pins or needles, and the cursing, swearing, shouting, and waving the arms charged," and fined them each thirty shillings, with the alternative of twenty-one days' imprisonment.

They obtained a case. The case stated;—"From the evidence adduced I found it proved that on 6th August 1900 the said John Dobson Taylor, sheriff-officer, Glasgow, proceeded to Austine Street, Cadzow, Hamilton, to serve summary ejection complaints; that at the door of 52 Austine Street, where Thomas Neilan resided, upon whom an ejection complaint and warrant were to be served, a number of people thronged the steps in front of the door, so that the officer was unable to reach it; that no actual violence was used by the people to the officer; that the officer did not request the people to make way for him, nor did he display his blazon, or in any way declare or intimate that he was a sheriff-officer, but the crowd and the accused shewed by their conduct that they knew he was, [and particularly that they (the accused) knew he was an officer of the law engaged in the execution of his duty in serving the summary ejection complaint above referred to;]* that he did not shew his warrant to anyone, and was not asked to do so, and had not with him at the time the principal complaint and warrant; that the accused were amongst the people round the door of Neilan's house; that the officer was pushed back, but not personally by the accused, and without violence, and no overt attack was made upon him; that he failed to serve the summons owing to the action of the accused and those acting in concert with them."

The question of law was,—"Whether the above facts found proved warrant the conviction?"

Argued for the appellants;—It was essential to the crime of deforcement that the officer should have his warrant with him,[1] which the sheriff-officer here had not; the conviction therefore could not be sustained. Further, the Sheriff-substitute did not state in the case that he found it proved that the accused knew that the officer was in the execution of his duty, and if they did not know that, they could not be guilty of deforcement.

Argued for the respondent;—It was not essential to the crime of deforcement that the officer should have the warrant in his possession. The Sheriff-substitute must have held that the accused knew that Taylor, the officer, was in the execution of his duty, for he found them "guilty of the crime charged," and the complaint set forth that they did what they were charged with doing, "well knowing, or having good reason to know, that the said John Dobson Taylor was an officer of the law, and was engaged in the execution of his duty as such in serving" such complaint.

On 7th December 1900,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—There is one essential point in which the statement of the case by the Sheriff-substitute is defective. The complaint bears that the accused acted as they did, "well knowing, or having good reason to know, that the said John Dobson Taylor was an officer of the law, and was engaged in the execution of his duty as such in serving said complaint." This would seem to be affirmed by the finding of the Sheriff that the accused were guilty of the crime charged; but there is not a word about it in the statement of facts found proved. I do not think it safe to dispose of this appeal without knowing whether it is a fact or not that the accused knew, or had good reason to know, that the officer was at the time engaged in the execution of his duty as an officer of law. I therefore think we should send the case back to the Sheriff-substitute to enable him to state specifically how the fact stood in regard to this matter.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—An officer of law must be put in possession of the warrant which he is asked to execute before he executes it. But it does not follow that he must have his warrant on his person when he proceeds to execute it. If the officer anticipates obstruction in the performance of his duties, one can understand that he would leave the warrant at home for safety, and it is possible that this is why he did so in the present case.

I agree that the proper course is to send back the stated case to the Sheriff for amendment, in order that the attention of the Sheriff should be drawn to what is necessary to constitute the crime of deforcement. It is necessary that we should know whether the Sheriff held it proved—though it is probably merely by oversight that it is not stated in the case—that the accused knew that the officer was engaged in the execution of his duty.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Remit to the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire at Hamilton to amend the case by stating whether it was proved as matter of fact that the appellants knew, or had good reason to know or to believe, that John Dobson Taylor was an officer of the law engaged in the execution of his duty as such in serving the summary ejection complaint as mentioned in the stated case on 8th August 1900, when the alleged deforcement took place."

The Sheriff-substitute, on remit, added to the special case the words above quoted in italics.

THEREAFTER, on 4th March 1901, the Court (the Lord Justice-General, Lord Kyllachy, and Lord Low) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered this appeal as amended by the Sheriff-substitute, and heard counsel for the parties, answer the question in the case in the affirmative, dismiss the appeal, and decern."

The schedule to the Act specifies a number of statutory offences, and concludes, "any other offence involving bodily injury to a child under the age of sixteen years."

Held by the Lord Justice-General that the concluding words of the schedule included the crime of culpable homicide, and that the wife of a man charged with the culpable homicide of his child aged twelve months, or alternatively with a contravention of sec. 1 of the Act, was a competent witness under sec. 12 of the Act.

April 26, 1901. H. M. Advocate v. Fraser.

High Court. Lord Justice-General.

PETER J. C. FRASER was indicted at the instance of the Lord Advocate, the charge against him being "that on 3d August 1900, in the house 2 Malloch's Close, Canongate, Edinburgh, then occupied by you, you did assault Catherine Fraser, aged twelve months, your daughter, and did beat her with your fists and knock her head against the wall or floor of said house and did kill her; or otherwise, time and place above libelled, you did wilfully assault the said child and beat her with your fists and knock her head against the wall or floor of said house, all in a manner to cause her unnecessary suffering or injury to her health, contrary to the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 41), sec. 1."*

The case was tried before the Lord Justice-General and a jury on 18th February 1901.

At the trial the Advocate-Depute proposed to call the wife of the accused as a witness.

Tait, for the panel, objected, and argued;—The wife of the panel was not a competent witness. She would have been competent had the charge under the Act stood alone, but there was also the common law charge of culpable homicide, and in relation to that charge she was not a competent witness. The question turned upon section 12 of the Act and the relative schedule. The wife of a person accused of a common law offence against his child under the age of sixteen was a competent witness only if the concluding clause of the schedule was to be read in its widest generality, but on the contrary, the sound construction was that the words "any other offence" meant any other offence ejusdem generis with those specially mentioned, i.e., statutory

* The Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 41), enacts:—

Sec. 1—"(1) If any person over the age of sixteen years who has the custody, charge, or care of any child under the age of sixteen years, wilfully assaults, ill-treats, neglects, abandons or exposes such child, or causes or procures such child to be assaulted, ill-treated, neglected, abandoned or exposed in a manner likely to cause such child unnecessary suffering or injury to its health (including injury to or loss of sight, or hearing, or limb, or organ of the body, and any mental derangement), that person shall be guilty of a misdemeanour; and" on conviction on indictment, or on summary conviction, shall be liable as specified.

"(2) A person may be convicted of an offence under this section either on indictment or by a Court of summary jurisdiction notwithstanding the death of the child in respect of whom the offence is committed.

"(5) An offence under this section is in this Act referred to as an offence of cruelty."

Sec. 12—"In any proceeding against any person for an offence under this Act, or for any of the offences mentioned in the schedule to this Act, such person shall be competent but not compellable to give evidence, and the wife or husband of such person may be required to attend to give evidence as an ordinary witness in the case, and shall be competent but not compellable to give evidence."

The schedule to this Act was in the following terms:—

"Any offence under sections 27, 55, and 56 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, and any offence against a child under the age of sixteen years under sections 43 and 52 of that Act.

"Any offence under the Children's Dangerous Performances Act, 1879.

offences of which the essence was that the victim was under sixteen years of age, a construction which, of course, excluded the common law crime of culpable homicide. That construction had been adopted in England.[1]

Mackenzie, K.C., A.-D.—This was a remedial statute, intended, among other objects, to facilitate the proof of offences committed by parents against their children. The reason of the rule introduced by section 12 applied as strongly to common law offences against children as to statutory offences, and to offences in which the age of the victim was not of the essence of the offence as to offences in which it was. Section 1, subsection (2) of the Act contemplated the possibility of the death of the child. "Offence" was a sufficiently apt term to include culpable homicide.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—This is a somewhat narrow question relative to the interpretation of the schedule to the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894. By section 12 of the Act it is enacted—(His Lordship read section 12 of the Act and the last clause of the schedule).

It was maintained on behalf of the panel that these words relate only to acts which would be offences if done to children under sixteen years of age, but would not be offences if done to persons above sixteen years of age, but I do not find any such limitation expressed in the Act, and I am unable to see any reason for holding it to be implied.

One of the objects of the Act was to facilitate proof of offences committed against young children by their parents, it being well known that not a few such offences remained unproved and unpunished because spouses were not competent witnesses against each other except in the case of offences committed by the one against the other. The reason for making the parents competent (though not compellable) witnesses in the case of offences committed by one of them against their children applies as much to common law as to statutory offences, and as much to acts which would be criminal whether the victim is above or below the age of sixteen as to acts which are only offences if done to persons under sixteen years of age. Seeing that there is no such limitation as has been contended for either in the words of the schedule or in the reasons which may be assumed to have led to the enactment, I would not feel warranted in introducing such a limitation by construction, especially in the case of a remedial statute. I shall therefore allow the evidence.

The wife of the panel having been warned that although competent she was not compellable as a witness, and having intimated her willingness to give evidence, was sworn and examined.

THE JURY found the panel guilty of culpable homicide, and he was thereupon sentenced to three years' penal servitude.

Procedure—Review—Conviction and Sentence—Form of Sentence.—Where several persons were convicted on the same complaint of an offence and each adjudged to pay a fine, and in default of payment warrant was granted to poind their goods, the sentence was so worded as to be capable of being read to the effect that if any one of the persons failed to pay his fine the goods of all might be poinded. Conviction quashed.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Trayner. Ld. Moncreiff.

HUGH MACLEMAN and nine other fishermen of Cromarty were tried summarily in the Sheriff Court at Dingwall, on a complaint at the instance of Walter Ross Taylor Middleton, clerk to the Conan District Fishery Board, of having committed an offence within the meaning of 7 and 8 Vict. c. 95, section 1, Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1844, and were convicted.

The conviction and sentence, after setting forth the conviction of the ten accused of the contravention libelled, proceeded in these terms:—"And therefore adjudges each of them to forfeit and pay the sum of £2, 10s. sterling of modified penalty, and, in default of payment thereof within fourteen days from this date, grants warrant for recovery of the said sums by poinding of their goods and effects, and summary sale thereof, as provided by the Act 44 and 45 Victoria, cap. 33, section 8, subsection 2, and the Act 1st Victoria, cap. 41, section 20, therein referred to, and appoints a return or execution of such poinding and sale to be made within eight days from the expiration of the period herein allowed for payment, under certification of imprisonment for the period of twenty days in default of payment or recovery of the said sums, with the expenses of diligence, before the time allowed for such report."

The accused brought a bill of suspension, and pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The conviction is incompetent, illegal, and inept, and in particular, in the event of any of the parties complained against and convicted failing to pay the fine imposed upon him, all the parties were put under liability to have their goods poinded for recovery of the fines imposed upon the others, and also to be imprisoned for the space of twenty days.

In support of this plea counsel for the complainers referred to Allan v. Lamb.[1]

Counsel for respondent argued that warrant of poinding could only be granted in respect of such sums as had not been paid, and could therefore only affect defaulters. The intention was quite clear.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—No one can look at this conviction and sentence without seeing that it is very loosely worded. It convicts ten persons named, and adjudges each of them to pay the sum of £2, 10s., and then in default of payment thereof proceeds to grant warrant for recovery of "the said sums" by poinding of their goods and effects. Then follows a certification of imprisonment in default of payment or recovery of "the said sums." This is grammatically wrong and misleading. It can be read in two senses besides the simple sense that the alternative lies against each only on his own failure to pay the fine. In the first place, it may be read as meaning that if any one of the ten convicted persons makes default in payment of his fine, the goods of the whole ten may be poinded for its recovery. In the second place, it may be taken as meaning that if there are certain defaulters the goods of all these defaulters can be poinded to pay the fine of each of them. No doubt the objection is very technical. The intention of the Sheriff-substitute is plain, that each shall answer for his own default only. But as I have said this intention is very badly expressed. Sufficient care has not been taken to see that the judgment is so expressed as not to be capable of being reasonably construed in a way which would involve a miscarriage of justice. In Allan v. Lamb,[1] we see that our brethren in this Court, who sat in a case somewhat similar, were of opinion that such an objection to the judgment would have been serious if timeously taken. Thinking, as I do, that it is important that Judges in the inferior Courts should in their convictions and sentences express their intention clearly, so as not to admit of its being misread in any substantial particular, I think this sentence should be quashed.

[1] Allan v. Lamb, Dec. 7, 1900, ante (Just. Cases), 15.

Macleman v. Middleton.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with your Lordship.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am very reluctant to set aside a conviction and sentence where the previous proceedings have been regular and there is no doubt as to the intention of the Sheriff. At the same time a conviction and sentence must be fit to stand close scrutiny. In the present case the complaint properly distinguishes the case of each of the accused. But when we come to the conviction we find language used which, by putting a strict construction on it, can be construed as meaning that if any one of the prisoners fails to pay the fine imposed upon him, then the goods of the whole ten may be poinded. A little care would have prevented this, and I am not prepared to uphold a conviction capable of such a construction.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Trayner. Ld. Moncreiff.

ANDREW KENNETH M'DOUALL, of Logan, Logan House, Wigtownshire, "with consent and concurrence of John Marquis Rankin, solicitor, Stranraer, Procurator-fiscal of Court at Stranraer," served a complaint upon "James Cochrane, fisherman, residing at Cairngaan, Kirkmaiden parish, Wigtownshire, being a person having a right of killing ground game on the farm after mentioned, under the Act after mentioned, having been authorised to that effect by the occupier of the said farm, who as tenant under the complainer, the landlord thereof, has a concurrent right with the complainer of killing ground game on said farm," in which it was charged against the accused that he did "on 25th December 1900, in several fields on the farm of Barncorkrie, in said parish, occupied by Hugh M'Clymont, farmer, residing there, employ for the purpose of killing ground game fifty-four or thereby spring traps elsewhere than in rabbit holes, viz., on the open surface of the ground— . . . contrary to the Ground Game Act, 1880, section 6, whereby the said James Cochrane is on summary conviction liable in respect of each of said contraventions to a penalty not exceeding £2."

On 7th March 1901 the Sheriff-substitute at Stranraer (Watson) dismissed the complaint as irrelevant, in respect that it had not been brought at the instance of the public prosecutor alone.

The complainer appealed, the following question of law being stated for the opinion of the High Court:—"Has the appellant, as proprietor and landlord of the lands in question, a sufficient interest and title to prosecute, with the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal, the contraventions libelled, or can the contraventions libelled only be prosecuted at the instance of the public prosecutor?"

Argued for the appellant;—The Act was silent as to who might prosecute, and therefore anyone who, like the appellant, could qualify an interest could prosecute with the concurrence of the fiscal.[1] The case of Bedford[2] decided nothing to the contrary. There the private prosecutor was not proprietor of the lands on which the alleged contravention of the Act took place, and could qualify no interest.

Argued for the respondent;—No doubt the complainer as proprietor had an interest, but that did not give him a title to prosecute, and the concurrence of the public prosecutor could not cure that defect in his title.[2]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have no doubt that the instance in this complaint was good. It is a general principle of our law that in criminal offences, whether statutory or at common law, the party injured has the right of prosecution provided he can obtain the concurrence of the public prosecutor. It is true that in certain cases of statutory offences the statute expressly excludes private prosecution, and leaves the matter entirely to the public authority. That is not done by the statute founded on here. In this case there can be no doubt about the interest of the private party prosecuting, and having the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal his title is undoubtedly good.

M'Douall v. Cochrane.

We were referred to the case of the Duke of Bedford v. Kerr,[1] and especially to the opinion expressed by Lord Adam, as justifying the Sheriff in throwing out this case. Now, as regards that case Lord Adam's opinion may easily be misread unless it be read altogether. In the earlier part of his opinion he deals with the case not of a party injured, but with the right to sue of a common informer. In the latter part of his opinion he finds that the interest of the party suing in that case was so remote as to place him outside the class of persons having an interest as the injured persons, and therefore outside the class of persons entitled to prosecute when they can get the necessary concurrence.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur. I think the rule regarding the right of private prosecution is as laid down by Lord Moncreiff in the case of Burns v. Turner.[2]

LORD MONCREIFF.—The contravention charged being that the traps were used elsewhere than in rabbit holes on the complainer's land, he had an interest as landlord to prosecute, and having obtained the concurrence of the public prosecutor his title to raise the complaint is clearly good. We must answer the question put to us accordingly.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed.

(1),—"The council of a county may from time to time make such bye-laws as to them seem meet for the administration of the affairs of the county, for the prevention of vagrancy, and for prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of any Act in force throughout the county, and may thereby appoint such penalties, not exceeding in any case five pounds, as they deem necessary for the punishment of offences against the same."

A bye-law made by a County Council was in the following terms:—"Betting on roads.—No person shall frequent and use any road or other public place, on behalf either of himself or of any other person, for the purpose of bookmaking or betting, or wagering, or agreeing to bet or wager with any person, or paying or receiving or settling bets."

vened "the bye-law, under the heading 'Betting on Roads,'* made by the County Council of Lanarkshire in virtue of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, section 57 (1),† by frequenting and using" a certain road in the county of Lanark for the purpose of betting.

The accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint, in respect that the bye-law founded on was illegal, as going beyond the powers conferred by the 57th section of the Local Government Act upon the County Council.

The Justices repelled the objection, and after a proof convicted the accused and adjudged him to pay £5 of a penalty, and in default to be imprisoned for twenty days.

Slowey brought a suspension, and pleaded;—The said conviction and sentence ought to be suspended simpliciter, and the respondent ordered to repay to the complainer the amount of said penalty, in respect that the bye-law founded on was ultra vires of the County Council, and that the complaint founded thereon was therefore irrelevant.

Argued for the complainer;—The bye-law was ultra vires of the County Council. The only ground on which betting could be suppressed was that of nuisance. Betting, however, could not in all cases be a nuisance; and the bye-law went too far, for under it persons might be convicted who could not in any reasonable sense be said to be guilty of nuisance. To make the bye-law good it would require the addition of "to the annoyance of the lieges."[1]

Argued for the respondent;—The County Council had not exceeded their powers. "Frequenting and using" for betting was a nuisance, and the suppression of it was part of the "administration of the affairs of the county." A similar bye-law in respect of similar powers had been judicially sanctioned in England.[2]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am quite unable to see that this bye-law was ultra vires of the County Council.

With regard to the cases quoted from England, if they apply at all, they certainly apply quite in the direction of this prosecution. I do not see that there is any substantial difference between the words of the two statutes—"the administration of the affairs of the county" and "the good government of the county"—as it is expressed in the English Statute.

That the County Council can make a bye-law for the purpose of preventing people from frequenting the roads in the county for the purpose of carrying on betting, I have no doubt. It is admitted that it may be a nuisance, and the question whether in a particular case it was an injury to the interests of the public under the bye-law was for the Magistrates, and it is not said that they exercised their discretion wrongly if the bye-law was not ultra vires of the County Council. I think it was not ultra vires, and therefore I am for refusing this suspension.

LORD TRAYNER.—I cannot say that the bye-law in question is ultra vires of the Council, or is in excess of the power conferred upon them. I agree with your Lordship that the words "the administration of the affairs of the county" are general enough to cover such a bye-law as the County Council have issued. There does not appear to be any real difference between a provision which authorises the issue of bye-laws for the "administration of the affairs of the county," and one which authorises bye-laws for "the good government of the county," the language used in some of the statutes in force in England.

I am therefore of opinion with your Lordship that the only objection stated in this suspension, viz., that the bye-law was ultra vires of the Local Authority, should not be sustained.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. I think the bye-law was not ultra vires of the County Council.

I am indifferent whether the power under which the bye-law was framed was the power conferred for the administration of the affairs of the county or for the suppression of nuisances. I rather incline to the former. I think it is within the power of the County Council, in the administration of the affairs of the county, to resolve that they will put a stop to the habitual use of the roads and other public places within the county for the purpose of betting. That was this object of the bye-law, and I think it cannot be fairly read without seeing that that is its meaning. It does not refer to or strike at a casual meeting between persons who may have made a bet, and one of whom stops the other and pays him. But it refers to frequenting and using the road—that is to say, the habitual using of it for a considerable time and for the purpose of carrying on betting transactions.

I have no hesitation in holding that this bye-law was within the powers of the County Council.

THE COURT refused the bill of suspension.

ROBERT PHILLIPS, merchant, Kames, by a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1861, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, at the instance of the respondent, Dugald Currie, yachtsman, Kames, in the Sheriff Court at Dunoon, was charged with a contravention of 1 Vict. cap. 41, sec. 20, it being alleged that he had intromitted with certain poinded articles in fraudem of Currie's hypothec.

Before the accused was called on to plead at the trial his agent took various objections to the relevancy of the complaint, and lodged a note thereof. The Sheriff-substitute (Martin) did not deal with these objections at once, but reserved consideration of them till after proof had been led, and called on the accused to plead, which he did by pleading not guilty. Proof was led, and thereafter the Sheriff-substitute repelled the objections to the relevancy, and found the accused guilty of the contravention charged. No objection was taken at the trial by the agent for the accused to the course of procedure adopted by the Sheriff-substitute in relation to the objection to relevancy.

A suspension was brought by the accused, in which, after stating facts as above set forth, he pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The Sheriff-substitute acted improperly in departing from the statutory procedure in reserving the objections to the relevancy till after he heard the evidence.*

Argued for the complainer;—The course adopted by the Sheriff-substitute was prejudicial to the complainer, was irregular, and contrary to statute, and the irregularity was such as to vitiate the whole proceedings.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—Section 14 of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864 laid down no rule for dealing with objections to relevancy. No objection was stated by the complainer's agent at the trial to the course taken by the Sheriff-substitute, and there was no injustice. It was at least open to the Court now to consider the relevancy and see whether there was injustice. In the absence of any imperative rule as to procedure as to relevancy, and no prejudice having been suffered by the accused, the conviction should stand.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The question is, whether the statutory procedure prescribed in section 14 of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, is imperative or not. I do not think that this Court should sanction the procedure followed in this case. The provisions in section 14 look as if they were imperative. They prescribe the order of the proceedings. A regular sequence is laid down. If no objections are stated to the competency or relevancy of the complaint, or if such objections having been stated are repelled, the accused's plea shall then be recorded, and if the plea is not guilty, the prosecutor is to proceed to establish his complaint by evidence. In no criminal Court has it ever been recognised that in dealing with a criminal charge a prisoner is to go to trial not knowing whether the Judge holds the charge relevant or not. A judgment on the relevancy of the charge is an essential preliminary to going on with the trial by hearing evidence. It would be a most dangerous thing to sanction the view that a Judge may at his discretion reserve questions of relevancy and proceed with the trial without dealing with objections stated to the relevancy. It would be extremely prejudicial from the point of view of the administration of justice. A man who was tried on an irrelevant indictment could never be tried afterwards. He would have tholed his assize. It would also be very unfortunate in the interest of prisoners that a prisoner should in any circumstances be sent to trial when it is not clear whether the charge made against him is relevant. Indeed, I do not understand how evidence can be led before the relevancy of the complaint is established. I am aware that in many cases where the departure from regular procedure is trivial, and can cause no real injury, or where the party himself or his agent is to blame, this Court is unwilling to interfere. On the other hand, where the departure is serious, it is necessary to enforce regularity. I hold that objections taken to the relevancy of the charge must be dealt with before proceeding with the trial, and that failure to deal with and dispose of objections taken to relevancy before evidence is allowed is an illegality constituting a good ground of suspension.

* Section 14 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), enacts as follows:—"Where the respondent shall be present at the hearing, the substance of the complaint shall be read to him, and he shall thereupon be required to plead in common form, and the respondent may then state objections to the competency or relevancy of the complaint or proceedings, and if no objections are stated, or if such objections are stated and repelled . . . the respondent's plea shall then . . . be recorded, and the plea, if the same be guilty, shall be signed by the respondent . . . and if the plea be not guilty the prosecutor or complainer shall proceed to establish his complaint by such evidence as is competent, and the respondent may, if he think fit, lead such evidence as is competent, after which the Court shall pronounce judgment at the same or any adjourned diet."

Police—Street—Bye-law regulating carriage traffic—Loitering—Relevancy.—A bye-law, framed by the magistrates of a burgh, provided that "no driver of any carriage shall stand or loiter with the same . . . in any street or place not appropriated as a public stand except at places of public amusement or entertainment, and on the occasion thereof." A driver was charged with a contravention of the bye-law in so far as he did, on a certain date, with a horse and hackney carriage, loiter in a certain public street, not being a public stand nor at a place of public entertainment, and drive slowly up and down said street within a distance of 100 yards during a period of seventeen minutes, for the purpose of inviting or picking up passengers.

Held that the charge was relevant.

Fairfoul v. Somerville, Oct. 25, 1895, 23 R. (Just. Cases) 6, 2 Adam, 13, distinguished.

PETER MURPHY was charged under a complaint in the Central District Police Court, Glasgow, with a contravention of the following bye-law for the regulation of hackney carriages. The bye-law, number 45, was in these terms:—"No driver of any carriage shall stand or loiter with the same in any of the squares, streets, or places appropriated as public stands, at the time when the full number of carriages authorised to ply on the respective stands shall be thereon, or in any street or place not appropriated as a public stand, except at places of public amusement or entertainment, and on the occasion thereof,"

HIGH COURT Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Trayner. Ld. Moncreiff.

The complaint bore that the accused "did, on the 4th day of April 1901, loiter in Gordon Street, Glasgow, from 3.55 to 4.12 P.M. with a horse and licensed hackney carriage, and drive slowly up and down said street, within a distance of only 100 yards in said period of seventeen minutes, for the purpose of picking up or inviting passengers whose names and addresses are to the complainer unknown, to travel by his said carriage, said street not being appropriated as a public stand, and not being at a place of public amusement or entertainment on the occasion thereof."

At the trial objection was taken to the relevancy of the complaint, but was repelled, and the accused thereafter pleaded not guilty, but evidence having been heard, was convicted of the contravention charged.

The accused craved a case, which was stated. It set forth,—"On the date libelled the appellant, who is a licensed hackney carriage driver, drove his horse and hackney carriage back and forward along that part of Gordon Street, Glasgow, extending from Hope Street to Renfield Street, the space between these two streets measuring nearly 100 yards. Gordon Street is a busy thoroughfare, and the part referred to is opposite to the carriage entrance to a principal railway station, but there was no proof—as there was no averment—of obstruction to the traffic. Including the space occupied or covered in turning, the appellant thus described an orbit of an elliptical shape which would amount in circumference to rather under 200 yards—viz., 80 yards going east, nearly 20 yards turning, 80 yards going west, and nearly 20 yards turning. The appellant went round this orbit three times in the period of time libelled, or within seventeen minutes. In so driving he kept to his proper side in accordance with the rules of driving. He drove at a walking pace, except when compelled to stop owing to the traffic. This was done for the purpose of picking up or inviting passengers to travel by his hackney carriage, and the said street was not appropriated as a public stand, and was not at a place of public amusement or entertainment."

The questions of law for the opinion of Court were,—"(1) Was the complaint relevant? (2) Did the facts held as proved amount to loitering, and thus constitute a contravention of the bye-law libelled?"

Argued for the appellant;—There was neither averment nor proof of any obstruction to traffic, and neither the case as libelled, nor the facts as proved, could warrant the conviction.[1]

Counsel for the respondent were not called upon.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The Magistrate had, in my opinion, perfectly sufficient grounds for his conclusion. The case of Fairfoul[1] was the case of a large vehicle—a char-à-banc—intended to pick up passengers from time to time until it got its full complement. Such a vehicle as that could not get filled up except by driving up and down picking up passengers, or by standing at a particular spot. This is the case of a cabman, whose duty it is when he comes off any job to place himself at a cab-stand fixed by the Magistrates. Instead of that he went up and down within a narrow area, and kept going round and round in this small orbit in the endeavour to pick up a fare. The question of the space within which he was moving is a very important element. It is one thing to move round in an orbit of 200 yards as here, and another thing to drive along from the one end of Princes Street to the other. Then again, if one cabman is to be allowed to act in this way every cabman must be allowed to do so, whereas it is the duty of every cabman, as I have said, to take up his position on a stand until he is hired. The case of Fairfoul,[1] for this reason, in no way rules this case.

LORD TRAYNER.—The case of Fairfoul[1] settles nothing except that in the particular circumstances there before the Court loitering was not established. As I did in the case of Fairfoul,[1] I confine myself strictly to answering the questions that are put to us. I think (1) that the complaint is relevant, and (2) that the facts proved amounted to loitering, and thus constituted a contravention of the bye-law libelled.

shillings, or to imprisonment not exceeding fourteen days, in terms of sections 70 and 71 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872."*

The accused pleaded not guilty, but after evidence had been led the Magistrate convicted him of the contravention charged, and adjudged him to pay a penalty of ten shillings, and the sum of one pound of expenses, with the alternative of fourteen days' imprisonment.

He brought a suspension, in which he stated, inter alia,—(Stat. 6) At the diet "the respondent Scott was not present in Court. He sent his clerk, Mr David Cameron, to conduct the proceedings and move for sentence. The said David Cameron had no title or mandate or qualification to prosecute. He is not a law-agent, and he held no authority from the School Board of the parish of Drainie to prosecute." (Stat. 10) "No certificate had been issued by the School Board to the prosecutor of failure to educate, in terms of 69 and 70 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, or at all events it was not produced as evidence."

The complainer pleaded;—The said conviction and sentence are illegal, unwarrantable, and oppressive, and ought to be suspended, in respect—(1) The said David Cameron had no title or authority to prosecute; (4) The condition-precedent to said prosecution and said conviction and sentence in the form of a certificate under sections 69 and 70 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, had not been fulfilled.

The respondent, Scott, stated that he was procurator-fiscal of the Police Court as well as the person appointed by the School Board of Drainie to prosecute under the Education Acts, and that his clerk David Cameron had authority to act as his deputy as procurator-fiscal. The certificate quoted below † was stated in the minute of proceedings signed by the Magistrate to have been produced at the trial.

Thomson v. Scott.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case five or six very serious objections are stated against the proceedings before the Magistrates, but it will be sufficient if I deal with two of those on which we have heard counsel for the respondents.

The first of these objections is, that it being necessary to any such prosecution that there be a certificate from the School Board, the certificate produced mentions two children nominatim, but does not say who they were or what was their relationship to the accused. That in itself would constitute a fatal objection, but we find further that the certificate, when making direct reference to the failure to undertake to provide education only mentions "the said child" in the singular, and similarly when the board certifies that the failure was without reasonable excuse, it is "for the said child." It is said that there is a space left in each case, and that it was only per incuriam that the necessary alteration of "child" into "children" was not made. That may quite well be, but the certificate as it stands is unintelligible, and the objection taken is fatal to the proceedings, for this simple reason, that nothing can be held to be certified except as regards one child, and there is no means of knowing which. The complaint is as to two children, and the whole basis of the prosecution therefore falls.

The second objection is also very serious. The School Board have power under the Act of Parliament, if they see fit, to appoint a person to act for them in prosecutions under the Act. Here they appointed William Scott, and this complaint bears to be brought by William Scott, "the person appointed by the School Board of the parish," to prosecute. That being why he had failed to perform the duty of providing efficient elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic for James Henderson and Ellen Thomson; and whereas the said James Thomson failed to appear at the said meeting and to satisfy the said board that he had reasonable excuse for such failure, and has not undertaken to the satisfaction of the said board to perform such duty by forthwith providing such elementary education for the said child: Therefore the said School Board do hereby, in terms of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, as amended by section 28 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1878, and section 5 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1883, certify that the said James Thomson has been for a period of at least one month prior to this date without reasonable excuse failing to discharge the duty of providing efficient elementary education as required by the said Acts for the said child, and direct their clerk to transmit this certificate to William Scott, solicitor, Elgin, the person appointed by the said school board to prosecute in terms of the said Acts. Signed in name and by authority of the Board this 13th day of March 1901. C. TULLOCH, Chairman of School Board."

the instance in this prosecution, William Scott was bound to appear in Court to prosecute. If he did not appear, no other person had any title to appear for him. No doubt, according to the reasonable practice of our law, if circumstances, such as ill-health, prevent the prosecutor from being present, the prosecution will not necessarily fall. In such a case the Court may appoint a prosecutor pro hac vice to proceed with the prosecution. Here we are told that when the case came on for trial the prosecutor did not attend, but sent a clerk to represent him. That was quite incompetent. It is said that he was procurator-fiscal as well as School Board prosecutor, and that as procurator-fiscal he could have raised these proceedings, and that his clerk had authority to act as his deputy as procurator-fiscal. That is not the question here. The instance in the complaint is not that of procurator-fiscal, but of the person appointed by the School Board, and the proceedings are therefore quite irregular. This suspension must be sustained.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. A certificate by the school board is a necessary precedent to a prosecution such as we have here. The certificate produced is insufficient, and the prosecution necessarily falls.

The second objection is equally fatal. In a criminal trial there is no instance where the prosecutor fails to appear. This complaint appears to be brought by Mr Scott as the person specially appointed by the School Board. It may be that he is at the same time procurator-fiscal of the burgh, but he does not sue this complaint as procurator-fiscal. He sues as appointee of the School Board, and as such he has no power to delegate his authority.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree with your Lordships on both points.

THE COURT passed the bill, and suspended the conviction and sentence.

M'Alpine & Sons v. Ronaldson.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Trayner. Ld. Moncreiff.

A SUMMARY complaint in the Sheriff Court at Paisley, at the instance of John Ronaldson, H.M. Inspector of Mines, West of Scotland District, and as such vest with the powers of an inspector under the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895, in terms of sec. 3 (a) of the Quarries Act, 1894, set forth "That Robert M'Alpine & Sons, 188 St Vincent Street, Glasgow, who are the owners and occupiers of Williamwood Quarry, near Giffnock, Renfrewshire, being a quarry within the meaning of the said Quarries Act, 1894, and to which the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895, apply," were guilty of a contravention of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, section 5 (3), as amended by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, section 6 (2).

The minutes of procedure upon the complaint bore:—"At Paisley, upon the 9th day of April 1901 years, in presence of William Darling Lyell, Esquire, advocate, Sheriff-substitute of Renfrew and Bute, Robert M'Alpine & Sons, complained against, failed to appear after having been duly summoned. WILL. DARLING LYELL."

The minutes of procedure then set forth that certain witnesses were examined in support of the complaint, and a conviction and sentence pronounced in the following terms:—"In respect of the evidence adduced, convicts the said Robert M'Alpine & Sons of the contravention charged, and therefore adjudges them to forfeit and pay the sum of £10 sterling of penalty, and in respect that said sum is now paid at the bar, finds it unnecessary to pronounce further, and decerns."

Robert M'Alpine & Sons brought a suspension, in which they stated, inter alia;—(1) "The complainers carry on an extensive business as contractors in Glasgow and elsewhere, their head office being at 188 St Vincent Street, Glasgow. There are four partners of the firm, and at the date of the institution of the proceedings and conviction after mentioned the senior partner was confined to his house in Glasgow, suffering from a cold, and the other three partners were engaged on contracts which the firm were executing in England, Ireland, and Ayrshire respectively. The complainers employ as their business manager and cashier Mr J. D. Ferguson, who has been in their employment for upwards of ten years." (3) "On 3d April 1901 the complainers were served with" the complaint above mentioned. "The complaint was delivered to and received by the said J. D. Ferguson, in the complainers' office on said 3d April, the execution of service being in the following terms:—'To Robert M'Alpine & Sons, 188 St Vincent Street, Glasgow.—Take notice, that you are required to appear personally at the place and time specified in the warrant, of which the foregoing is a copy, to answer to the complaint to which this notice is attached, with certification. This I do on the 3d day of April 1901 years. Chas. Hesketh, officer of Court,' and the execution of service bears that the service was made on the said J. D. Ferguson, cashier, 49 Park Road, Glasgow (his house address), at 188 St Vincent Street aforesaid." (4) "The diet of compearance was fixed for the 9th of April at the Sheriff Court House in Paisley, and the said Mr J. D. Ferguson, on behalf of and as authorised by the complainers, attended the Court to conduct their defence." The complainers then narrated the procedure above set forth. (6) "The said conviction and the proceedings anterior to the same were most unjust, irregular, and grossly oppressive. It was impossible for the complainers as a firm to obey the citation; and if the respondent objected to their being represented by their responsible manager, who had been recognised in the citation of them, it was the duty of the respondent, before proceeding with the case, to have offered an adjournment, so that the accused, in view of the objection taken, might have made arrangements which would have been unobjectionable to the respondent, whereby they could have been heard in their defence. The respondent, however, not only failed to inform Mr Ferguson that he was entitled to an adjournment, but insisted on proceeding with the case on the footing that the complainers had failed to appear, and obtained a conviction accordingly."

The respondent did not dispute the substantial accuracy of the statements in the bill of suspension. He stated that Mr Ferguson, the complainers' manager, was told by the Sheriff-substitute that while he could not be officially recognised as representing the accused, any questions which he desired to have put would be put from the bench.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The procedure here has been unfortunate. The accused is a firm consisting of a number of partners. Personal citation of the firm being impracticable, the service of the complaint bears to have been executed by delivery of the complaint to Mr Ferguson, the firm's cashier, within the office of the firm. When the inducia on this citation expired Mr Ferguson appeared to represent the firm, stating that he was the firm's manager and cashier. The Sheriff-substitute, however, refused to recognise him as the firm's representative, and proceeded with the trial on the footing that the accused had failed to appear. Now, the accused being a firm, could only be present by someone authorised to represent it. There is no rule of law requiring the representative of a firm to be a partner of the firm. All that was required was that the person appearing should be duly authorised to appear and represent the firm. Now, if Mr Ferguson was manager, he not only was a competent representative of the firm, but he was the best and most appropriate person to represent the firm. In my opinion the Sheriff-substitute went wrong in law in not allowing Ferguson to appear as representing the firm. That is sufficient to dispose of the case.

There is, however, another point which may not be applicable in every case, but is applicable where, as here, there is no suggestion of mala fides. Where the accused firm has bona fide made an effort to be represented at the trial, and the Sheriff has reasons for not being satisfied with the person whom the firm has sent as its representative, I think it would be advisable to allow an adjournment. There is no reason why he should at once proceed to try them in absence, and put them to the disadvantage of having no defence stated.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of opinion that the complainers were properly and duly represented by their manager, and consequently that the Sheriff was wrong in the course he took.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree with your Lordship on both points.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

Opinions per Lord Moncreiff (1) that it was not competent for the common debtor in an action of furthcoming to plead objections which were competent and omitted in the action in which the decree on which the furthcoming was based was pronounced, whether such decree was a decree in foro or in absence; and (2) that a decree of Court founded on by a party to a process is not a "deed or writing," in the sense of section 11 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1877, which can be set aside in the Sheriff Court by way of exception.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Trayner. Ld. Moncreiff.

ON 13th February 1900 John Neil, farmer, Maryfield, Blairgowrie, obtained decree in the Sheriff Court at Perth for £21, 11s. 6d., in an action under the Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867, against David M'Nair, farm-bailiff, Grange Farm, Worsley, Lancashire, executor-dative of the late Robert M'Nair, Errichtbank Cottage, Rattray. The decree decerned and ordained instant execution by arrestment.

Of the sum in the decree £13 was paid to account. Thereafter, on 4th May 1900, arrestments were used in the hands of John Sidey Nelson, solicitor, Blairgowrie, for the balance of £8, 11s. 6d., and on 11th May Neil brought an action of furthcoming for this balance in the Sheriff Court at Perth, under the Small Debts (Scotland) Act, 1831, against M'Nair and Nelson.

On 20th July 1900 the Sheriff-substitute (Sym) dismissed the summons of furthcoming.

Neil appealed to the High Court of Justiciary.

In his note of appeal the appellant stated:—"On the case being called in Court before Mr Sheriff-substitute Sym, respondents' agent objected to the summons on the plea of res judicata, which objection the Sheriff-substitute repelled, and ordered the case out for proof on the merits on 20th July 1900. The defences stated on the merits were that the appellant had agreed to accept a dividend on his claim against the said executry estate, and had acquiesced in regarding the said executry estate as a trust for creditors, upon which he was to rank as an ordinary creditor. After hearing the evidence of the appellant and one witness for the appellant, and the respondent Nelson, and one witness for respondents, the Sheriff-substitute repelled the defences stated on the merits, but he brevi manu granted decree dismissing the said furthcoming summons on the ground, it is believed, that said debts-recovery decree on 13th February 1900, which contained the warrant for the arrestment which preceded the furthcoming summons, had been allowed, in error, to pass unopposed owing to a misunderstanding on the part of the respondents' agent, who had been, the Sheriff-substitute believed, unintentionally misled by the appellant's agent, to the effect that the appellant would agree to accept a dividend upon his claim."

M'Nair.

The appellant set forth that he sought relief for the following reasons:—"Firstly, It was incompetent and ultra vires for the Sheriff-substitute to have considered the merits of, or the circumstances under which, the debts-recovery decree referred to was granted—that decree being ex facie regular and a valid warrant for the arrestment by virtue of which the furthcoming summons was brought. Secondly, The effect of the decision to the appellant is oppressive, and has prevented substantial justice being done to him within the meaning of section 31 of the Small Debt Act, 1837 (1 Vict. cap. 41), and in respect that he is barred from again using arrestments in the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of Perthshire on the warrant contained in said debts-recovery decree, or from doing any diligence upon it which could be brought under the review of the Sheriff Court of Perthshire. Thirdly, In dismissing said furthcoming summons the Sheriff-substitute was wilfully and oppressively deviating in point of form from statutory enactments contained in section 9 of the said Small Debt Act, and in respect that he was annulling and practically suspending said decree previously granted by himself on 13th February 1900, and which could only legally be annulled or suspended on cause shewn, after reponing, or by a process of suspension in the Justiciary Court."

On 18th March 1901 the Court (the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord M'Laren, and Lord Pearson), after hearing parties, remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to report as to the procedure in the summons of furthcoming, and the facts and circumstances which occurred when that summons was dismissed.

On 21st March the Sheriff-substitute reported.*

* The Sheriff-substitute's report set forth, inter alia, as follows:—"Until receipt of your Lordships' interlocutor, with copy appeal and appendix, I had not seen the appeal, nor had I seen any of the documents since 20th July 1900. It is therefore with some hesitation as to the completeness of my recollection that I give the following report.

"It was maintained that the question of the furthcoming was res judicata, as the note of appeal states. After that contention was repelled proof was led. The matter sought to be proved on the one hand was, that the decree in absence in the debts-recovery action (upon which decree the arrestment proceeded) was obtained in consequence of an agreement between a Mr M'Alpine, writer, agent for the appellant Neil, and a Mr Nelson, writer, agent for M'Nair's executor, that a defence which the latter had stated to the debts-recovery action should be withdrawn, and that Neil should obtain decree, but only on the undertaking that the decree should be used to constitute a debt solely against the estate of the deceased M'Nair. On the other hand it was attempted to be shewn that Mr M'Alpine had agreed to recommend this to Neil merely, and that Neil had subsequently refused to agree, and had instructed an arrestment and furthcoming to be used.

"In law it was maintained on the one hand that Mr M'Alpine could by the alleged agreement bind his client Neil, and on the other hand that that was beyond the ordinary scope of a law-agent's powers without previous special authority.

"On the matter of fact, I was of opinion (without imputing to Mr M'Alpine any desire to misstate the truth according to his recollection) that he had agreed that the decree should be treated as one of constitution, but that he had no previous authority so to do. It was for that reason that the other party did not attend and oppose.

"In law, I was of opinion that it was beyond a law-agent's mandate to assent to such an arrangement, which was truly a compromise between Neill and M'Nair's executor, without previous authority.

"I considered, however, that Mr Nelson had withdrawn his defence,

M'Nair.

The parties were thereafter further heard. The nature of the arguments sufficiently appears from the opinion of Lord Moncreiff. The undernoted authorities were cited at the hearing.[1]

At advising,—

LORD MONCREIFF.—In this case the appellant John Neil obtained decree for £8, 11s. 6d. against the respondent David M'Nair as executor-dative of the late Robert M'Nair. That decree was pronounced on 13th February 1900, and was a decree under the Debts Recovery Act. Ex facie it was not qualified in any way. In the month of May thereafter the appellant raised in the Small Debt Court a summons of furthcoming, having previously arrested certain sums in the hands of the respondent Nelson by virtue of the warrant to arrest contained in the debts-recovery decree.

Now, it is averred by the appellant that in the process of furthcoming which followed the respondent M'Nair appeared and stated certain preliminary objections to the action; these the Sheriff-substitute repelled, but he allowed a proof as to certain defences stated on the merits. We are told that after proof had been led the Sheriff-substitute repelled the defences on the merits but dismissed the action on the ground that the decree in the debts-recovery action had been allowed to pass unopposed because the defender M'Nair had been unintentionally misled by the agent for the appellant, who had said that the decree would only be used as one of constitution, and that his client would agree to accept a dividend upon his claim.

On these statements this appeal came before this Court on 18th March last. On that occasion the Court, which was differently constituted, remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to report as to the course of procedure, and we have now to consider the case in the light of his report. I am not surprised that the Sheriff-substitute should indicate that his recollection of the case is not very clear, as a considerable time has elapsed since the action was before him. But on his report it seems to me that the result of his recollection of the facts is practically to confirm the statement made in the appeal and founded on by the appellant.

The Sheriff-substitute held that the appellant's agent had no authority to give such an undertaking; but he thought that previously to using arrestments on the decree the appellant knew the circumstances under which it had been obtained, and that he was therefore personally barred from thus because he believed, in consequence of what Mr M'Alpine had said, that the decree was to be treated as one of constitution only, that the agent who appeared for Neil and Neil knew this when the decree was taken, and that Neil was not in law and good faith justified in arresting and bringing a furthcoming on the decree when he knew that it had been allowed to pass in consequence of what his agent M'Alpine had represented on his behalf. The whole facts leading to this conclusion I cannot now pretend to detail. . . ."

enforcing the decree. On that ground the Sheriff-substitute dismissed the action of furthcoming, and we are asked to say whether in so doing he acted within his powers. I am of opinion that he did not, and that we must sustain this appeal.

The decree founded on in the action of furthcoming was a decree under the Debts Recovery Act, 1867. Certain modes of review are specified in that Act; and in particular, in the case of a decree in absence, there are provisions under which a party has the means of obtaining a sist and hearing within three months—section 7 of the Act of 1867, and section 16 of the Small Debt Act 1837, which is imported.

For decrees in foro provision is made for appeal on certain conditions from Sheriff-substitute to Sheriff and from the Sheriff to the Court of Session—sections 10, 11, 12, and 13. Then we come to section 17 of the Act, which is short and to the point—"No interlocutor, judgment, order, or decree pronounced under the authority of this Act shall be subject to reduction, suspension, or appeal, or any other form of review or stay of diligence, except as herein provided, on any ground whatever." That is quite as strong a limitation or rather exclusion of review as that contained in sections 30 and 31 of the Small Debt Act of 1837, to which reference was made at the debate. Although there was yet time to apply for a sist and hearing, even when the arrestment was used and furthcoming brought, the mode of review provided in the statute was not adopted in this case, and the decree with which we are dealing was therefore a final decree, and not subject to any kind of review, even by the Court of Session itself.

Such being the nature of the decree, what the Sheriff-substitute has done is on parole evidence in the Small Debt Court to refuse to give effect to a final decree of another Court. I do not say that in special cases, for instance where gross fraud is alleged and the party has had no opportunity of appealing, there may not be some mode in which the Supreme Court could in a formal process give redress against such a decree; but in the general case such a decree is not subject to review except in one of the statutory modes, and certainly is not liable to be set aside incidentally on parole evidence in the Small Debt Court.

This of itself is sufficient, but I shall notice two other points which were pleaded to us.

It is pleaded that the common debtor may in a furthcoming competently state all objections to the decree which he could have stated in the action in which decree was pronounced. This argument proceeds, I think, on a misapprehension. In the case of Donaldson v. Ord, 17 D. 1053, at p. 1065, to which we were referred yesterday, there is an exposition by the Lord Justice-Clerk of the nature and extent of the pleas available in a furthcoming following arrestment on a final decree—"The arrestee may have certain defences against giving up the fund, and others may have a preference by prior diligence; but of course the owner of the fund against whom a final decree for payment has been pronounced cannot be a competitor in such furthcoming with his creditor holding a final decree for payment. If the arrestment has not been laid on on a decree for payment, the common debtor may no doubt have objections to the right on which the arrestment is proceeding, but after trial of the arrester's right, and a decree for payment in foro, the owner of the fund is excluded." Later on he says,—"The reclaimers are the common debtors under this decree, which is one, beyond all doubt, for payment; and in the furthcoming they cannot raise points which were clearly competent and omitted in the action in which the decree was pronounced, even if well founded. Whether they could have obtained any limitation of the decree I need not inquire. Their attention was most specially directed to its terms and effects, as the correspondence shews; and in the full knowledge of its effect they acquiesced in it." His Lordship then proceeds to discuss the nature of the action of furthcoming in an instructive passage, which I need not quote. His Lordship is there speaking of a decree in foro, but I think the same considerations are applicable to the case of a decree in absence, where the debtor has not been reponed in terms of the statute. Of course the common debtor may state any objection which has arisen since the date of the decree.

This brings me to the argument stated to us, that the respondent was entitled by virtue of the provisions of section 11 of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1877 to state his objections to the decree by way of exception, without formally setting aside the decree by suspension or reduction. We were referred to the case of Wilson v. Glasgow Tramways,[1] where the late Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Gifford expressed the opinion that it was permissible in the Small Debt Court to set aside an agreement to refer to arbitration by way of exception and without formal reduction. Lord Ormidale was of a different opinion—at least he was not prepared to say that section 11 of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1877 applied to the Small Debt Court. That was my impression, but we cannot disregard the decision without further consideration. But assuming that the provisions of section 11 of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1877 do apply to the Small Debt Court, I do not think that they can be applied to the effect of disregarding the decree of a Court, and that the decree of another Court, though a Court within the same sheriffdom. I think the provision of the statute applies where a document such as a receipt or discharge is produced in evidence and founded on in an action; in such a case the document may be set aside by way of exception, but I know of no case where an ex facie regular decree of a Court which is the foundation of a process has been set aside by way of exception in the Sheriff Court. Such a decree is not "a deed or writing" in the sense of the Act.

On the whole case I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute has acted incompetently, and that we must, on the ground of incompetency, set aside his decree dismissing the furthcoming, and remit the case back to him for further procedure.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute for further procedure.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Trayner. Ld. Moncreiff.

WILLIAM JAMIESON, master of the steam-trawler "St Clement," of Aberdeen, the owner of which was Thomas Walker, fish-salesman, Aberdeen, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen on a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1861, and the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal, which charged him with having recklessly steered his vessel through the drift-nets and gear accessory thereto belonging to the fishing-boat "Surcouf," of Boulogne, France, the master of which was Auguste Bourgin, whereby 216 of the nets were destroyed, causing damage to the extent of £648, contrary to the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, section 4 (a), and article 19 of the schedule referred to therein, thereby rendering himself liable to a fine not exceeding £50, or to imprisonment for not more than three months.

Jamieson pleaded not guilty on 7th January 1901, and by interlocutor of the same date, the Sheriff-substitute (Burnett) adjourned the diet to 7th February 1901, but this interlocutor was never signed.

Subsequent to the diet of 7th January 1901, a notice, signed by the owner of the nets and other gear referred to in the complaint, was served upon the Sheriff-clerk, and upon the complainer, in the following terms:—"I hereby give you notice that at the trial of the offence complained of the Sheriff will be called upon to consider and dispose of the question of the damages done to the nets and other gear of the fishing-boat 'Surcouf,' No. 2485, of Boulogne, France, mentioned in the complaint.

On 7th February the case went to trial and evidence was led. The Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) thereafter adjourned the diet till 14th February, on which date, in respect of the evidence led, he convicted Jamieson of the contravention charged and fined him £25, with imprisonment for thirty days in default of payment. On the same date he pronounced a separate interlocutor, which, after narrating the conviction of Jamieson as aforesaid, and after certain findings in fact as to the loss of the nets and gear mentioned in the complaint, proceeded: "Finds that Auguste Bourgin, as owner of the nets and gear so lost, is entitled to compensation therefor, and assesses the amount of said compensation at £648 sterling, for which sum decerns and grants warrant for recovery of said sum of £648 by distress or poinding and sale of the said sea-fishing boat 'St Clement' and her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and any property on board thereof or belonging thereto, or any part thereof, in terms of section 20 (2) of the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, and section 8 of the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1885."

Where an offence has been committed by any person belonging to a British sea-fishing boat in Scotland, or in any part of the sea adjoining Scotland, against the Sea Fisheries Acts, whereby any injury is done by one sea-fishing boat to another, or the nets, lines, and gear thereof, or any of the apparatus used in fishing by the said boat, it shall be lawful for any sea-fishery officer to whom complaint is made by the party injured, verbally or in writing, . . . to prepare and sign a report to the Fishery Board setting forth succinctly the facts of the case and the amount of the damage done . . . and it shall be competent for either party in any legal proceedings that may be raised for the recovery of the damages or any part thereof, to call upon the Fishery Board to transmit such report to the Clerk of the Court in which such case is to be tried . . . and in any case in which the damage as found by the Sheriff before whom the case comes for trial shall exceed twelve pounds, appeal shall be competent as in ordinary cases before the Sheriff Court."

Section 8—"Subsection 1 of section 15 of the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, is hereby repealed. Where any offence is committed as set forth in section 7 hereof it shall be competent for the person whose property has been injured to give notice in writing to the person committing such offence, and to the Sheriff-clerk, that at the trial of said offence the Sheriff will be called upon to consider and dispose of the question of damages, and in such case the evidence led at said trial shall be evidence for the consideration of the Sheriff on the question of damages, and the Sheriff, at the conclusion of the said trial, shall proceed to consider and dispose of the question of compensation to the injured party, and if a report of a sea-fishery officer has been produced as set forth in section 7 hereof, the Sheriff shall not allow any additional evidence to be heard unless he shall consider it to be necessary in order to do justice in the case; and if he shall allow additional evidence, the accused person shall be allowed to be examined as a witness on the question of the amount of damages, and shall, if oral evidence is to be taken on the question of damages, allow the accused person to be examined as a witness on the question of damages, and shall, after hearing parties, give decree as in an ordinary action before the Sheriff Court."

decree awarding damages, and pleaded, inter alia,—(1) The trial of the accused not having been adjourned to a fixed date on said 7th January 1901, the proceedings thereupon fell, and the sentence or conviction and interlocutor or decree complained of are illegal and invalid, and ought to be suspended. (2) In any event the said sentence or conviction falls to be suspended.

Argued for the complainer;—The interlocutor adjourning the diet of 7th January not having been signed, there was no valid adjournment of that diet to a fixed date, and the subsequent proceedings were incompetent.[1] The conviction must therefore be quashed. The procedure for awarding compensation was purely statutory, and any award depended on conviction. If the conviction was null so was the award, and the Court of Justiciary might competently declare that it was so.[2]

Argued for the respondent Wilson;—It was conceded that the conviction could not stand. But the Court of Justiciary could not deal with the award of damages, which was declared by statute to be subject, not to suspension, but to appeal as in an ordinary action in the Sheriff Court. That and the fact that no imprisonment could follow failure to pay the amount awarded, excluded the jurisdiction of the High Court.

Argued for the respondent Bourgin;—The civil and criminal proceedings were separable. Although the Court might review the criminal proceedings, it had no jurisdiction to deal with the award of damages.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The fact that the interlocutor of 7th January 1901 purporting to adjourn the diet to 7th February 1901 is not signed is a sufficient reason for quashing this conviction. I do not think that, in view of the provisions of the Fisheries Acts, we in this Court can competently deal with the question whether the decree for damages pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute is valid. I propose that we pass the bill to the extent of quashing the conviction and sentence, and quoad ultra refuse the bill.

LORD TRAYNER.—The complainer was charged, at the instance of the respondent Wilson, with a contravention of the Sea Fisheries Act. Pending the complaint so brought against him, a notice was given to the complainer (in terms of a statutory provision) that at the trial of the offence with which he was charged the Sheriff would be asked to consider and dispose of a question of damages arising out of the alleged offence. The trial took place, and the complainer was convicted and fined £25, or in default of payment sentenced to imprisonment for thirty days. The Sheriff-substitute further, but in a separate interlocutor, found the complainer liable to the respondent Bourgin in the sum of £648 sterling as the compensation due to the latter for the damage sustained by him through the complainer's alleged offence. Warrant was granted for recovery of this sum by distress or poinding and sale of the sea-fishing boat "St Clement," of which the complainer was the master. This suspension is brought for the purpose of setting aside not only the conviction but also the decree for damages.

It is conceded by the respondent Wilson that the conviction cannot stand, for the reason assigned in the suspension, and to which your Lordship has adverted. I agree that the conviction must be quashed. But in my opinion it is not competent to this Court to hear or dispose of any objection to the validity of the decree for damages. By statutory enactment that decree is declared practically to be the same as a decree pronounced in an ordinary cause before the Sheriff, and is subject to appeal as if it had been pronounced in "an ordinary action before the Sheriff Court" (Act of 1885, secs. 7 and 8). I think that these enactments exclude review by the Justiciary Court of any such decree, and provide for such review being had in the ordinary Courts of law. Further, it will be observed that no sentence of imprisonment can be or has been pronounced in the event of the complainer failing to make payment of the damages decerned for. The only authorised mode of recovering the damages is by diligence as on a decree—the ordinary mode of recovering a civil debt. It is quite true that the claim and consequent decree for damages are by statute intimately connected with the complaint founded on the alleged offence, and it may be that the invalidity of the conviction involves invalidity in the decree. But on that I offer no opinion, for any such question, I think, must be determined by the Court before which the validity of the decree is challenged, on an appeal against it, or by suspension of any diligence threatened or proceeding upon it.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I at first thought that we could competently suspend not merely the conviction and sentence but the decree for compensation pronounced by the Sheriff of even date with the conviction. It seemed to me desirable that we should do so if it was competent, so as to save the parties the trouble and expense of going to the Civil Court in order to get rid of what is really a nullity.

The procedure under which the respondent Auguste Bourgin obtained decree of compensation from the Sheriff is purely statutory. It depends entirely upon the conviction, and stands or falls with it. It is so intimately connected with the conviction that under the provisions of the 8th section of the Sea Fisheries Amendment Act, 1885, the Sheriff who tries the criminal case may at its close be called upon to dispose of the question of damages, and in such a case must treat the evidence led at the criminal trial as evidence led on the question of damages, and if a report of a sea-fishery officer has been produced as to the amount of damages sustained, "the Sheriff shall not allow any additional evidence to be heard unless he shall consider it to be necessary in order to do justice in the case."

Now, as far as I can see this procedure is entirely dependent upon proof of an offence having been committed. But in the present case we have held that the whole proceedings came to a conclusion on 7th January 1901, and all the procedure which took place after that date, including the evidence which was led, and upon the strength of which in part the award of damages was made, was absolutely incompetent. Therefore as to the invalidity of the award of damages, I confess that at present I do not entertain much doubt.

But the question of jurisdiction is raised. It is said that under the 7th and 8th sections of the amending statute an appeal is competent "as in ordinary causes before the Sheriff Court," which points apparently to civil jurisdiction.

Now, I thought at first that it might be maintained that while there might be an appeal to the Civil Court as to the amount of damages if the conviction stood, it did not follow that if the conviction on which the award of damages depended was quashed, it would be necessary or competent to invoke the Civil Court. The conviction having fallen, the award of damages would be a nullity, and might be so declared by the High Court of Justiciary.

But on consideration I am not disposed to differ from the view which your Lordships have taken. Comparing the provisions of the 15th section, subsection (1), of the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, with the 7th and 8th sections of the Act of 1885, there are grounds for holding that the effect of the later statute was to substitute a civil for a criminal or quasi-criminal process as regarded damages. Under the Act of 1883 compensation was to be adjudged and recovered as a fine, while under the later Act the process was to be treated in the same manner as an ordinary cause in the Sheriff Court, with a right of appeal in certain cases. I may also observe that the claim for compensation might have been made under the 7th section in the shape of a separate application, and damages might have been awarded without the Sheriff proceeding upon the evidence adduced in the criminal case.

Therefore although it would simply cause unnecessary expense to proceed further in regard to the award of damages, I think that logically your Lordships are right, and in this Court we have no jurisdiction to deal with that part of the prayer of the bill of suspension.

THE COURT quashed the conviction and sentence, and quoad ultra refused the bill, finding the complainer entitled to his expenses in both Courts against the respondent Wilson, and Bourgin entitled in the High Court to expenses against the complainer.

Sec. 46—"For the purposes of this Act the limits of the shore or sea-coast adjacent to the mouth or entrance of the said river Annan shall be deemed to extend, and shall extend, from the west bank or side of the water of Sark on the east to the east bank or side of the water of Lochar on the west, including the whole sea coast within these limits from the land on the Scotch side at high-water mark of spring tides into the sea at low-water mark of spring tides."

Certain persons, being neither owners nor occupiers of salmon-fishings, and having no permission from any owner or occupier of salmon-fishings to fish for salmon within the limits of the Annan Fisheries Act, were convicted of a contravention of section 33 of that Act. They appealed. The case stated:—The accused had fished for salmon at a spot a short distance westward of Torduff Point, between the Sark and the Lochar. They had fished up to an hour and a quarter before low water. The sea had then receded several miles to the south-west of the spot in question, leaving the estuary of the Solway nearly all dry except for a channel of brackish water, which flowed down to the sea, and contained the water of various English rivers. The spot at which the accused were fishing was within this channel and on the Scotch side both of the medium filum of the channel and of the medium filum of the estuary of the Solway.

The Court dismissed the appeal, holding that the spot at which the appellants had been fishing was within the limits of the Annan Fisheries Act as defined by sec. 46 of the Act.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Adam. Lord M'Laren. Lord Kinnear. Lord Trayner. Ld. Moncreiff. Lord Kincairney.

ON 27th September 1899 Matthew Bryson, labourer, Lowtherton, Dumfriesshire, and six other persons, were charged in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries, on a summary complaint at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, setting forth that the accused, "not being the owners or occupiers of any fishery in the river Annan, or in any stream or water running into the same, or on the shores or sea-coast adjacent to the mouth or entrance of the said river, did, on 15th August 1899, in the said shores or sea coast, and at that part thereof at Torduff Point, Gretna parish, Dumfriesshire, being within the limits of the Annan Fisheries Act,* by means of halve-nets fish for, or attempt to take, or assist in fishing for or attempting to take, salmon, or other fish of the salmon kind; or did, time and place aforesaid, trespass in or upon said water with intent to take or kill salmon or fish of the salmon kind, contrary to section 33 of the said Annan Fisheries Act; whereby the said" accused were each liable in a penalty specified.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but after evidence had been led the Sheriff-substitute (Campion) convicted them, and fined them 2s. 6d. each, with the alternative of three days' imprisonment.

They obtained a case for appeal.

The case stated:—"The facts proved in evidence were,—1. That, on the date libelled, the tide was at high water at 5.15 A.M., and at low water at 2.45 P.M.; 2. That the appellants were neither owners nor occupiers of salmon-fishings, nor had permission from any owner or occupier of salmon-fishings to fish for salmon within the limits of the Annan Act; 3. That the appellants were fishing for salmon by means of halve-nets from 11.30 A.M. to 1.30 P.M. on the date libelled at or about the spot marked A on a plan or sketched produced, with which both parties are satisfied, as correctly shewing the district and the locus; 4. That the channel in which the appellants were fishing is at high water (O.S.T.) about 1¾ miles broad, and at low water (O.S.T.) about 260 yards, and not more than 3 feet in depth; 5. That the said channel, from the period of high water to the end of the ebb tide, grows gradually narrower, and that the water in it is, owing to the tidal action, and to the current of the fresh water stream in it, always in motion; 6. That the water in which the appellants were fishing was brackish, and consisted of the conjoined rivers Esk and Eden and their tributaries, and also partly of salt water, being the drainage from the sands, and from hollows or inequalities of the ground which had been covered by the preceding tide; and 7. That, at the time when the appellants were fishing, the tide had receded some 10 miles or thereby to the west of the locus, viz.—to about the line CD shewn on the said plan."

The spot marked A on the plan produced was situated close to Torduff Point, between the Lochar and the Sark. The spot marked was on the Scottish side of the medium filum of the estuary of the Solway. In a minute of admissions lodged in the appeal, the parties concurred in stating that the spot A was situated within the permanent channel, and that it was on the Scottish side of the medium filum of the permanent channel. The point C was at Carsetburn, in the stewartry, and the point D was at Skinburness, in Cumberland.

The following questions of law were, inter alia, stated:—"2. Whether, on the evidence adduced, the appellants were rightly convicted of the contravention libelled in the substantive charge, or whether, in the circumstances proved, the appellants were entitled to acquittal on the ground that they were fishing between low-water mark and the mid-channel of the Solway Firth, and outwith the limits of the Annan Act, on a just interpretation of the description thereof in section 46 of the Act? 3. Whether, the channel in question consisting of the combined waters of the rivers Esk and Eden and their tributaries, and also partly of salt water as stated, the appellants were rightly convicted of a contravention of section 33 of the Annan Act?"

After a hearing on 4th June 1900 (before the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord M'Laren, and Lord Kincairney), the appeal was put out for hearing before a full bench.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—We know that the physical conditions of the Solway and its tributaries are in some respects different from those which generally obtain in Scottish estuaries and rivers, and possibly also from those which usually exist in English estuaries and rivers, and that they have consequently been made the subject of special legislation. The first of the two statutes with which we are concerned is what has been called the Solway Act of 1804, and the second is the Annan Act of 1841. The Annan Act carved out of the district affected by the Solway Act a certain area, and applied special, and in some respects different, provisions to it. The question which we have to consider is, whether these special provisions of the Annan Act, and in particular sections 33 and 46, apply to the place at which the fishing complained of was being carried on, and if so, what is their true construction and effect. The Sheriff has found the material facts very shortly and very clearly. He says that the place at which the fishing was being practised on the occasion libelled is marked A upon the plan, very near the Scottish coast at Torduff Point. At the time when the appellants were fishing there the tide was ebbing, and had reached within about an hour and a quarter of low water. Low water would be at 2.45 P.M., and the halve-nets were being used up to 1.30 P.M., so that the fishing was going on within an hour and a quarter of low water. It appears that there was at that time in which this was being done a run of water coming from the rivers Esk and Eden and their tributaries, although the water was made to some extent brackish by pools of salt water having been left at places on the flats, and also by the sand having been saturated with salt water when the tide was in. There was, as I understand, no salt water there in body at the time, the tide having receded southward to the line marked C D on the map. We have then to consider as to the application of sections 33 and 46 of the Annan Act of 1841 to these facts. Section 33 creates certain offences, and the one with which we are concerned is that certain persons—the appellants—not being owners or occupiers of any fishery in the river Annan or any stream or on the shores adjacent, did take, fish for, or attempt to take, or assist in taking, and so on, in or from the shores and coast adjacent to the mouth or entrance of the river Annan, salmon, grilse, and sea trout. The words "shores or sea coast adjacent to the mouth or entrance of the river Annan" might have given rise to much discussion. They are very large, and are open to different interpretations. It might have been asked, What is adjacent? and so on. The Legislature very naturally thought that this should be cleared by definition, and accordingly by section 46 enacted that "for the purposes of this Act the limits of the shore or sea coast adjacent to the mouth or entrance of the said river Annan shall be deemed to extend and shall extend from the west bank or side of the water of Sark on the east to the east bank or side of the water of Lochar on the west, including the whole sea coast within these limits from the land on the Scotch side at high-water mark of spring tides into the sea at low-water mark of spring tides." What may be called the northern boundary of this area is defined by two rivers—the Sark on the one side and the Lochar on the other—and when we look at the map we see that the coast line between these two rivers is really the northern boundary of the area. The only other boundary mentioned is the sea at low-water mark of spring tides, which we see from the map is practically the southern boundary. The definition does not, by expression at all events, take cognisance of any shore opposite to the Scotch shore. A very sharp question of fact is raised as to the condition of the place at which the fishing was being carried on at the time. Where was the sea then? It is admitted as a fact that the sea had gone back to a line between C and D, and that it had still to ebb for an hour and a quarter, so that it had not yet reached the low-water mark of spring tides, and consequently the fishing was being practised between the northern and only specified southern as well as between the eastern and western boundaries specified in section 46. It is stated in the case that the water of the two rivers was running down at that place, and it would have a considerable distance to run before it could reach the sea or the low-water mark. Upon these facts it seems to me that the Sheriff-substitute was right in finding as matter of fact that the place at which this fishing was going on was within the limits of the shore or sea coast adjacent to the mouth or entrance of the river Annan as defined by section 46, and accordingly that the conviction is right. It is true that this may leave open various questions which may arise, and which we do not require to consider. One of these is, whether the Annan Act applies to the shore or frontage of the English coast opposite to the northern boundary between the Sark and the Lochar. One can see that there might be difficulties in regard to the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts to entertain a complaint for an offence alleged to have been committed on the English coasts, and we have not seen the whole Acts of 1804 and 1841, but only the sections excerpted from them by the parties. It seems to me that what I have said is sufficient for the disposal of this case without going into any question of medium filum either of the upper part of the Solway Firth between the northern boundary above mentioned and the English shore or the stream of river water running down to the sea when the tide is out. But I may observe that the place at which the fishing was going on was on the Annan shore even in a much more limited sense than that of the definition in section 46, because it is to the north not only of the medium filum of the upper part of the Solway Firth, but also to the north of the medium filum of the stream of fresh water which was running down to the sea at the time. For these reasons it seems to me that the view taken by the Sheriff-substitute is right.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The conviction here is one of trespassing on or in the shores or sea coast adjacent to the mouth or entrance of the river Annan, and the question is, what are the shores or coast adjacent to the mouth of the Annan? Section 46 defines that, and it states also that for the purpose of the Act the limits of the sea coast "adjacent to the mouth or entrance of the river Annan shall be deemed to extend and shall extend from the west bank or side of the water of Sark on the east to the east bank or side of the water of Lochar on the west." There is no dubiety about the east or west boundary; and the section proceeds—"including the whole sea coast within these limits from the land on the Scottish side at high-water mark of spring tides into the sea at low-water mark of spring tides." That is where you are to draw the line. It is to be drawn into the sea at low-water mark of spring tides at any part within these limits until you meet the sea at low-water mark, and that gives, as I think, the boundary or limits. If there was always sea ex adverso of these limits —if the sea was always there—I do not see that there would be any difficulty, because you could draw the line, and as soon as it meets the sea there is your sea-shore. But it so happens in this case that the Solway retreats a very great distance into the sea, with the result that on this particular occasion it had retired some miles below the spot where this fishing was taking place. Accordingly, at certain times of the tide there is no southern boundary defined here, and the question is, what is to be taken as the southern boundary in that sense? Two views have been suggested. One is, that in drawing the line, if there is no sea to meet it, you go on into the English coast where you first meet with any obstruction, and that would include the whole area down to C D. The other view, and the one which lowing terms?—"Constable, for the defender, stated to the Court, that if any expressions used by the defender concerning the pursuer could be construed as reflecting in any way upon the pursuer, his character or conduct, the defender unreservedly withdraws the same, there being no ground therefor, and expresses his regret for the occurrence."

On 21st February the pursuer lodged a minute of acceptance of the foregoing tender.

The case was then enrolled for disposal of the question of expenses.

The pursuer moved for expenses, and argued;—The apology which had been offered and accepted was equivalent to a verdict of the jury in favour of the pursuer, and consequently entitled him to expenses.[1]

Argued for defender;—The Court should find that no expenses were due to or by either party. The defender's minute was not equivalent to a verdict of the jury in favour of the pursuer; it contained no admission that the defender had used the words complained of. The defender's minute, and the pursuer's minute of acceptance, came to nothing more than a settlement of the action.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the pursuer has succeeded in getting rid of a serious imputation upon his character, and I am of opinion that he is entitled to expenses.

LORD YOUNG.—I have some difficulty in this case, but in the circumstances I am not sorry to think—from what I know to be your Lordships' views—that it is not to be acted upon. My difficulty is this, that the pursuer does not by this minute establish the case which he must have established to the satisfaction of a jury before he could get a verdict, viz., that the words complained of were used calumniously and falsely by the defender, meaning thereby to represent that the pursuer had dishonestly appropriated £4. If the jury had found that the defender used the words complained of, but that these words did not mean that the pursuer had dishonestly appropriated £4, that would have meant a verdict for the defender, and there is nothing in this minute which negatives that possible finding by the jury, and so establishes the case which the pursuer must have established in order to get a verdict. But it is not necessary to do more than indicate my difficulty. I should have been disposed to give expenses to neither party.

LORD TRAYNER.—I cannot say that I participate in the doubts which Lord Young has just expressed. I do not know that I have ever seen or heard of a tender which really amounted to an admission of the slander on which the action was laid. In my own experience actions of damages for slander have been settled very much on the lines on which the action here has been settled. The broad question raised in this case was this—The pursuer avers that the defender had slandered him, and he came into Court in order to clear his character of that slander—a matter of importance to anybody, but especially of importance to the pursuer, looking to the nature of the slander and to the position and office which he occupies. Now, what is the result? The result has been to vindicate the pursuer entirely from the charge made against him. What the defender says comes to this—"I do not know that I used the language attributed to me, but if I did, and if it is decree awarding damages, and pleaded, inter alia,—(1) The trial of the accused not having been adjourned to a fixed date on said 7th January 1901, the proceedings thereupon fell, and the sentence or conviction and interlocutor or decree complained of are illegal and invalid, and ought to be suspended. (2) In any event the said sentence or conviction falls to be suspended.

Argued for the complainer;—The interlocutor adjourning the diet of 7th January not having been signed, there was no valid adjournment of that diet to a fixed date, and the subsequent proceedings were incompetent.[1] The conviction must therefore be quashed. The procedure for awarding compensation was purely statutory, and any award depended on conviction. If the conviction was null so was the award, and the Court of Justiciary might competently declare that it was so.[2]

Argued for the respondent Wilson;—It was conceded that the conviction could not stand. But the Court of Justiciary could not deal with the award of damages, which was declared by statute to be subject, not to suspension, but to appeal as in an ordinary action in the Sheriff Court. That and the fact that no imprisonment could follow failure to pay the amount awarded, excluded the jurisdiction of the High Court.

Argued for the respondent Bourgin;—The civil and criminal proceedings were separable. Although the Court might review the criminal proceedings, it had no jurisdiction to deal with the award of damages.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The fact that the interlocutor of 7th January 1901 purporting to adjourn the diet to 7th February 1901 is not signed is a sufficient reason for quashing this conviction. I do not think that, in view of the provisions of the Fisheries Acts, we in this Court can competently deal with the question whether the decree for damages pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute is valid. I propose that we pass the bill to the extent of quashing the conviction and sentence, and quoad ultra refuse the bill.

LORD TRAYNER.—The complainer was charged, at the instance of the respondent Wilson, with a contravention of the Sea Fisheries Act. Pending the complaint so brought against him, a notice was given to the complainer (in terms of a statutory provision) that at the trial of the offence with which he was charged the Sheriff would be asked to consider and dispose of a question of damages arising out of the alleged offence. The trial took place, and the complainer was convicted and fined £25, or in default of payment sentenced to imprisonment for thirty days. The Sheriff-substitute further, but in a separate interlocutor, found the complainer liable to the respondent Bourgin in the sum of £648 sterling as the compensation due to the latter for the damage sustained by him through the complainer's alleged offence. Warrant was granted for recovery of this sum by distress or poinding and sale of the sea-fishing boat "St Clement," of which the complainer was the master. This suspension is brought for the purpose of setting aside not only the conviction but also the decree for damages.

It is conceded by the respondent Wilson that the conviction cannot stand, for the reason assigned in the suspension, and to which your Lordship has adverted. I agree that the conviction must be quashed. But in my opinion it is not competent to this Court to hear or dispose of any objection to the validity of the decree for damages. By statutory enactment that decree is declared practically to be the same as a decree pronounced in an ordinary cause before the Sheriff, and is subject to appeal as if it had been pronounced in "an ordinary action before the Sheriff Court" (Act of 1885, secs. 7 and 8). I think that these enactments exclude review by the Justiciary Court of any such decree, and provide for such review being had in the ordinary Courts of law. Further, it will be observed that no sentence of imprisonment can be or has been pronounced in the event of the complainer failing to make payment of the damages decerned for. The only authorised mode of recovering the damages is by diligence as on a decree—the ordinary mode of recovering a civil debt. It is quite true that the claim and consequent decree for damages are by statute intimately connected with the complaint founded on the alleged offence, and it may be that the invalidity of the conviction involves invalidity in the decree. But on that I offer no opinion, for any such question, I think, must be determined by the Court before which the validity of the decree is challenged, on an appeal against it, or by suspension of any diligence threatened or proceeding upon it.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I at first thought that we could competently suspend not merely the conviction and sentence but the decree for compensation pronounced by the Sheriff of even date with the conviction. It seemed to me desirable that we should do so if it was competent, so as to save the parties the trouble and expense of going to the Civil Court in order to get rid of what is really a nullity.

The procedure under which the respondent Auguste Bourgin obtained decree of compensation from the Sheriff is purely statutory. It depends entirely upon the conviction, and stands or falls with it. It is so intimately connected with the conviction that under the provisions of the 8th section of the Sea Fisheries Amendment Act, 1885, the Sheriff who tries the criminal case may at its close be called upon to dispose of the question of damages, and in such a case must treat the evidence led at the criminal trial as evidence led on the question of damages, and if a report of a sea-fishery officer has been produced as to the amount of damages sustained, "the Sheriff shall not allow any additional evidence to be heard unless he shall consider it to be necessary in order to do justice in the case."

Now, as far as I can see this procedure is entirely dependent upon proof of an offence having been committed. But in the present case we have held that the whole proceedings came to a conclusion on 7th January 1901, and all the procedure which took place after that date, including the evidence which was led, and upon the strength of which in part the award of damages was made, was absolutely incompetent. Therefore as to the invalidity of the award of damages, I confess that at present I do not entertain much doubt.

No. 29.

Jamieson v. Wilson.

But the question of jurisdiction is raised. It is said that under the 7th and 8th sections of the amending statute an appeal is competent "as in ordinary causes before the Sheriff Court," which points apparently to civil jurisdiction.

Now, I thought at first that it might be maintained that while there might be an appeal to the Civil Court as to the amount of damages if the conviction stood, it did not follow that if the conviction on which the award of damages depended was quashed, it would be necessary or competent to invoke the Civil Court. The conviction having fallen, the award of damages would be a nullity, and might be so declared by the High Court of Justiciary.

But on consideration I am not disposed to differ from the view which your Lordships have taken. Comparing the provisions of the 15th section, subsection (1), of the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, with the 7th and 8th sections of the Act of 1885, there are grounds for holding that the effect of the later statute was to substitute a civil for a criminal or quasi-criminal process as regarded damages. Under the Act of 1883 compensation was to be adjudged and recovered as a fine, while under the later Act the process was to be treated in the same manner as an ordinary cause in the Sheriff Court, with a right of appeal in certain cases. I may also observe that the claim for compensation might have been made under the 7th section in the shape of a separate application, and damages might have been awarded without the Sheriff proceeding upon the evidence adduced in the criminal case.

Therefore although it would simply cause unnecessary expense to proceed further in regard to the award of damages, I think that logically your Lordships are right, and in this Court we have no jurisdiction to deal with that part of the prayer of the bill of suspension.

THE COURT quashed the conviction and sentence, and quoad ultra refused the bill, finding the complainer entitled to his expenses in both Courts against the respondent Wilson, and Bourgin entitled in the High Court to expenses against the complainer.

water . . . which runs into or otherwise communicates with the said river Annan, or in the shores or sea-coast adjacent to the mouth or entrance of the said river, any salmon, grilse, sea-trout, bull-trout, whitling, herling, or other fish of the salmon kind . . . every such person shall, for every such offence," be liable in a penalty.

Sec. 46—"For the purposes of this Act the limits of the shore or sea-coast adjacent to the mouth or entrance of the said river Annan shall be deemed to extend, and shall extend, from the west bank or side of the water of Sark on the east to the east bank or side of the water of Lochar on the west, including the whole sea coast within these limits from the land on the Scotch side at high-water mark of spring tides into the sea at low-water mark of spring tides."

Certain persons, being neither owners nor occupiers of salmon-fishings, and having no permission from any owner or occupier of salmon-fishings to fish for salmon within the limits of the Annan Fisheries Act, were convicted of a contravention of section 33 of that Act. They appealed. The case stated:—The accused had fished for salmon at a spot a short distance westward of Torduff Point, between the Sark and the Lochar. They had fished up to an hour and a quarter before low water. The sea had then receded several miles to the south-west of the spot in question, leaving the estuary of the Solway nearly all dry except for a channel of brackish water, which flowed down to the sea, and contained the water of various English rivers. The spot at which the accused were fishing was within this channel and on the Scotch side both of the medium filum of the channel and of the medium filum of the estuary of the Solway.

The Court dismissed the appeal, holding that the spot at which the appellants had been fishing was within the limits of the Annan Fisheries Act as defined by sec. 46 of the Act.

ON 27th September 1899 Matthew Bryson, labourer, Lowtherton, Dumfriesshire, and six other persons, were charged in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries, on a summary complaint at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, setting forth that the accused, "not being the owners or occupiers of any fishery in the river Annan, or in any stream or water running into the same, or on the shores or sea-coast adjacent to the mouth or entrance of the said river, did, on 15th August 1899, in the said shores or sea coast, and at that part thereof at Torduff Point, Gretna parish, Dumfriesshire, being within the limits of the Annan Fisheries Act,* by means of halve-nets fish for, or attempt to take, or assist in fishing for or attempting to take, salmon, or other fish of the salmon kind; or did, time and place aforesaid, trespass in or upon said water with intent to take or kill salmon or fish of the salmon kind, contrary to section 33 of the said Annan Fisheries Act; whereby the said" accused were each liable in a penalty specified.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but after evidence had been led the Sheriff-substitute (Campion) convicted them, and fined them 2s. 6d. each, with the alternative of three days' imprisonment.

They obtained a case for appeal.

The case stated:—"The facts proved in evidence were,—1. That, on the date libelled, the tide was at high water at 5.15 A.M., and at low water at 2.45 P.M.; 2. That the appellants were neither owners nor occupiers of salmon-fishings, nor had permission from any owner or occupier of salmon-fishings to fish for salmon within the limits of the Annan Act; 3. That the appellants were fishing for salmon by means of halve-nets from 11.30 A.M. to 1.30 P.M. on the date libelled pronounced an interlocutor allowing a proof, and assigning the 3d of December following as a diet of proof.

On 30th August the pursuer noted an appeal (under section 40 of the Judicature Act, 1825) to the First Division of the Court of Session, and the process was received by the Clerk of Court on 4th of September 1900. The prints of the note of appeal, record, and interlocutors were not deposited with the Clerk of Court till the 22d September. The prints were duly boxed to the Judges on the 27th September, the box-day next following the 4th September.

On the case appearing in the Single Bills on 18th October, counsel for the defender objected to the competency of the appeal, on the ground that the appellant had failed to deposit the prints within fourteen days after the 4th September as required by the Act of Sederunt of 10th March 1870, section 3 (2).[1]

The appellant's counsel stated that the omission was due to inadvertence on the part of the agent. He argued that the Court had power to dispense with strict observance of this provision, and had done so in the cases of Young v. Brown[2] and Boyd, Gilmour, & Company v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company.[3] These cases were decisions on this section, and in the latter the circumstances were precisely the same as in this case. The case of Boyd, Gilmour, & Company[3] was decided by the Second Division after consultation with the Judges of the First Division, and must be taken as conclusive on the point of practice. The ground upon which the Court went in that case was not that there was any "good cause" shewn for the omission, but simply that no prejudice was caused thereby to the respondent. In this case it could not be said that a delay of four days in vacation in depositing prints at the Register House could cause prejudice or inconvenience. The Court had relaxed in other similar cases strict observance of Acts of Sederunt, for instance, as to printing and boxing papers which had been printed and boxed in a previous appeal in the same case.[4]

Lord President.—The question argued depends upon the construction of section 3 of A. S. 10th March 1870. That Act of Sederunt was made under the authority of 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100, section 106, which gave power to the Court to make alterations in the statutory procedure, so that the provisions of the Act of Sederunt have very much the same imperative character as if they had occurred in the statute itself. The second subsection of section 3 contains an imperative direction in the following terms:—(His Lordship quoted the subsection).

on the box-day or sederunt-day next thereafter, he shall be held to have abandoned his appeal, and shall not be entitled to insist therein, except upon being reponed, as hereinafter provided.

"(3) It shall be lawful for the appellant, within eight days after the appeal has been held to be abandoned as aforesaid, to move the Court during session, or the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills during vacation, to repone him to the effect of entitling him to insist in the appeal; which motion shall not be granted by the Court or the Lord Ordinary except upon cause shewn, and upon such conditions as to printing, and payment of expenses to the respondent, or otherwise, as to the Court or the Lord Ordinary shall seem just."

Taylor v. Macilwain.

If the Act of Sederunt had merely directed that certain things should be done within a specified time, there might have been ground for contending that the Court had power to grant some indulgence in the case of failure. But there is no room for this suggestion in the present case, because the Act of Sederunt, after directing what is to be done, specifies the consequence of failure, viz., that the appeal shall be held to be abandoned. I think that in a case where it is thus provided that an appeal shall be held to be abandoned if certain things are not done, there is no power in this Court to dispense with the doing of these things. Then subsection 3 gives a further chance to a person who has failed to comply with the requirements of subsection 2. It provides—(His Lordship read subsection 3). These provisions seem to me to reflect light upon subsection (2), confirming the view that that subsection did not leave it in the power of the Court to dispense with the observance of its provisions. The Legislature, (or the Court in vice of the Legislature), foresaw that cases of hardship might arise under the provisions of subsection 2, and provided a remedy, but in order to prevent laxity in practice, declared that that remedy should only be granted upon cause shewn. The Act of Sederunt carefully regulates every stage of the procedure, and I think that, in these circumstances, we have no power to dispense with the observance of its provisions.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite true that provisions of Acts of Sederunt have not been treated so rigidly as if they formed part of an Act of Parliament. Accordingly, in certain cases dealing with Acts of Sederunt we have dispensed with strict observance, but it does not follow that these rules and regulations are to be treated as if they had no authority at all. It is only on good cause shewn that we have relieved a litigant from the consequences of non-observance of the provisions of Acts of Sederunt. Now here the section we are dealing with of the Act of Sederunt of 1870 provides that if the papers are not printed and boxed within the time specified, then, by force of the provision itself, and without the intervention of the Court, the appeal shall be held to have been abandoned. But the Act itself gives a remedy where the appellant has neglected to lodge his prints, and then the intervention of the Court comes in. He may under subsection 3 of section 3 apply within eight days to be reponed, and such application may be granted on cause shewn. It would therefore have been open to us to repone the appellant if he had made his application in time. But he is too late to apply for this remedy, and has failed to observe both the subsections. He says now that he makes no motion; he merely says that we are not to hold that the action has been abandoned. Even if the matter was in our discretion, the appellant cannot by neglecting both subsections be in a better position than if he had applied to us under subsection 3. But if he had done so we could not have granted dispensation unless upon cause shewn. Now there is no suggestion of any good cause why the prints were not lodged in time. It is no excuse that the agent for the appellant had neglected to box the prints by an oversight. All litigation is conducted by agents, and if they fail in their duty, the client who employs them must just take the consequences.

LORD M'LAREN.—I hold with your Lordships that there may be a distinction between the effect of a provision of an Act of Parliament and of a provision in an Act of Sederunt which is intended to regulate the procedure under an Act of Parliament, and is passed under the authority of the Act. But I agree that this appellant is not in a position to take benefit by the distinction. When an Act of Parliament specifies the number of reclaiming days or days for an appeal, it is held that this is a condition of the right of appeal, and that after these days have expired the party no longer has a right of appeal. But where an Act of Sederunt, treating it may be the whole subject of an action in its successive stages, deals with the element of time, it would be too rigorous a construction of its provisions to hold that in the event of failure to comply with any one of them the party must lose his case. Accordingly in certain cases the Court has allowed things to be done after the prescribed time on being satisfied that the failure arose per incuriam. In the present case the Act of Sederunt was passed under statutory power to amend the provisions of the Act, and the question of delay was not overlooked, because power is given to the appellant to ask, within eight days, to be reponed. There is no explanation given why this right was not exercised; and I think we cannot in this case allow the action to proceed unless we are prepared in every case to relax the prescribed conditions, and practically to nullify the Act of Sederunt.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree that the Court has exercised a wider discretion in relaxing the rules of an Act of Sederunt which has been passed by the Court itself to regulate its own procedure than would be allowable if such rules were prescribed by an Act of Parliament. I doubt very much, however, if this distinction is applicable to the particular question before us, because the clauses of the Act of Sederunt upon which the question depends are not merely regulations of procedure for carrying out the Act of Parliament, but were passed in the exercise of a specific power to alter its provisions, and to substitute new provisions for those contained in the Act itself. Accordingly, the effect of section 3 is practically to repeal that part of the 71st section of the 1868 Act which deals with the printing and boxing of appeals. The provisions of the Act of Sederunt stand in place of the provisions of that section, and are just as binding on litigants and on the Court as if they formed part of the Act of Parliament itself. If this is so, then there is an end of the question. To grant the relaxation which the appellant desires would be inconsistent with statutory provision. It is quite consistent with this view that in construing the Act of Sederunt we have put a liberal construction on its language in deference to a known practice. In the case referred to by Mr Guy (the case of Guthrie Lornie[1]), it seems to have been held that the direction to print and box documents might be read, with reference to practice, to include only those papers which had not been previously printed and boxed. When the Act of Sederunt is open to construction, it is reasonable to adopt a liberal construction in determining whether it has been duly observed or not. But it is a totally different thing to dispense with observance altogether. No power to dispense is given to us, and I agree that even if we had such power there is nothing in the case to justify our exercising it in favour of this appellant. He simply says that he did not observe these provisions, and gives no explanation of his failure to do so, and it seems to me that we could not possibly accept this as a ground for relaxing the Act of Sederunt unless we are prepared to do away with the provision altogether.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords . . . having heard counsel for the parties on the defender's objection to the competency of the appeal, sustain said objection, and direct the clerk to retransmit the process to the Sheriff-Clerk in respect of the abandonment of the appeal."

Bill of Exchange—Proof—Payment—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61), sec. 100.—The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 100, enacts,—"In any judicial proceeding in Scotland, any fact relating to a bill of exchange, bank cheque, or promissory-note, which is relevant to any question of liability thereon, may be proved by parole evidence."

Held that this section did not make parole proof of payment of a bill competent.

Payment—Proof—Parole.—Parole proof of payment in discharge of a written obligation is incompetent, although the sum is under £100 Scots.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

BY bill of exchange, dated 29th December 1896, drawn by Andrew Robertson, 429 Lawnmarket, Edinburgh, and accepted by James Thomson, hairdresser, Leith Street, the latter bound himself to pay to Robertson, three months after date, the sum of £18. There was a relative agreement as to interest in the event of the bill not being retired at maturity. On 15th January 1900 Robertson raised an action in the Edinburgh Sheriff Court for payment of the balance of principal and interest then due under the bill and relative agreement. In his defences Thomson, inter alia, averred that "though the pursuer seldom gave the defender any vouchers, the defender undertakes to prove that the pursuer got from him a good many sums for which the pursuer has given him no credit."

The Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton), on 30th March 1900, found this averment irrelevant, and granted decree for a sum of £20, 5s. 6d. The Sheriff (Rutherfurd), on 7th May 1900, adhered to this interlocutor.

The defender appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session, and in terms of an interlocutor of 30th June 1900, lodged a minute duly specifying the additional payments to account alleged to have been made, by their amounts and dates. The largest payment set forth in the minute was 15s., and the aggregate amount of the payments £3.

The appellant having moved for a proof of these payments, the respondent maintained that the proof should be limited to writ or oath.

Argued for the respondent;—The general rule that writ or oath is required to prove payment of an obligation constituted by writing applied, although the sum was within £100 Scots.[1] Section 100 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882,* was not intended to relax the general law of evidence as to limitations of the mode of proof; it was only intended to affect the rules peculiar to bills of exchange. Its scope was thus limited to questions between the parties to a bill—e.g. to questions as to onerosity and accommodation—and did not extend to the further question whether the liability, once determined, had been liquidated by payment.[2]

Argued for the appellant;—The alleged payments were "relevant to the question of liability" on the bill, and section 100 applied in terms. The cases cited did not apply, because they related to the constitution of the obligation. The agreements there alleged were contradictory of the writing, an objection which did not apply where the proof asked was of the discharge of the obligation. The section was intended to modify the general rule as to the proof of discharge of written obligations in the case of bills of exchange.

LORD ADAM.—At this stage in the case the first question is whether, in ascertaining the balance due, certain payments set forth in the answers, and alleged to have been made, are to be admitted to proof. According to the argument before us these payments are not vouched by any writ, but it is maintained, in the first place, that as the payments in question are each of them under £100 Scots, or £8, 6s. 8d., they may be proved by parole. In answer to this, Mr M'Lennan maintained that according to the law of Scotland payments of an obligation constituted by writing can only be proved by writ or oath, no matter how small the payments may be, and for this he cited authorities. In this I think that Mr M'Lennan is right. But then the other side maintains that even if that be true in the ordinary case, in this case, where the obligation is founded on a bill of exchange, the rule is modified by section 100 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. In my opinion it was not the intention of that section to alter the rules of the law of Scotland as to the modes in which payment of a debt may be proved. By the ordinary rule of the law of Scotland payment of a debt constituted in writing cannot be proved by parole, and I do not think that section 100 was intended to alter that rule.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur with Lord Adam. I should have preferred not to give an opinion in a case of this kind on the construction of section 100 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, a section which has already given rise to difficulties, and which may come before us again for construction. This much I may say, that a defence of payment would not usually or properly be described as a "fact relating to a bill of exchange" relevant to a question of liability thereon. If that is so, I think section 100 does not apply to the

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

In view of this judgment, counsel for the parties agreed that decree should be given against the defender for £19, 1s. 8d.

THE COURT accordingly (on 31st October 1900) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute of 30th March 1900, and of the Sheriff of 7th May 1900: Decern against the defender for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £19, 1s. 8d., with interest," &c.

IN this action, at the instance of William Fisken, Glasgow, against his wife, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor closing the record, and sending the case to the Procedure-roll on 20th June 1900. 2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

Thereafter, by interlocutor, dated 4th July 1900, the Lord Ordinary allowed the record to be opened up, certain amendments to be made, and of new closed the record, and sent the case to proof.

After proof the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defender on 28th August 1900.

The pursuer reclaimed, and boxed along with his reclaiming note a copy of the record as finally amended, and closed on 4th July, having printed thereon all the interlocutors in the case, with the exception of that of July 4th. On the reclaiming note appearing in the Single Bills counsel for the defender objected to it as incompetent, on account of this omission.*

Oct. 20, 1900. Fisken v. Fisken.

Argued for the defender;—The provisions of the Act of Parliament and of the Act of Sederunt were imperative. The proper authentication of a record, according to modern practice, was the interlocutor closing it. Such interlocutor was invariably in practice printed and boxed with the reclaiming note. Here the first interlocutor closing the record was printed, but the record had been thereafter opened up and amendments put on, and the interlocutor finally closing the record was not printed, and accordingly there were before the Court amendments which, so far as the prints shewed, were unauthenticated. The reclaiming note accordingly fell to be refused as incompetent.[1]

Argued for the pursuer;—The reclaiming note was competent. The provisions of the statutes were merely directory. In any case, there was no direction that all the interlocutors should be printed, but only that the record, in the state in which it had been authenticated, should be printed, which had been done here. There was no case of a reclaiming note having been refused on account of the interlocutor closing the record not having been printed. In Williamson[1] it was not the authenticated record which was printed. The authentication required by the statute was the signature of the Lord Ordinary, a practice long fallen into desuetude.

Lord Trayner.—The competency of this reclaiming note is objected to on the ground that it does not comply with the requirements of the Judicature Act. That statute (sec. 10) requires the record to be authenticated by the Lord Ordinary, and also (sec. 18) that the record "authenticated as before," shall be boxed to the Judges with any reclaiming note. The record, according to modern practice, is authenticated by the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary closing the record, and it is the record so closed (and authenticated) that must be boxed with the reclaiming note. That record has been duly boxed in the present case. It is not suggested that the record boxed with the present reclaiming note is not, or differs in any respect from, the record as closed (and authenticated) by the Lord Ordinary. But the interlocutor by the Lord Ordinary closing the record was not printed and boxed with the reclaiming note, and it is said, therefore, that the record as placed before us is not authenticated. I think the objection is not a sound one. It fails to distinguish between the thing authenticated and proof of authentication. The record authenticated by the Lord Ordinary has, as I have said, been duly boxed, and there is no dispute about that. The proof of the authentication has not been printed and boxed, but we have it before us on the interlocutor sheet. The Judicature Act does not require the interlocutor to be printed. It is usually copies of the record authenticated as before [i.e., by the signature of the Lord Ordinary, sec. 10].

The Act of Sederunt, 11th July 1828, sec. 77, enacts that reclaiming notes "if reclaiming against an Outer-House interlocutor, shall not be received unless there be appended thereto copies . . . of the papers authenticated as the record in terms of the statute, if the record has been closed . . ."

Section 5 of the Court of Session Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. cap. 36), provides that the "record shall be closed by interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary before whom the process depends."

printed, and it is convenient that it should be, but it is not required by statute. The reclaiming note before us appears to me to be in accordance with statutory requirements, and the objection to its competency should, I think, be repelled.

LORD MONCREIFF.—In this case the reclaimer has failed to print and box with his reclaiming note the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 4th July 1900, by which he allowed the record to be opened up and amended, of new closed the record, and allowed a proof. The question is, whether in respect of this omission we are bound to refuse to receive this reclaiming note. This depends upon the provisions of the Judicature Act, 1825, in particular sections 10 and 18, and the relative Act of Sederunt of 11th July 1828, section 77. Under the statute it is provided that the party reclaiming shall box printed "copies of the record authenticated as before"—that is, by the signature of the Lord Ordinary; and by the Act of Sederunt it is provided that reclaiming notes shall not be received "unless there be appended thereto copies of the papers authenticated as part of the record in terms of the statute if the record has been closed."

It is no longer the practice for the Lord Ordinary to authenticate the record by his signature on the paper. But under section 5 of 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, the record is closed by interlocutor signed by the Lord Ordinary.

If a very strict view were taken of these enactments, I think that it might be contended with some force that even after the alteration in the form by which the closed record was authenticated, it was necessary that there should be boxed to the Court, not merely copies of the record, but also copies of the interlocutor by which it was authenticated, otherwise the papers lodged would not disclose, as had hitherto been done, that the record had been duly authenticated.

However, I am not disposed to press this view. It is not desirable to extend further than their terms absolutely compel us the scope of these old enactments, which, if violated carry with them such penal consequences to the party. They admit of the construction which your Lordships are prepared to put upon them, and therefore, while I think it is right and proper that with every reclaiming note there should be lodged copies of the earlier interlocutors, and in particular of the important interlocutor closing the record and allowing a proof, I am not prepared to hold that the failure to lodge copies of such interlocutor involves the refusal of the reclaiming note, whatever other penalty may be imposed upon the party.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

IN April 1900 William Hunter, miner, brought an action in the Court of Session against the Darngavil Coal Company, Limited, for damages at common law on account of injuries sustained by him on 31st January 1900 when in the defenders' employment.

The defenders, in their answers to the pursuer's condescendence, denied fault, and in a separate statement of facts they further averred;—(Stat. 1) "Upon 15th February 1899 the pursuer sent to the defenders a notice signed by him in these terms:—'I hereby give notice that, on the 31st day of January 1899, I was injured in the course of my employment in your West Longrigg Colliery through winding-rope slipping off drum, and that I claim compensation therefor under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.'" (Stat. 2) "Following upon said notice, the defenders adjusted with the pursuer the average wage which he was earning prior to the accident to be £1, 13s. per week, and that the compensation payable to him was therefore 16s. 6d. per week. The defenders have paid compensation to the pursuer at this rate during 33 weeks after the first fortnight, the amount so paid being £27, 4s. 6d."

The defenders produced receipts for the said payments, signed principally by the pursuer, and in one or two instances by his wife. These receipts did not bear to be for payments under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer having applied for and received compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, is barred from suing the present action.

The pursuer (Ans. 1 and 2) admitted signing the notice and receiving the payments, but averred that he had signed the notice under essential error, induced by the misrepresentations of the defenders, at a time when he was unable to understand the transaction. The payments were made without any notice to him that they were under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and on the representation that they would not prejudice his claims.

On 13th July 1900 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the cause, appoints the pursuer to lodge the issues proposed by him for the trial of the cause; and appoints the defenders to lodge issues for the trial of their defence, embodied in their second plea in law." *

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—This was an action at common law, and was barred by the election of the pursuer to take compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The plea in bar should therefore be disposed of primo loco.[1] The case of Campbell,[2] followed by the Lord Ordinary, was decided on its own specialties.

Argued for the pursuer;—There were no averments relevant to support the plea in bar,[3] but further, if there were, the course followed by the Lord Ordinary was proper, and an exercise of his discretion with which the Court would not readily interfere. The circumstances here were exactly similar to those in Campbell.[2]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am unable to concur with the decision of the Lord Ordinary. Where, as here, there are distinct averments that the claim made by this workman, and the payments made by the defenders, were made under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and where these averments are disputed, the proper course is to determine this matter first. If it turns out that there was no such arrangement as is averred, then the case is still open; but if it is proved that such an arrangement was made, then the case is at an end. By this course the pursuer cannot possibly suffer any prejudice, but both parties might suffer prejudice if the case were to go to jury trial, and it turned out that the pursuer had no ground of action in consequence of his having accepted compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. In the ordinary case I would not be disposed to interfere with the discretion of the Lord Ordinary in determining the manner in which the proof is to be taken. I think that that is a matter very much within his discretion. But this is not a question of the mode, but of the time at which, and the matter concerning which the inquiry should be made. I think that where, as here, there is a plea in bar, that is the first question to be determined. If well founded, it excludes all inquiry as to the merits.

* "OPINION.—In this action of damages by a workman for injury through the fault of the defenders, they have pleaded,—'The pursuer having applied for and received compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, is barred from suing the present action.' The defenders' averments in support of this plea seem to me to be relevant, and such as cannot be disregarded without inquiry. Neither can they, in my opinion, be accepted without inquiry, and I think the pursuer's explanations in answer to the defenders' averments are also relevant. There must therefore be proof as to this plea of bar. The question is how the inquiry is to be made. There are two ways of making it. Either the defenders must be allowed a proof of their averments, and the trial of the pursuer's action must be postponed until a judgment is pronounced on that proof; or else issues must be adjusted for the trial both of the main case and of the defence of bar. There are inconveniences attending either course, and it is not easy to say on which side they predominate. In these circumstances I think the safest course is to follow the precedent of Campbell v. Caledonian Railway Company, 6th June 1899, 1 F. 887, where the latter course was adopted by the First Division. I do not regard that case as a decision which I am bound to accept, but as an example which I am safe to follow."

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree with your Lordships. If there is a plea in bar founded upon an alleged discharge or settlement of the subject-matter of the action, and the statements in support of it present a sufficiently strong prima facie case, the proper course is to send the case to trial upon that question primo loco. In the defenders' averments here there is a strong prima facie case that the pursuer's claim has been settled, and I think, therefore, that that question ought to be disposed of first.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and remitted the case for proof upon the averments in support of the defenders' second plea in law and the pursuer's answers thereto.

RUSSELL & COMPANY, Defenders.—Ure, Q.C.—Younger.

Expenses—Fees to counsel—Proof—Hearing in Inner-House.—In a case in which the proof lasted twelve days, and the hearing in the Inner-House nine days, the successful party objected to a reduction by the Auditor of the fees allowed for each day of the proof and hearing respectively to senior counsel from thirty and twenty guineas to twenty and fifteen guineas, and to junior counsel from twenty and fifteen guineas to fifteen and ten guineas. The Court repelled the objection, and approved of the Auditor's report.

Expenses—Fee to witness.—In a case in which a certified skilled witness was paid £214, 10s. for work which, according to his account, occupied fifty-nine days, the Court approved of the Auditor's report fixing his fee at £67, 7s. 6d.

1ST DIVISION. IN this action, reported 2 F. (H. L.) 81, the House of Lords, on 26th March 1900, reversing the judgment of the First Division, found the pursuers entitled to £16,000 of damages. The pursuers were also found entitled to expenses.

The Auditor having taxed the pursuers' account of expenses at £2554, 8s. 3d., the pursuers lodged objections to his report in so far as he had disallowed (1) certain fees to counsel, and (2) a fee to a certified skilled witness.

The proof and hearing on evidence in the case lasted twelve days, and the hearing on a reclaiming note in the Inner-House lasted nine days.

The fees charged in the account for each day of the proof and hearing on evidence were for senior counsel thirty guineas, and for junior counsel twenty guineas; and for each day of the hearing in the Inner-House, senior counsel twenty guineas, and junior counsel fifteen guineas, and the Auditor had allowed twenty and fifteen guineas to senior counsel, and fifteen and ten guineas to junior counsel.

Burrell & Son v. Russell & Co.

The witness whose fee was in question was Mr W. H. Campbell, naval architect, Glasgow, who had rendered and been paid an account of £214, 10s. "for professional services rendered to Messrs Burrell & Son in their action against Messrs Russell & Company." According to the account the time for which Mr Campbell was actually engaged was fifty-nine days, and the work consisted of making calculations, supervising the making of and making models, plans, and sections, displacement scales, preparing precognition, consultations, and attendance (two days) at the proof. The Auditor allowed £67, 7s. 6d.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) In view of the unusual magnitude and complexity of the case double maximum fees should have been allowed.[1] The Auditor had, however, treated the account as if the case had been in no way exceptional. The principle on which fees fell to be fixed was that the services of counsel of standing could be obtained for the amount allowed. Applying that principle, and looking to the practice in analogous cases, the fees charged were not too large.[2] Parnell v. Walter,[3] though dealing with the remuneration of expert witnesses, illustrated the extent to which the Court proceeded in fixing fees on the magnitude of the case in hand. There was no intelligible distinction in the matter of fees between a proof and a jury trial. (2) The fee allowed by the Auditor for Mr Campbell was out of all proportion to the services rendered, and was, moreover, far below what was usually allowed to an expert who had devoted so much time and skill as Mr Campbell had.[4]

Argued for the defenders;—There was no reason for interfering with the Auditor's exercise of his discretion. (1) The case was distinguished from the authorities cited by the pursuers, in respect that there was here a proof, and not a jury trial, and that the proof here lasted much longer than the trials in the other cases (except, perhaps, in the Esk Pollution case). A higher rate of fees to counsel was allowed in jury trials.[5] The duration of a proof was always a most important consideration, for undoubtedly the labour and strain was less from day to day as the case proceeded. The case, moreover, was decided not on scientific grounds, but was treated merely as an ordinary question of contract and credibility. (2) Mr Campbell's account was greatly exaggerated. It was impossible that a whole day was necessary for many of the items of work for which a whole day was reckoned. He was not the leading expert witness. Indeed, he was really a servant in the employment of the pursuers, and much of his work was done in preparation for the contract, and not for use at the trial.

Lord President.—We have had the advantage of a very full argument, but I must say that, having regard to the known practice, and to the authorities cited, I see no ground for disturbing the result arrived at by the Auditor. The fees allowed are somewhat higher than those allowed generally, or at all, for proofs, and the fees sanctioned in cases of trial by jury are hardly analogous; but even if they were, they would not sustain or justify an interference with the decision of the Auditor.

I suppose that among other things the Auditor considered that when a counsel has once prepared himself in a case to which he is to give exclusive attention, his duties are somewhat lighter than if he had to prepare in a number of fresh cases every day. We must keep in view that the Auditor is a man of experience, and that he is well acquainted with the practice and the decisions of the Court. It seems to me that it would be a serious thing to increase the fees allowed by the Auditor, as by so doing we might be understood to fix a minimum, or at all events an ordinary standard of fees.

The same remarks apply to Mr Campbell's account. The way in which it is made out is unusual, full time being charged for things which do not look as if they would occupy whole days. But there are really no materials before us which would enable us to consider that question.

2D DIVISION.

BY his will, dated in July 1893, the late Joseph James Hargrave, formerly of Montreal, and latterly of Edinburgh, who died in February 1894, directed his trustees to "invest all the said residue of my said estate in interest-bearing securities, and to pay the revenues thereof to my stepmother Margaret Alcock Hargrave of Rutland Square, in Edinburgh aforesaid, and my uncle Lockhart Mactavish, of Otago, in New Zealand, during their joint lives, share and share alike, and from and after the death of either to pay the whole of said revenues to the survivor during his or her life. Upon the death of the survivor of my said stepmother and uncle, my said trustees shall divide my said estate equally between my nephews and nieces hereinafter named, to wit, Lockhart Alexander Schofield, James Schofield, Frederick Joseph Schofield, Margaret Florence Schofield, Letitia Schofield, and Mary Schofield, children of Frederick Schofield, late of Brockville, Ontario, or their lawful issue, share and share alike, by roots, the share of any predeceasing me to accrue to the survivors. But I direct that during the lifetime of the said Frederick Schofield my said trustees shall retain in their hands the capital of the shares belonging to the said Lockhart Alexander Schofield, James Schofield, Frederick Joseph Schofield, Margaret Florence Schofield, Letitia Schofield, and Mary Schofield, and shall pay to them the revenues thereof only."

On the deaths of Lockhart Mactavish and Mrs Hargrave, which took place in February and June 1899 respectively, and Frederick Schofield being still alive, the present special case was brought by the trustees of the first part, and the children of Frederick Schofield of the second part, to determine the question whether the second parties were entitled to immediate payment of the capital of their shares during the lifetime of their father Frederick Schofield.

The first parties contended that they were not entitled to hand over the capital to the second parties until the death of Frederick Schofield. The second parties contended that the shares destined to them had vested, and that as postponement of payment was not required in order to protect or provide for any present or ulterior interest or trust purpose, the provision postponing during the lifetime of Frederick Schofield payment of the shares of capital destined to them was merely a restraint on their enjoyment of a fully vested right of fee in their respective shares, and as such fell to be disregarded as repugnant to, and inconsistent with, a right of fee.

The questions of law for the opinion and judgment of the Court were these:—"(1) Are the second parties entitled, during the lifetime of the said Frederick Schofield, to payment of the capital of the shares destined to his children named in the said will? or (2) Must the capital of said shares be retained in the hands of the first parties or their successors during the lifetime of the said Frederick Schofield, as provided in the said will?"

Argued for the first parties;—The condition that the trustees were to retain during the lifetime of Frederick Schofield was clearly and unambiguously the intention of the testator; it was a lawful condition, and must be given effect to It was prefaced by the word "but," and came subsequent to and qualified the original division.

Argued for the second parties;—Unless there is some ulterior interest to protect, a clause in restraint of a vested fee would not be given effect to. This condition could not be given effect to without overruling Miller's Trustees, and the cases following thereon.[1]

On the deaths of Lockhart Mactavish and Mrs Hargrave, which took place in February and June 1899 respectively, and Frederick Schofield being still alive, the present special case was brought by the trustees of the first part, and the children of Frederick Schofield of the second part, to determine the question whether the second parties were entitled to immediate payment of the capital of their shares during the lifetime of their father Frederick Schofield.

The questions of law for the opinion and judgment of the Court were these :—" (1) Are the second parties entitled, during the lifetime of the said Frederick Schofield, to payment of the capital of the shares destined to his children named in the said will ? or (2) Must the capital of said shares be retained in the hands of the first parties or their successors during the lifetime of the said Frederick Schofield, as provided in the said will ? "

Argued for the first parties ;—The condition that the trustees were to retain during the lifetime of Frederick Schofield was clearly and unambiguously the intention of the testator ; it was a lawful condition, and must be given effect to It was prefaced by the word " but," and came subsequent to and qualified the original division.

Argued for the second parties ;—Unless there is some ulterior interest to protect, a clause in restraint of a vested fee would not be given effect to. This condition could not be given effect to without overruling Miller's Trustees, and the cases following thereon.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am unable to distinguish the question raised by this case from the question which was decided in Miller's Trustees,[1] and the series of decisions following on that case. I think we must give effect

[1] Miller's Trustees v. Miller, Dec. 19, 1890, 18 R. 301 ; Stewart's Trustees v. Stewart, Dec. 14, 1897, 25 R. 302 ; Ballantyne's Trustees v. Kidd, Feb. 18, 1898, 25 R. 621 ; Wilkie's Trustees v. to these decisions, and that therefore the first question should be answered in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

LORD YOUNG.—I think otherwise. I expressed my opinion at some length, adverse to the judgment of the majority of the Court, in the case of Miller.[1] I repeated that opinion in the case of Stewart.[2] I adhere to these views, and I think that the law, established long before the case of Miller,[1] and as it now exists, is contrary to the judgment in that case. I am not, and never have been, of opinion that Judges ought to follow what they consider to be an erroneous exposition of law. We are bound, I think, to give what we believe to be a true view of the law, and I think it is always legitimate to reconsider any matter without putting the parties to the expense of sending it to the whole Court, or to seven Judges. Indeed that has been the course taken in this Court, and I need only cite as an instance the great variety of views taken by Judges on these very questions of vesting. In construing a testamentary trust-deed, what is to be looked at first is the will and intention of the truster. If his intention is lawful, and the expression of it leaves no doubt in the mind of the Court as to what it is, there is law, both upon unanimous decisions and in text writers of the highest authority, that that intention is to be given effect to. If there is anything to the contrary in the case of Miller,[1] I prefer the old-established doctrine to which I have referred. I think there is here a distinct expression of intention that the capital of the shares destined to the second parties is not to be paid to them till the death of their father. That being a lawful intention, and distinctly expressed, I think there is authority for our giving effect to it, and that there is nothing in the case of Miller [1] that inclines me to be of a different opinion.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree that in construing testamentary writings the first thing to which regard should be had is the intention of the testator; and if I were reading the will now before us without reference to the decided cases, I should have thought that the intention of the testator was here clearly and definitely expressed to the effect that the second parties were only to get the revenue of their respective shares during their father's life, and the capital of such shares only after his death.

But the fee of these shares having (according to well-established rules) vested in the second parties a morte, the question is whether the testator could legitimately or effectually limit or restrict that vested fee to a liferent during the period of the father's life. My own opinion is that he could; but it was otherwise decided in the case of Miller's Trustees,[1] and subsequent cases. I dissented from the decision in Miller's case,[1] and have not seen reason to change the opinion I then held. I am bound, however, to regard the question as at present authoritatively determined contrary to my opinion, and applying the rule so determined to the present case, must hold that the contention of the second party is right, and should prevail.

I do not share the opinion that a Judge may disregard an authoritative decision, simply because he does not concur in it. If each Judge, or each Court proceeded upon that principle, our rules of law would become uncertain and confused. Stare decisis is a safer principle so long as the precedent stands unreversed. I accordingly in this case give effect to the law as it stands upon the decided cases, and out of deference to their authority. No. 6. Oct. 25, 1900. Hargrave's Trustees v. Schofield.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I think we are bound to follow the case of Miller's Trustees.[1] This is a simple example of the kind of case which is ruled by that decision. There is no doubt that the residue was vested in the second parties, and the only question is whether a restriction of this kind on a vested right of fee, where there are no ulterior interests to be protected, can receive effect. Without expressing any opinion on the case of Miller's Trustees,[1] I think we are bound to follow it. It was a decision of a Court of seven Judges which has been followed in many cases, and if it is to be reconsidered it must be by the whole Court.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

residue to the said Alexander Henderson and his heirs and assignees whatsoever."

In 1897 W. J. Menzies, W.S., and J. H. Robertson, stockbroker, Edinburgh, the then surviving and acting trustees under the marriage-contract, raised an action against Mr Henderson for payment of a sum of £961, 9s. 9d., with interest, being part of the balance of his share in his father's succession assigned to the trustees. At the date of this action Mrs Henderson was dead, while there were five children of the marriage surviving, all of whom had reached majority.

In his defences Mr Henderson stated,—(Stat. 2) "In or about the year 1862 the sum of £961, 9s. 9d. became payable to the defender out of the balance of his share of the succession of his father. . . . This sum, on discharge signed by the defender on 13th August 1862, was by mutual inadvertence paid over to him by the testamentary trustees of his father."

He also averred that the marriage-contract trustees had agreed to allow him to retain this sum from 1862 until the present action was raised in consideration of his assigning certain policies of insurance upon his life, of the aggregate value as at his death of £1159, 3s., to the trustees. The policies were assigned to the trustees in 1881. The premiums on these policies were either paid up or amply secured. He also averred that he had already paid £2850, 10s. 9d. of the funds acquired from his father's estate to the trustees, and that he was willing to pay up in cash the balance of £149, 9s. 3d. required to bring up the sum to £3000, the actual amount of the provision in security of which the fund was assigned.

The pursuers admitted that they had received the sum of £2756, 4s. 7d. in implement of the defender's obligation, and that the policies in question had been assigned to them. They explained that through diminution in the value of, or loss incurred in the investments of the said sum of £2756, 4s. 7d., the whole sum of £961, 9s. 9d., with a large part of the interest thereon, was required to make up the full sum of £3000, payable to the children of the marriage on Mr Henderson's death.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The defender Alexander Henderson, having obtained payment of the sum sued for in contravention of the assignation granted by him in favour of the pursuers, and contained in the said contract of marriage, is liable to make good the amount to the pursuers, with interest, as concluded for. (3) The whole sum sued for being required for the due securing of the obligations undertaken by the said Alexander Henderson in his contract of marriage, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The pursuers are barred by taciturnity and mora, and by acquiescence, from insisting in the present action. (3) The pursuers have no interest to have the fund contributed by the defender in security of his obligations under his marriage-contract kept up beyond the sum of £3000, and as they hold funds and securities of the defender's to a greater amount, the present action should be dismissed, with expenses. (5) In respect of the agreement come to by parties in 1881, and of the actings of parties then and since, the present action is incompetent.

On 2d December 1898 the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) granted decree for the sum sued for, but without interest prior to the date of the interlocutor.*

* "OPINION.—The defender maintains, in the first place, that the

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The assignation by the defender in the marriage-contract was for a limited purpose only. Whatever the trustees got beyond what was required to provide the £3000 was directed to be paid to the defender.[1] The trustees said that the sum sued for was needed to make up losses incurred in the trust investments. There had been no loss, because in another action[2] the trustees had been obliged to make it good. Now, the trustees had actually received (and so far as lost had replaced) £2850, 10s. 9d. in cash, and held policies (upon which the premiums were either paid up or secured) to the value as at the defender's death of £1159, 3s., so that there was a margin of more than £1000 purposes, so far as extant, are already amply provided for by the trust funds in hand, and that if the trustees recovered the money, their first duty would be to pay it back to him, in terms of the marriage-contract.

"I cannot read the contract as imposing any such duty. It may be that where a sum assigned in security of provisions turns out to be out of all proportion larger than the provisions to be secured, the Court will set free a part for distribution. The explanations given do not suggest that this is a case of that class; and in one possible view of the case, it cannot be said that the children's provision is even covered by the securities held by the trustees.

"If a provision has vested, no doubt all concerned, being sui juris, can combine for immediate distribution, except in the case of alimentary trusts.

"But in the present case it is at least not certain that the fee of the provision has vested; and even if it had, the children are not here.

"But secondly, the defender alleges that certain arrangements were made relative to the fund in question which, followed by the actings of parties, exclude the present claim by the trustees. (His Lordship here summarised the defender's averments.)

"It does not appear to me that this is a relevant answer to the trustees' claim.

"At the highest, the averments do not amount to an allegation that the original assignation contained in the marriage-contract has received effect, or that the implied obligation to assign has been expressly discharged. The theory of the defender's case seems to be that the policies of assurance have been accepted by the trustees, not as security for implement of the defender's obligation to make good the £961, but as security for the provision to children, which is quite a different thing.

"I do not think the defender's averments amount to more than this,—that on the error being discovered, after he had put the money into his business, his father's trustees, and afterwards his marriage trustees, refrained from pressing him for repayment on getting the policies in security for such repayment.

"It would require much more pointed averments to support the case now suggested, namely, that the original obligation has merged in the security arrangement, that it has been extinguished, and the security arrangement accepted in lieu of it.

"In my opinion, therefore, the defences are irrelevant, so far as directed against repayment of the capital sum. With regard to the claim for interest, I think this may be held to be extinguished by the provision that the income of the trust funds is payable to the defender. No special case is made for restitution of profits on the ground that the money has been at risk, and has earned more than the normal rate. I do not think the trustees should be better off on receiving payment than if they had received it in 1862 and put it in a safe investment."

beyond what was required to meet the provision of £3000. The policies afforded as sound a security as any the trustees could get if they received the actual cash, and had to invest it. In any case, the trustees were barred from insisting in the action, as they had agreed to take the policies in lieu of payment. The defender was now willing, and had offered on record, to make up the sum received in cash by the trustees to the actual amount of the provision, viz., £3000, if the Court were of opinion that the policies did not afford a sufficient equivalent security.

Counsel for the pursuers were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears to me that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is clearly right. By antenuptial marriage-contract, dated 3d October 1855, the defender bound himself to pay certain provisions to his widow and children, and in security of these provisions he assigned to the trustees under the marriage-contract "all and whole the balance of his share of the succession of his said father unpaid at this date . . . in order that they may lay out the same on good securities, heritable or moveable, Government funds, debentures, or purchases of stocks, taken to themselves as trustees foresaid, and may make payment of the interest thereof to the" defender during his life, and that after his death they may apply the said balance and the proceeds thereof for payment of the provisions already mentioned.

This is a perfectly unequivocal conveyance, and it does not appear that anyone ever had the least doubt as to its meaning, not even the defender, for in his statement on record he says,—"This sum, on discharge signed by the defender on 13th August 1862, was by mutual inadvertence paid over to him by the testamentary trustees of his father." So that he admits, and indeed alleges, that the payment to him was a mutual error—one of the kinds of error against which redress is most readily given.

This, then, is an admission that in August 1862 this sum should have been paid to the trustees, and it has not been paid, and the trustees demand that it shall be paid now. Prima facie, it is very difficult to make any answer to this demand. There has been no discharge, if indeed there are any persons in a position to grant a discharge. The obligation is in favour of the children, who are not parties to the case. They have given no discharge, and there is nothing which would disentitle them from claiming the money from the trustees. It seems to me that if the money was not paid, and the defender died without sufficient estate to pay it, the trustees would have no answer to a claim by the children, on account of their failure to get in what is admitted to be part of the trust-estate, which by mutual error was not got in in 1862.

The defence is that the conveyance was for certain purposes, of which the only one not now satisfied (the defender's wife having died) is making good the provision of £3000 to his issue (or their issue) alive at his death. It is quite true that the defender's wife is dead, and that consequently the provision made for her has lapsed, but the obligation in favour of the children is not yet satisfied, and there are not trust funds to satisfy it. Even assuming the policies to be good, the taking of such policies in lieu of the shares of his father's estate assigned by the defender is not trust administration.

No. 7.

Oct. 25, 1900.
Henderson's Trustees v. Henderson.

But the policies may not be good. And it seems to me no answer to this claim that the trustees have even paid-up policies of insurance, for the companies may be unable to pay when the time comes.

But the defender further says that his sole remaining obligation is to provide £3000, and if he provides this amount no more can be asked of him. Stated so broadly, I cannot assent to this proposition. It is true that there is now only an obligation to provide £3000 to the children; but it does not follow that, by retaining what appears to be £3000 in value of present investments, the sum of £3000 will be forthcoming when the money falls to be paid. Even the best investments fluctuate. If the defender was in a position to shew that the sum he is called on to pay was greatly in excess of the obligation to be secured, the Court might consider whether the amount of security might be modified, but that would be in a proceeding very different from this. Such a question could only arise properly after the money had been paid over to the trustees. The defender's first duty is to hand over to the trustees the sum which ought to have been, but by mutual inadvertence was not, placed in their hands thirty-eight years ago.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that if this trust had been administered in terms of the trust-deed the result would have been that at this moment the marriage-contract trustees would have been in possession of the whole trust-estate left by Mr Henderson's father, and their duty would have been to have kept that trust-estate invested for payment of certain provisions set forth in the marriage-contract, and after all these provisions were satisfied, then, and then only, could they hand over any residue that might be left to Mr Henderson or his heirs, as the case might be. That would have been the normal condition of matters if they had acted in terms of the deed. But what happened was this, that Mr Thomas Henderson's testamentary trustees paid over the sum of £961 to Mr Henderson, the defender, which sum should have been paid to the marriage-contract trustees. That was an error that was committed in the administration of the estate. Now, after the lapse of a great number of years the marriage-contract trustees say,—"You, Mr Henderson, should never have been in possession of this portion of your father's estate, which in truth was assigned to us by your marriage-contract, and you must repay that to us, and as trustees it is our duty to recover that portion of Mr Henderson's estate which is already in your possession." There is no question about that. It came into his possession by what is set forth on record as "mutual inadvertence." It was a mistake altogether that Mr Henderson had this £961, and the clear duty of the trustees is to recover that £961 from Mr Henderson in order that they may hold it in terms of the provisions of their own trust. I think that is the case, and I do not understand that Mr Henderson's counsel disputed that altogether.

Now, Mr Lees contended that all that the marriage-contract trustees had right to require is that they should have the sum of £3000, neither more nor less, placed in their hands by Mr Henderson, and that, if that is done, they have no further claim on him to repay the portion which is still in his possession, because after the obligation was fulfilled to pay £3000 to the children out of the residue of the estate, the thing is at an end, and he says it is idle to ask Mr Henderson to give back the whole sum because it may—not that it must, but that it may—come back to him in the shape of residue. Now, I think that is entirely a mistake on the part of Mr Henderson. The obligation is not, and the trustees are not directed, to set aside out of the trust-estate left in their hands a sum of £3000 to be paid to the children. If that had been so, I daresay Mr Lees' contention would have been perfectly right. If there had been, as in More Gordon's case,[1] a direction at a particular date to appropriate and set aside a sum of £3000 for that purpose of the trust, then the contention would have been right. But then it follows that if there had been any profit or loss on the £3000, it would have accrued to the children, and would not have had to be paid back; they would have been entitled to £4000 if it increased to that, or only to £2000 if it diminished to that extent. That would have been the position. But that is not the position of this trust. The obligation imposed upon the trustees here is to retain the whole of the trust-estate, and only pay over the residue of the funds after the purposes of the trust have been fulfilled—that is to say, only when the trustees have paid over to the children the sum of £3000, neither more nor less. This is the duty of the trustees under the marriage-contract, and what they wish to be in a position to do. Now, as was pointed out, if they are to have left in their hands £3000, and nothing else, and if they have nothing in bank beyond the £3000, how are they to provide £3000 to the children in the event of that £3000 becoming by the date of payment, not £3000, but only £2000 or £2500? That would not be implement of the obligation under their trust-deed. Their duty is, when the event occurs, to be in a position to produce £3000, and I do not see how they can do that except by doing what the marriage-contract says they should do, retain in their own hands the whole trust-estate until all the provisions are sufficiently secured. In my opinion merely to leave them with £3000 in their hands is not sufficient security for payment of these provisions, and I understand Mr Lees to admit that if that view of the case is not taken, he cannot say that the money in the hands of the trustees, or the whole security—for that is the position of it—would leave more than a margin as a security to meet the obligations of the trustees in future—to pay the £3000. That is my view of the case, and I agree with your Lordship.

Lord M'Laren.—The children of the defender Mr Henderson are entitled under their father's marriage-contract to a provision of £3000 payable at his death. That is the extent of the father's obligation. They are further entitled during his lifetime, in security of these provisions, to have conveyed to the trustees the surplus remaining of their father's interest under his father's trust-settlement. The obligation to give security was not fulfilled, through circumstances to which I need not further refer, and this action is instituted by the marriage-contract trustees for the purpose of enforcing the obligation to give security. The defence is that although the stipulated security has not been given, yet the defender had given equivalent security to the satisfaction of the trustees when the demand was made. It may be that it was sound trust administration where the defender, in the opinion of the trustees, was unable at the time to restore the money, to take from him the best security that could be got, and no doubt the trustees were entitled to do this in their own interest, because, in the event of his policies of insurance not being paid from any cause, the trustees would be liable for their omission to get in the security fund. But then I am afraid that now, when the defender is believed to be in more prosperous circumstances and an action is brought against him for fulfilment of the marriage-contract obligation, it is no defence to say that by an arrangement between him and the trustees he had substituted something different from what his children were entitled to have. I agree with your Lordship in the chair that the determining consideration here is that the children have never discharged their right to the security—have never done anything to relax or impair the obligation in their favour contained in the marriage-contract. In that state of circumstances the trustees, I think, are within their rights in taking steps to enforce the obligation.

Of course, if the money is paid, it follows that those policies of insurance which were substituted for the prescribed security must be restored to Mr Henderson.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, of new repelled the defences, and found that the defender was bound to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £961, 9s. 9d. sterling, as concluded for, and, with certain findings as to interest, continued the cause.

The petition was opposed by the company and by a majority of the creditors, who desired a voluntary liquidation under supervision of the Court, on the ground that the granting of the petition would prejudice a contemplated reconstruction of the company.

The petitioners objected to delay, as the company had within sixty days of the presenting of the petition granted a conveyance of part of its heritable property in favour of certain creditors, the right to challenge which the petitioners wished to preserve.

It was not disputed that a resolution for the voluntary winding-up of the company could not be obtained within sixty days of the date of the conveyance.

No. 8.

Oct. 27, 1900. Bell's Trustees v. The Holmes Oil Co.

2D DIVISION.

The Court granted the petition, holding that it was for the interest of the creditors to grant a compulsory order, in respect (1) that reconstruction would not be hindered by such an order; and (2) that it was questionable if the right to challenge the conveyance would be preserved if the company were to be wound up voluntarily under a resolution to be passed by it.

JOHN DALRYMPLE BELL AND OTHERS, trustees of the late Robert Bell, on 3d October 1900, presented a petition for an order to have the Holmes Oil Company, Limited, wound up by the Court.

The petitioners averred that the company was unable to pay its debts, and that they were creditors of the company to the extent of £1268 in respect of arrears of rents and lordships. They also averred that the company was unable to keep its workings in good order, and had permitted the mines to become flooded, and that they were entitled to a further sum of £3000 as damages on that account.

On 16th October 1900 the company lodged answers averring that the necessity for winding-up was not disputed, and that a meeting of the shareholders had been called for the purpose, if so advised, of passing a special resolution for winding-up, and that the earliest date on which that meeting could be held was the 31st of October. They averred further that a meeting of creditors had been called for 16th October, and that "in the meantime it is believed that the interests of the company and its creditors generally might be seriously prejudiced if the company were forced into a judicial liquidation, as the prospects of reconstruction would be much diminished thereby, and the respondents respectfully crave that the proceedings in the present petition should be sisted until after the meetings of creditors and shareholders have been held. It is accordingly desirable that the wishes of the creditors as to the method of winding-up and as to the liquidator to be appointed should be ascertained before any order is made by the Court."

On 22d October 1900 answers were lodged for John Wood, Limited, Glasgow, and others, who averred that they were creditors of the company to the extent of £3103, 19s. 8d., being a large majority in value of the whole creditors; that at the meeting held on 16th October they had appointed a committee, and that "the committee has not had time to complete its inquiries into the position of the company and into the prospect of a successful reconstruction; but they will be in a position to report to the creditors on these matters shortly. At this meeting and at the shareholders' meeting, which has been convened for the 31st inst., the question of voluntary liquidation will also be determined."

As shewing cause why the delay asked for should not be granted, the petitioners produced a disposition by the company of a considerable part of its heritable property in favour of the Royal Bank of Scotland, one of the creditors, dated 15th and recorded 17th August 1900.

Argued for the petitioners;—It was not a mere matter of discretion whether the Court would order a winding-up where a company was unable to pay its debts. The order would be granted unless there were no assets available for payment of debts, or unless it clearly appeared that the company was in a position to retrieve itself, and that it would be for the advantage of the creditors that it should be carried on.[1] There were three sets of circumstances (generally concurring) in which such petitions had been refused, none of which was present here, viz., (1) where a large majority of creditors were opposed to winding-up, (2) where the company was in a position to retrieve itself, and (3) where the petitioning creditor could take no advantage by the order. Further, if there were to be voluntary winding-up, the bank, in virtue of the conveyance produced, would obtain a preference to the prejudice of the other creditors, in respect that the resolution to wind up voluntarily, which by section 130 of the Act of 1862 was the date of the commencement of such a winding-up, could not take place within sixty days of the date of the said conveyance. On the other hand, by sec. 84 of the Act of 1862,* a winding-up by the Court dated from the presentation of the petition, and such a preference would be prevented. These provisions were not affected by anything in sec. 3 of the Act of 1886,† which related only to diligence. There was no reason why reconstruction should not be just as easy under compulsory as under voluntary liquidation.

Argued for the respondents;—The petitioners were not entitled to an order ex debito justitiæ merely because the company could not pay its debts. The Court had complete discretion.[1] Here there was a large majority of the creditors opposing a compulsory winding-up because of the expense and greater difficulty of realising and reconstructing under an official liquidator, and their wishes should be given effect to. The respondents did not ask that the petition should be refused, but merely that consideration should be delayed for a fortnight in order that they might present a note in the petition for an order for voluntary liquidation under supervision, and if this were granted it would be effectual as from the date of presenting the petition, and no new preferences could be given in the meantime.[2] The alleged preference would be further struck at by sec. 3 of the Act of 1886.[3] With regard to the damage by flooding, no further damage could ensue from delay, as the water was now at its highest. It would only cost £150 at most to pump it dry.

Lord Trayner.—This is an application for an order for the compulsory winding-up of the respondent company. The application is made by a creditor, and it is admitted that the company cannot pay its debts. In these circumstances the Companies Acts entitle the petitioning creditor to the order now asked, unless there be grounds which would induce the Court to refuse, or postpone granting it. I am of opinion that the order prayed for should be granted. The only grounds on which we were asked by the respondents (creditors) to refuse the order for compulsory winding-up were these:—(1) That the great body of the creditors desired to wind up voluntarily and under supervision of the Court; and (2) that they hoped to carry out a plan of reconstruction which would be beneficial (if effected) to all concerned. From the facts before us, it is open to reasonable doubt whether a plan of reconstruction is at all feasible, but if it is, it will not be hindered by the order for compulsory winding-up. The first ground I have referred to is one to which the Court will always attach considerable weight. But it appears to me that the interest of the creditors is more likely to be preserved than injured by the granting of the compulsory order. In saying this, I allude principally to the fact that the company have executed a conveyance in favour of one of their creditors affecting materially the value of the assets available for the general body of creditors. Now, the right to challenge that conveyance (having regard to the date on which this petition was presented), will be preserved if the order now asked is granted, whereas it is at least questionable whether that right of challenge would be preserved if the company was wound up voluntarily under resolution to that effect now or hereafter passed by the company.

(SEE Cochrane v. Traill & Sons, 2 F. 794.) 1ST DIVISION.

On the 4th of January 1900, David Cochrane, lumper, Shore, Kincardine-on-Forth, sent for registration to the Sheriff-clerk at Falkirk a memorandum of agreement under Schedule II., sec. 8, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and sec. 7 (a) of the Act of Sederunt, 3d June 1898.* The memorandum set forth that the

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), Sched. II., sec. 8, provides as follows:—"Where the amount of compensation under this Act shall have been ascertained, or any weekly payment varied, or any other matter decided under this Act, either by a committee or by an arbitrator, or by agreement, a memorandum thereof shall be sent, in manner prescribed by rules of Court [Act of Sederunt] by the said committee or arbitrator, or by any party interested, to the registrar of the County Court [the Sheriff Clerk] for the district in which any person entitled to such compensation resides, who shall subject to such rules [Act of Sederunt], on being satisfied as to its genuineness, record such memorandum in a special register without fee, and thereupon the said memorandum shall for all purposes be enforceable as a County Court [Sheriff Court] judgment; provided that the County Court Judge [Sheriff] may at any time rectify such register."

By section 14 it is provided that in the application of this Schedule to Scotland the words indicated above in square brackets should be substituted for those in the text.

The Act of Sederunt of 3d June 1898 provides by sec. 7 (a) as follows:—"The memorandum as to any matter decided by a committee or by an arbitrator, other than a Sheriff, or by agreement, which is by paragraph 8 of the Second Schedule appended to the Act required to be sent to the Sheriff-clerk, shall be as nearly as may be in the form set forth in Schedule A appended hereto. Where such memorandum purports to be signed by or on behalf of all parties interested, or where it purports to be a memorandum of a decision, or award of a committee, or of an arbitrator agreed on by the parties, and to be signed in the former case by the secretary, or by at least two members of the committee, and in the latter case by the arbitrator, the Sheriff-clerk shall proceed to record it in the special register to be kept by him for the purpose without further proof of its genuineness. In all other cases, he shall before he records it send a copy (for which, unless it is supplied to him along with the applicant had been injured on 9th September 1898 while in the employment of Messrs David Traill & Son, stevedores, Grangemouth, that they had admitted liability, and had on or about 7th October 1898 "agreed to pay to the applicant compensation at the rate of 14s. a week from the first fortnight after the said accident until the applicant should be able to resume work and earn full wages." After communicating with Messrs David Traill & Son, the Sheriff-clerk refused to register this memorandum, on the ground that its genuineness was disputed, and Cochrane applied to the Sheriff-substitute (Russell Bell) for a special warrant for registration.

In this application the Sheriff-substitute sustained a preliminary plea against granting the application, and stated a case at the instance of Cochrane, in which the facts and procedure were set forth as follows:—

"In May 1899 the present petitioner raised an action in the Court of Session against the respondents, in which he concluded for payment of the same weekly sum in respect of the same bodily injury, and under the same conditions as contained in the present memorandum of agreement, in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act. While that action was depending in the Inner-House the aforesaid memorandum of agreement was transmitted to the Sheriff-clerk of this Court for registration. After communicating with the respondents the Sheriff-clerk refused to register the agreement, on the ground that its genuineness was disputed. The action in the Court of Session was dismissed by the Judges of the Second Division on 16th March last, with expenses.[1]

"The respondents pleaded that the present application should not be entertained until the petitioner had paid to the respondents the taxed expenses of his unsuccessful action in the Court of Session.

"I sustained that plea.

"The question of law for the opinion of the Court is, whether it was competent for the Sheriff, as arbitrator, to make it a condition of entertaining the present application, that the expenses of the foresaid action in the Court of Session should be paid?

"This case as adjusted by the parties is stated by me."

On the case coming up for hearing, objection was taken to its competency, on the ground that the Sheriff was not acting as arbitrator in the application in question.

Argued for the appellant;—The objection to the competency ought to have been taken in the Single Bills. The case had been adjusted by the parties, and this implied a waiver of any objection to the competency. Section 1 (3) of the Act was wide enough to cover an application for a warrant to register a memorandum, because it was a memorandum, he shall be allowed to charge at the rate of 1s. per sheet), to the party or parties interested (other than the party from whom he received it) in a registered letter containing a request that he may be informed within a reasonable specified time whether the memorandum and award (or agreement) set forth therein are genuine; and, if within the specified time he receives no intimation that the genuineness is disputed, then he shall record the memorandum without further proof, but if the genuineness is disputed he shall send a notification of the fact to the party from whom he received the memorandum, along with an intimation that the memorandum will not be recorded without a special warrant from the Sheriff."

"proceeding under this Act as to liability to pay compensation." It was because the enforcement of an agreement to pay compensation was regarded as a proceeding under the Act that the Court refused to entertain the previous action for enforcement of the agreement at common law.[1] To hold this appeal incompetent would therefore mean that the applicant was to be deprived of all remedies and place him at the mercy of an employer who chose to dispute the agreement as soon as the time for bringing a claim under the Act expired. In whatever capacity the Sheriff acted his decision was subject to review by the Court, and ought, therefore, to be dealt with on the merits, irrespective of the form of the appeal. On the merits, it was clear that what the Sheriff had done was wrong. The cases cited on the other side had no bearing. The case of M'Murchy[2] went upon the ground that the pursuer ought to have amended his record, and could be in no better position by bringing another action. The expenses in the Court of Session action was a debt quite unconnected with the application to the Sheriff, and it would be extravagant to hold that a debtor could not sue his creditor except under condition of paying up his debts.

Argued for the respondent;—Under sec. 8 of Schedule II. the duties of the Sheriff were purely ministerial. He had no jurisdiction to inquire whether there was an agreement if this was disputed. The previous case between the same parties in the other Division[1] did not decide that an action to enforce an agreement to pay compensation was incompetent at common law. It was held that the action in that case was so framed as to amount to a claim for compensation under the statute, and that an action to enforce such a claim was incompetent. But if such an inquiry was competent, the Sheriff became an arbiter or Judge, and was entitled to deal incidentally with a preliminary objection, such as was sustained by the Sheriff in this case. These expenses arose in prosecuting the same claim as that to which the memorandum related. In these circumstances, it was proper that the expenses of the unsuccessful proceedings should be paid before other proceedings were instituted.[3] In the case of Edwards v. Godfrey,[4] which arose under section 4 (1) of the Act, there were two grounds of decision—(1) that the workman was put to his election between an ordinary action and a claim for compensation, and (2) that he could not raise a second action without paying expenses in the first. It was held competent for the arbiter in that case to look at what had taken place in another Court. The case of Irvine v. Kinloch[5] shewed that a Judge had power to deal with expenses in a cognate claim.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—This case bears to be a case stated by the Sheriff of Stirling in the matter of an arbitration between the appellant and respondents under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

From the facts set forth in the case, it appears to be a case stated in an application to the Sheriff at the instance of the pursuer (appellant) to grant warrant to record in the Special Register of Courts kept for the purpose an alleged memorandum of agreement between the pursuer and defender, sent for registration by the pursuer in terms of the said Act and relative Act of Sederunt.

It further appears that the memorandum of agreement had been sent to the Sheriff-clerk for registration, but that he, after communicating with the respondents, refused to register it on the ground that its genuineness was disputed.

It further appears that the Sheriff sustained a plea to the effect that the application should not be entertained until the appellant had paid to the respondents the taxed expenses of an action in the Court of Session relating to the same matter, in which he had been unsuccessful; and the question of law which we are asked to answer is, whether it was competent for the Sheriff, as arbiter, to make it a condition of entertaining the application that the expenses of that action should be paid?

The provisions which regulate the registration of a memorandum will be found in paragraph (8) of the second schedule of the Act, which enacts that where the amount of compensation under the Act shall have been ascertained, either by a committee or by an arbitrator or by agreement (as in this case), a memorandum thereof shall be sent, in manner prescribed by Act of Sederunt, by said committee or arbitrator, or by any party interested, to the Sheriff-clerk of the district in which the person entitled to such compensation resides, who shall, subject to the rules prescribed by Act of Sederunt, on being satisfied of its genuineness, record such memorandum in a special register.

Section 7 (a) of the Act of Sederunt provides that where, as is alleged in this case, the compensation has been settled by agreement, and the memorandum does not purport to be signed by or on behalf of all parties interested, the Sheriff-clerk shall communicate with the other party or parties interested; and if it shall appear that the genuineness of the memorandum is disputed, shall send a notification of the fact to the party from whom he received the memorandum, with an intimation that the memorandum will not be recorded without a special warrant of the Sheriff.

The Sheriff-clerk having ascertained that the genuineness of the memorandum was disputed, refused to register it without a special warrant of the Sheriff, hence the present application.

It appears to me to be clear that the only issue raised under such an application is the genuineness of the memorandum. It is only after the amount of compensation has been determined that the memorandum is sent for registration, and the Sheriff has no power to increase or diminish the amount, or to attach conditions to its registration. If he is satisfied of its genuineness he must grant warrant to register it.

It further appears to me that the application is in no sense an application to the Sheriff as arbitrator under the Act.

The cases in which there may be arbitration under the Act will be found in section 1 (3), where it is provided, that when any question arises as to the liability to pay compensation, or as to the amount or duration of compensation, it shall, if not settled by agreement, be settled by arbitration; in section 1 (a) (2) of the first schedule, where it is provided that, in the case of an accident resulting in death, the amount of compensation payable to persons partially dependent on the deceased shall, in the absence of agreement, be determined by arbitration; in section 5 of the same schedule, where it is provided that any question as to who is a dependant, or as to the amount payable to each dependant, shall, in the absence of agreement, be settled by arbitration; and in sections 12 and 13 of the same schedule, which provide respectively that in the case of a weekly payment being reviewed or redeemed on payment of a slump sum, the amounts payable shall, in default of agreement, be settled by arbitration.

These are the only cases, so far as I know, of arbitrations under the Act, but there are no such questions raised in this case—the only question being, whether a certain memorandum shall be registered or not.

The application is accordingly, in my view, simply an application to the Sheriff in the exercise of his ordinary common law jurisdiction, and the procedure therein must be regulated by the forms and rules appropriate to such proceedings. If it is sought to bring under review an interlocutor or judgment of the Sheriff, that must be done in the ordinary way. Under section 14 (c) of the second schedule it is only where an application is made to the Sheriff as arbitrator that it is competent for the parties to require him to state a case on any question of law determined by him. But, as I have already said, that is not the nature of the present application.

I am of opinion, therefore, that this stated case should be dismissed as incompetent, and therefore that we cannot entertain the question of law which we are asked to decide. Perhaps, however, what I have had occasion to say may sufficiently indicate what my answer to the question would have been if competently before us.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD M'LAREN concurred, the LORD PRESIDENT intimating that LORD KINNEAR (who was present at the hearing but absent at the advising) also concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the case on appeal as incompetent, and found neither party entitled to expenses.

7, that the word "factory" "includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895."

A lighter and machinery thereon, the property of and worked by stevedores, was employed in raising goods from the hold to the deck of a vessel moored between the lighter and a quay, the goods being thereafter transferred to the quay, not by the stevedores, but by dock workmen.

Held (diss. Lord Young) that sec. 23 of the Act of 1895 did not apply either to the lighter or to the machinery thereon, and that therefore they did not constitute a "factory" in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897; and further, that the process which was being performed by the lighter and its machinery was not one of unloading to a quay in the sense of the Act of 1895.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, between Mrs Lillias Laing, Leith, and Messrs Young & Leslie, stevedores, Leith, the Sheriff-substitute (Maconochie) decerned for £234 for Mrs Laing herself and her pupil children in respect of the death of her husband John Laing.

The following case was stated by the Sheriff-substitute at the request of Messrs Young & Leslie:—

"The facts proved or admitted are as follows:—

"On 1st November 1899 Laing was in the employment of the appellants as donkey-engineman on board one of their lighters lying in the Leith Docks. He had been in their employment for three years prior to that date, and during the whole of that period he was earning wages at the rate of 30s. per week. On said 1st November Laing was in sole charge of one of the appellants' lighters, and was employed under the defenders in assisting, by means of the donkey-engine on the lighter, in unloading the ship 'Nerano,' which was lying alongside the Edinburgh Dock jetty in Leith Docks. The 'Nerano' was lying close to the jetty, and the lighter was lying outside, and alongside of her. On board the lighter there was a donkey-engine and boiler worked by the deceased, and close to the winch of the engine there was a pump for pumping out water which leaked into the lighter's hold. The lighter was made of the hull of an old fishing-boat, out of which the mast had been taken. She had no means of propelling herself through the water, and when it was wished to move her from one part of the dock to another she was dragged along by means of a rope carried to the jetty. The lighter was unable to navigate without external assistance, and as a general rule did not leave the Leith Docks, but occasionally she was towed by tugs to Granton and other ports in the Firth of Forth to be used there. She was never inspected by Her Majesty's Inspector of Factories. When assisting to discharge cargo from the 'Nerano' a chain or rope attached to the donkey-engine on the lighter was passed over a pulley on to the deck of the vessel and was led into the hold. The cargo was then raised by the engine to the level of the vessel's deck, and at that stage, the cargo being grain, it was put into bags by dock workmen, and, after being weighed on board, was conveyed by them to waggons on shore. The engine was not used in the conveyance of the bags on shore. During the said operations the donkey-engineman never left the lighter to assist on board the vessel or on shore. About 12.30 P.M., on said 1st November, there was some delay in getting forward waggons to convey away the grain unloaded from the 'Nerano,' and the donkey-engine consequently stopped working for some time. During said slack time the deceased being anxious to pump out the hold of the lighter, leant over the side with a bucket in his hand in order to bring up water to 'fang' the pump, i.e., to make it draw. It was part of his duty to pump out the lighter twice a day, and that was frequently done on all the appellants' lighters during such slack times, though it was usually done in the morning and evening. It was necessary for the deceased to bring up water from the dock for the purpose of making the pump draw. While leaning over the side of the lighter the deceased, in some unexplained way, overbalanced himself, fell into the water, and was drowned. . . .

"On these facts I found in point of law— . . . (2) that the work in which the deceased was engaged at the time of the accident was an employment to which the Act applies; and (3) that the accident arose out of and in the course of his said employment, and accordingly I pronounced judgment on 26th February 1900, finding that the appellants were liable in compensation to the respondent in terms of said Act. . . .

"The question of law for the opinion of the Court is,—Whether the accident to the deceased arose out of and in the course of an employment within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897?"

Argued for the appellants;—There was no distinction between this case and the cases where it was held that machinery on board a ship was not a "factory" in the sense of the Act.[1] The lighter was a "ship,"[2] and formed no part of the dock. Loading from a lighter was not loading from a dock.[3] The provisions of the Factory Acts did not apply to such subjects as ships, and it was only subjects to which these provisions did apply that could be "factories" in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act.[4] In any event, the process of unloading here, so far as the lighter was concerned, ended with the deck of the ship.

Argued for the respondents;—The accident happened on, in, or about a dock. A dock includes the water within it,[5] and the lighter was therefore in, on, or about a dock. The stevedores, by bringing the lighter into the dock, were the occupiers of the dock. The lighter was not a ship; it was merely for dock work, and used for just the same purpose as a crane on shore. Further, this was machinery used in the process of unloading to a dock, though it was only the first part of the process. The appellants were occupiers of premises within a dock for the purpose of unloading ships to the dock by machinery. The decisions as to machinery in ships applied only to machinery which was wholly inside and part of the ships, and did not apply where the machinery used was outside.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts are that a vessel which was being unloaded at a quay had the services of an engine which was in a boat, and was brought alongside the vessel on the outer side from the quay, for the purpose of hoisting cargo from the hold of the vessel to the deck. After this had been done, the goods were taken charge of by persons whose duty it was to have the goods put off the vessel on to the quay, and who did so without the use of machinery. They put the material in bags, and took the bags on shore. The power of the engine and its winch was not used in the work of conveying the goods to the land. A man employed on board this boat fell overboard while taking up water in a pail for use on board the boat.

In these circumstances, the question for decision is whether the Workmen's Compensation Act applies in respect of the provision in the Factory and Workshop Act of 1895, by which the Factory Acts have effect as if "every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse, and so far as relates to the process of loading or unloading therefrom or thereto, all machinery and plant used in that process . . . were included in the word factory." Thus, if the claim is to be successful, two things are essential—(First) there must have been a process of loading or unloading from or to a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse, (second) there must have been such appliances used as fall under the description of "machinery and plant" used in so loading or unloading to or from a dock, &c.

I am of opinion that neither of these essentials is to be found in this case. The work in which the deceased was engaged was not the work of loading or unloading to or from a quay, and the machinery and plant being used was not being used in loading or unloading to or from a quay. I hold that work done within the ship, and not by machinery on the quay or dock, does not fall within the statute. It has been decided in more than one case quoted to us in argument that the Act does not apply where work is being done by machinery on board the ship and within the ship. I cannot hold that there is any difference here. For the ship's purposes the defenders' vessel is brought alongside, and work is done in the ship by aid of machinery in the defenders' vessel. I cannot hold that that is work of loading or unloading to or from a dock or quay. I do not see how this could be held, unless it could be held that a vessel itself could be deemed and held to be a dock under the Acts, a view which in previous decisions has been held to be untenable. Here there was no machinery or plant being used in unloading to the dock or quay, and therefore I cannot see how the Acts can be held to apply to the effect of holding that the dock or quay was at the time a factory in terms of the Acts.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the question put in this special case should be answered in the negative.

Lord Young.—I am sorry to think that there should be a difference of opinion in connection with this case, but the fact that there is such a difference shews that the question is attended with some difficulty. The Sheriff is of opinion that the case falls under the statute, the appellants being in occupation of a dock where machinery was being used for the purpose of loading and unloading. The facts stated by the Sheriff are these:—(His Lordship read extracts from the stated case). It would not occur to me as doubtful that the raising of the cargo from the hold to the deck was part of the process of unloading to the dock, although it was not the whole process, as after being raised the cargo had to be carried to the quay on men's backs. I therefore think that the machinery on board this lighter—which I cannot regard as in a different position whether lying on one side or other of the ship—was being used for the purpose of unloading the cargo on to the quay.

No. 10.

Laing v. Young & Leslie.

I should not think it doubtful that, if this old lighter had been placed on the quay, and the machinery in it used for the purpose of lifting the cargo from the hold of the vessel to the deck, the machinery would have been machinery used for unloading the cargo on to the quay, and used by a stevedore whose business it was to do so. Does it make any difference that for greater convenience the lighter is in the water close to the quay?

That the case falls within the obvious sense and meaning of the Act of making provision for a workman incapacitated from work, or for his widow and children if he happens to be killed—provision to enable them to keep out of the poor-house—is plain to the most elementary mind. There may be a technical question whether the process of raising the cargo from the hold to the deck is part of the process of unloading the cargo from the ship to the quay. The Sheriff thinks it is, and I concur with him.

I therefore agree with the Sheriff that the case is not only within the policy and meaning of the Act, but also free from any good technical objection.

LORD MONCREIFF.—The respondent's action depends upon her being able to establish that the lighter on which the deceased was working at the time of his death was a place, or that the engine upon it was machinery or plant, to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, and was thus a factory within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The clause relied on is the 23d section of the Act of 1895, which makes certain provisions of the Factory Acts as to fencing machinery, inspection, rules as to dangerous employments and machines, and so forth, applicable to "(a) Every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse, and so far as relates to the process of loading or unloading therefrom or thereto all machinery and plant used in that process."

I understand that the respondent's contention is either that the lighter was part of a dock or quay in the sense of the clause; or at least—and on this reliance is chiefly placed—that the donkey-engine was machinery used in the process of unloading from the ship "Nerano" to the jetty.

The matter is really concluded by authority both in this country and in England. It was decided in the case of the Aberdeen Steam Trawling Company v. Peters[1] that one of the crew of a vessel, who in the process of unloading in dock was injured by a steam-winch on board the trawler, had no claim under the statute. In the subsequent case of Healy v. Macgregor & Ferguson[2] in this Division of the Court, it was held that a stevedore had no claim under the statute in respect of injuries caused by a steam-winch on board a vessel which was being unloaded in dock.

Laing v. Young & Leslie.

In England there are the cases of Flowers [1] and Hennessy v. M'Cabe,[2] in which it was held that loading a cargo from a lighter was not equivalent to loading it from a dock.

If, then, this operation of raising the cargo from the hold had been conducted by a steam-winch belonging to the "Nerano," and even if the steam-winch had been used for the purpose of putting the cargo on shore, the pursuer would, on the cases, have had no claim. I confess that I can see no distinction between the steam-winch of a vessel which is being unloaded and a steam-winch or a donkey-engine on board another vessel which is lent or hired for the purpose of raising or unloading the cargo. As I read the decisions to which I have referred, machinery, in order to bring it within the scope of the Workmen's Compensation Act, must be shewn to be machinery attached to or upon the dock or quay. Now, this lighter on which the engine stood was not part of the dock, and did not belong to the Dock Commissioners. It and the engine were the property of the appellants, and although they happened to be lying in Leith Docks on the day of the accident, they might have been removed elsewhere next day.

But apart from decision I should have reached the same result. I think it is sufficient that the donkey-engine on board the appellants' lighter was not engaged in unloading the cargo of the "Nerano" to the quay. From its position outside the "Nerano" it could not have done so. In point of fact it was merely engaged in raising the grain from the hold of the vessel to the deck. Before the grain could be put on the quay, another process had to be gone through; it was put into bags, not by the appellants' workmen, but by the dock workmen, and thereafter it was taken ashore, not by means of any machinery, but by the dock workmen.

Secondly, in order to bring any of the premises or machinery mentioned in the clause quoted within the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, they must be shewn to be premises or machinery to which the provisions of the Factory and Workshop Acts are applied. Now, it is found as a fact in the case that the appellants' lighter was never inspected by Her Majesty's Inspector of Factories. It was, I think rightly, not regarded as falling within the scope of those Acts. The premises, works, and machinery to which (as factories) the Workmen's Compensation Act and Factory and Workshop Acts apply have all a certain degree of immobility which admits of the Factory Acts being applied to them. Notably the Factory Acts do not apply to subjects such as a ship, a sufficient reason being that it would not be practicable to apply to a ship (which might be at one place one day and a hundred miles away the next) the provisions as to inspection, &c., contained in the Factory and Workshop Acts.

On the whole matter, although I am not surprised that the Sheriff-substitute should have had difficulty in construing this perplexing statute, I am of opinion that the accident which happened to the deceased did not arise out of and in the course of an employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. I would therefore answer the question in the negative.

LIVINGSTONE & COMPANY AND ROBERT LUMSDEN, Defenders (Appellants).—Salvesen, Q.C.—R. S. Horne. Nov. 2, 1900. Dundas v. Livingstone & Co.

Reparation—Slander—Privilege—Malice.—In an action of damages for slander, at the instance of a commercial traveller against his former employers, the pursuer averred that he commenced his engagement with the defenders at a fixed salary and commission, and that in implement of a condition of his engagement the defenders were insured with an insurance company under a policy taken out by him against possible defalcations by him; that, subsequently, his remuneration was changed by the defenders to commission alone; that this change in his remuneration avoided, to the defenders' knowledge, the policy of insurance; that thereafter the defenders, in the knowledge that they had no claim under the policy, falsely stated to the insurance company that the pursuer had embezzled sums of money belonging to them; and that they had done so with a view to hampering the pursuer in getting other employment in which he might use his knowledge in competition with them.

The defenders, who denied that the policy was avoided by the change of remuneration, pleaded privilege, and contended that malice should be put in the issues.

Held that there was a prima facie case of privilege, and that malice must be inserted in the issues.

THIS was an action of damages at the instance of Francis Dunnett Dundas, commercial traveller, Leith, against Messrs Livingstone & Company, wholesale whisky merchants, Musselburgh, and Robert Lumsden, accountant, Edinburgh, the auditor for Messrs Livingstone & Company, jointly and severally, or severally. 2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

The pursuer averred that in September 1898 he was engaged by the defenders Livingstone & Company to travel for them at a fixed salary, with a commission on all sales; that it was made a condition of his engagement that he should insure himself with a guarantee company for £150, and that he accordingly took out a policy for that amount in favour of the defenders, with the Life and Health Assurance Association, Limited; that in May 1899 the defenders changed his remuneration to a commission only on all sales, in place of the fixed salary and commission originally agreed on when the insurance was effected; that thereafter, in consequence of charges of embezzlement made against him by the defenders, he left their employment.

The pursuer further averred;—(Cond. 12) "On 26th September 1899, a letter was written by the defender Lumsden, on the instructions and on behalf of the other defenders, to the Life and Health Assurance Association, Limited, with which the firm had been insured against embezzlement by pursuer. Said letter intimated that there were suspicions of irregularities in connection with pursuer's accounts. Said letter inferred, and was intended and understood to infer, a charge against pursuer of having embezzled money collected by him for the defenders Livingstone & Company. At the date of said letter the defenders were no longer insured with the said company—the policy having been to the defenders' knowledge avoided by the change in the terms of pursuer's remuneration from salary and commission to commission alone, as from 8th May 1899." (Cond. 13) "On a date between the 6th and 13th October 1899, the defender Lumsden, acting on behalf of and with instructions of the other defenders, called at said insurance company's office, 41 George Street, Edinburgh, and intimated to Mr Mitchell, the cashier to the company, that pursuer had embezzled or misappropriated considerable sums of money belonging to Livingstone & Company, and that he wished to make a claim under the policy, or used words to that meaning and effect." (Cond. 14) "Following thereupon, a statement was sent on 24th October to said company of sums alleged to have been misappropriated by pursuer. Said statement and a letter by which it was accompanied represented that the pursuer had embezzled or misappropriated the sums therein specified. The said insurance company, after several interviews had taken place between their officials and pursuer, declined to recognise the claim, and the defenders have taken no steps to substantiate it. During the whole of their communications with the insurance company and its representatives the defenders were well aware that they had no claim under the policy, and had no serious expectation that they would recover anything. They were actuated in said communications by a desire to discredit the pursuer with the insurance company, and by rendering it difficult for him to be reinsured, to hamper him in obtaining other employment in which he might use his knowledge in competition with them." (Cond. 15) "The said various charges of embezzlement made against the pursuer by the defender Lumsden, acting under instructions or within the scope of his employment and authority from the other defenders, are false, malicious, and calumnious. Said charges were, moreover, made maliciously and without any probable cause. It is untrue that pursuer has misappropriated any money entrusted to or collected by him for said defenders. On the contrary, the pursuer believes and avers, on a proper statement of the accounts between him and Livingstone & Company, there is a considerable balance of commission still due to him. The defenders were well aware that a balance against the pursuer was only brought out by debiting against salary and commissions sums which he had expended in expenses duly accounted for to them, for which he was not credited, and other sums which were not under the contract between pursuer and Livingstone & Company proper charges against him. They made said charges knowing well that pursuer was not guilty of embezzlement or dishonest misappropriation, but that the whole question between him and them was merely one of accounting."

The defenders, who denied that the effect of the change of remuneration of the pursuer was to avoid the policy of insurance, pleaded, inter alia, privilege.

On 20th March 1900 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) appointed the following to be the issues for the trial of the cause:—(1) (This issue referred to a matter which it is unnecessary to report.) "(2) Whether, on a date between 6th and 13th October 1899, the defender Lumsden did, within the office of the Life and Health Assurance Association, Limited, 41 George Street, Edinburgh, in presence and hearing of William B. Mitchell, cashier of the said company, say of and concerning the pursuer that he had appropriated considerable sums of money belonging to Livingstone & Company, and that they desired to make a claim against the said association in respect of said sums, under a policy dated 31st January 1899, by which said defenders were insured in respect of pursuer's intromissions, or did use other words of the like meaning and effect of and concerning the pursuer, and did thereby falsely and calumniously represent that the pursuer had dishonestly appropriated money belonging to and for which he was accountable to the said defenders; or, whether, on a date between 6th and 13th October 1899, the defender Lumsden, acting on behalf and with the instructions and authority of the defenders Livingstone & Company, did," &c. (as in the first alternative of the issue). "(3) It being admitted that the letter dated 26th September 1899, and the letter dated 24th October 1899, and the statement accompanying the same, all printed at length in the schedule hereto, and numbered Nos. 1, 2, and 3 respectively, were written and sent to the said Life and Health Assurance Company, Limited, by the defender Lumsden, acting on behalf and under the instructions of the defenders Livingstone & Company; whether the same, or any, and which of them, are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represent that he had dishonestly appropriated to his own uses the sums in the said statement, being money belonging to the defenders Livingstone & Company, and for which he was accountable to them."*

The defenders reclaimed, and moved that the issues be varied by the insertion of "and maliciously" after "calumniously."

Argued for the defenders;—Where, as here, there is a prima facie case of privilege disclosed by the pursuer's averments, malice must be put in issue.[1] It was only where no such prima facie case was disclosed by the pursuer's averments that the question of privilege, with the consequent necessity for proving malice, was left for determination at the trial.[2] The defenders did not know that the change of the pursuer's remuneration had any effect on the policy of insurance, and were of opinion that it had not. But whether it had any effect or not could only be determined after a claim on the policy had been made, and before a claim could be made it was necessary to make the statements complained of. The presumption of privilege thus raised could not be elided merely by averring that the defenders made the statements "falsely," or in the knowledge that the policy was void.

* "OPINION.—The first issue was not objected to, and must, of course, be allowed. At the debate I was much disposed to disallow the other issues, on the ground that the letters complained of were privileged, and that, having regard to the special circumstances of this case, there was no relevant averment of malice; but since the debate the pursuer has amended his record, and I think that now issues cannot be denied on these letters. I am not now prepared to say that there is no relevant averment of malice. The question, therefore, is whether privilege is disclosed by the condescendence. At the discussion I thought it was; but on this point also the record has been amended, and in consequence of that amendment I think it safer to leave the question of malice to be decided at the trial; and I shall therefore approve of issues 2 and 3. The defenders took no distinction between the case of Livingstone & Company and that of Lumsden."

Argued for the pursuer;—Whether the defenders made the statements complained of in knowledge or in ignorance that the policy was void was a question of proof. If it should turn out that they made them in knowledge, there could be no question of privilege, and that question and the consequent question of proving malice should be left for determination at the trial.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The only question at present in dispute between the parties is, whether as regards statements made to the company with whom the defenders had insured themselves against defalcations by the pursuer, the pursuer in taking an issue of slander must not undertake to prove specific malice. I am of opinion that in this case it is right that the word "maliciously" should be inserted. There can be no doubt that if the defenders believed that their servant had been guilty of defalcation in regard to funds in his hands to which they had right, it was their right and their duty to communicate that to the insurers, who would be called on to make good their loss. I think it was their duty, but if there could be any doubt on that matter I think it was distinctly their right. On that ground, if there was nothing else in the case, the insertion of the word "maliciously" in the issue would be imperative in my opinion. But it is said that the claim of the defenders against the insurance company had fallen, and that therefore the privilege in making the statement is excluded. That is not admitted, and we cannot know how it stands until the facts are ascertained. It may have a considerable bearing on the question of malice should it turn out at the trial that the defenders had no ground for supposing that they had a claim against the insurance company. But at present I see no ground for holding that the occasion was not privileged. It is only on a question of legal objection that it can be maintained that the defenders had lost their privilege. That cannot be accepted at this stage of the case as a ground for adjusting the issues in a particular way. I am therefore in favour of varying the second and third issues by inserting the word "maliciously."

LORD YOUNG.—I agree that if there is to be an issue the occasion was privileged, and in order to succeed the pursuer must prove malice. Of that I have no doubt whatever. The most ordinary way of proving malice is for the pursuer to shew that the defenders' statements were such as he knew to be false or had no reasonable ground for thinking to be true. But I must say that I have a very strong impression that there is here no relevant case at all, because it is well established that a mere averment of malice is not sufficient; there must be some statement of facts and circumstances upon which the averment is founded. I think there is no such statement on this record. It is indeed stated that the representations were made to the insurance company by the defenders when they knew that they had no claim under the policy against the company. But this is merely a statement that the defenders were of opinion that they had no claim at law, and that is not, according to my impression, sufficient. But no argument was submitted on this point, and it is unnecessary to decide it, although I have heard learned Judges express the opinion that it was the duty of the Court, if they thought a case not relevant, to take objection to its being proceeded with.

LORD TRAYNER.—With regard to the second and third issues, the defenders move that the word "maliciously" should be inserted. This the Lord Ordinary, in adjusting the issues, refused to do, on the ground that if it appeared at the trial of the cause that the defenders were entitled to plead privilege, the pursuer would then be required to prove malice in order to succeed, and that therefore there was no necessity for putting malice in issue antecedently to the trial. In the ordinary case—that is, the most usual case—this course would be the proper one to adopt. But I think our practice on this matter is now fairly well settled, and the rule seems to be, that where upon the pursuer's record there is disclosed a prima facie case of privilege, malice should be put in the issue, and otherwise not. In the present case I think the record does disclose a prima facie case of privilege. Statements, otherwise slanderous, are considered privileged if the statement is made either in the performance of a duty or in the exercise of a right. Now, here the statements made by the defenders, and to which the second and third issues have reference, were made to an insurance company by whom the pursuer's honesty had been guaranteed, and were necessary to support the defenders' claim under the policy of insurance or guarantee. The defenders were, prima facie, entitled to make the statements complained of in support of the claim they were making under the policy, and were therefore privileged in making them. That being so, it follows, on the rule I have referred to, that malice should be put in issue. It is said by the pursuer that the defenders knew when they made these statements that the policy was void, and that no claim under it could be maintained, and that the statements were made, not in support of any claim, but to damage the pursuer's reputation. If this be established it may prove the malice which the pursuer avers, and entitle him to a verdict. But on this part of the case I think the pursuer must prove malice in order to succeed, and must, as I have said, take an issue that the statements complained of were made maliciously. I entertain no doubt that the pursuer has relevantly averred malice. In my view, therefore, the issues, as adjusted by the Lord Ordinary, should be varied as proposed by the defenders.

LORD MONCREIFF.—In judging whether a pursuer's averments disclose a case of privilege, it is necessary to discriminate between averments which merely imply malice and those which are sufficient prima facie to negative privilege. Stated broadly, the distinction to be taken is between the circumstances and occasion in and on which the words complained of were uttered, and the motives which induced the defender to use them. The relations between the pursuer and the defenders, the nature of the words used, the occasion on which and circumstances in which they were uttered—all these matters are relevant to the question whether the occasion was privileged. But the privilege of the occasion is not necessarily affected by averments as to the motives which led to the words being used or allegations of the defenders' dishonesty in using them. These are very material in deciding whether the words were used maliciously as well as falsely, but that is another matter. The whole question, indeed, is one of onus. If the word "maliciously" is inserted in the issue the pursuer may still succeed, but he must prove malice. If, on the other hand, "maliciously" is not inserted, the defenders may still succeed if they are able to shew at the trial that the occasion was privileged, and the pursuer is unable to establish malice.

Now, in the present case, I think that taking a broad view of the pursuer's averments, prima facie a case of privilege is disclosed. Under the policy in which the defenders were interested they were bound, under penalty of forfeiture, to intimate at once to the insurance company if they entertained any suspicions of their traveller's honesty, and this they did in the letters, which seem to me to be couched in temperate language. It is said that these statements were not made honestly, and that the defenders' sole motive in making them was not to preserve their rights under the policy, which (it is said) were already lost, but to discredit the pursuer. If this is proved it may be very good evidence of malice on the part of the defenders, but it appears to me to be extrinsic to the question whether the communication was privileged or not.

I therefore think that the second and third issues should be altered to the effect of inserting the word "maliciously."

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, varied the second and third issues for the pursuer in terms of the defenders' notice, and the variations having been made, approved of the pursuer's issues as so amended, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed in the cause.

Master and Servant—Use by servant after leaving service of information obtained during service—Implied Contract—Confidentiality.—Evidence on a consideration of which it was held (aff. judgment of Lord Pearson, diss. Lord Young) that a person who had been the agent of a friendly society was not entitled, after he had left the society's service, to give written lists of the members of the society to the officials of a rival society.

2D DIVISION. Lord Pearson.

THE LIVERPOOL VICTORIA LEGAL FRIENDLY SOCIETY was a friendly society established in 1843, and incorporated under the Friendly Societies Acts. The society had a large business throughout Great Britain; its invested funds being over £1,000,000, and its membership about 1,500,000. Its main business was to enable the members, by means of weekly or monthly subscriptions, to ensure a payment on the death of a member or a member's child, or an endowment upon either attaining a certain age. It conducted and promoted its business by means of local collectors, each of whom had a separate list of members in his collecting-book, and collected on a separate round weekly or fortnightly. Each group of collectors was under the supervision of a sub-agent, who checked their collecting-books, tested the business, and made reports to the district manager.

Samuel Houston entered the service of the society in 1894, when he became a sub-agent in the Border District. In March 1896 he was appointed to a sub-agency in Fife, which included Alloa, Dunfermline, and Kirkcaldy, and the parts adjoining. This he held until February 1898, when Kirkcaldy and its neighbourhood were withdrawn from his sub-agency. His salary was £2 a-week, and his engagement was terminable on a week's notice. It was in fact terminated as on 30th March 1898 by letter from the district manager, dated 23d March 1898.

On 28th December 1898 the Society, and three persons as its trustees, raised an action against Houston, concluding for decree ordaining the defender "to deliver to the pursuers all letters, documents, or copies of documents having reference to the business of the pursuers, including all lists of members of the pursuers' society, and all extracts, excerpts, or copies made from the books, registers, or cards used in connection with the pursuers' business, and to which the defender had access while in the pursuers' employment as a sub-agent, between on or about 18th October 1894 and 30th March 1898." And in particular for decree ordaining the defender "to deliver to the pursuers all lists at present in his possession, containing the names of the members of pursuers' society who reside in Kirkcaldy, Dysart, Gallatown, Pathhead, Methil, or Leven, all in the county of Fife, and also in Alloa, in the county of Clackmannan": And further, for interdict against the defender "communicating to third parties, without the pursuers' consent or to their prejudice, any information relating to the business or affairs of the pursuers, obtained by him while acting in the employment of the pursuers": And in particular for interdict against the defender "delivering lists of the pursuers' members to the agents of the Royal Liver Friendly Society, or to any other third party"; and for £50 as damages.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 4) " . . . In consequence of his dismissal from the pursuers' employment, the defender conceived a violent animus against the society, and he endeavoured in various ways to injure the society's business. . . . While acting as sub-agent in Fifeshire, the defender had full access to all the books and documents belonging to the society, and he thereby obtained information on private and confidential matters connected with the society's business. . . ." (Cond. 5) "In breach of his duty and in violation of the rights of the pursuers, the defender made copies or extracts from the books and documents relating to the Fifeshire business, and in particular he made a list of the society's members in Fifeshire and in the Alloa district, which he secretly retained when his duties as sub-agent terminated. This he did for the purpose of using said lists to injure the society's business. . . ." (Cond. 6) In April 1898 the defender "called on Mr William Hawthorn Queen, Dunfermline, who is the district manager there of the Royal Liver Friendly Society, and furnished him with a list of the pursuers' members in Fifeshire. . . . The defender disclosed the said private and confidential information for the said purpose of injuring the pursuers' business. In consequence of said disclosure of information and names by the defender a large number of pursuers' members have been canvassed by the agents of other societies for the purpose of inducing them to leave the pursuers' society, and a considerable quantity of business has been lost to the pursuers. The defender still retains lists of the pursuers' subscribers in the Dunfermline and Kirkcaldy district, and also in the Alloa district, and the defender has frequently threatened to the society's officials to do further damage, by means of the use of said lists, to the society's business."

The defender denied these averments.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender being illegally in possession of documents or copies of documents which are the property of the pursuers, and which contain private information relative to the business of the pursuers, they are entitled to decree for delivery of the same, in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (2) The defender having improperly and illegally disclosed confidential information relative to the affairs of the society to third parties, and having thereby caused loss, injury, and damage to the pursuers, they are entitled to decree of interdict, as craved.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The defender having no property in his possession or under his control belonging to the pursuers, is entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses. (4) The defender not having done, and not intending to do, any of the things against pursuers for which interdict is sought, the conclusions for interdict should be refused.

There were also pleas applicable to the conclusion for damages.

On 12th April 1900 the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) after a proof, the nature of which sufficiently appears from his Lordship's opinion, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the document No. 146 of process, which is in the handwriting of the defender, contains confidential information regarding the business of the pursuers' society, which was acquired by the defender in the course of his employment as their sub-agent; and that he handed the said document to a third party in the expectation of obtaining pecuniary gain by and through the same being used adversely to the interest of the pursuers: Finds that although it is not proved that other similar documents are in the possession of the defender, the pursuers were and are in the reasonable belief and apprehension, founded on the defender's own words and acts, that he is possessed of such documents, and intends to make an improper and illegal use of them: Therefore interdicts, prohibits, and discharges the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Ordains the defender to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £5 sterling in name of damages: Quoad ultra dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—(After explaining the nature and objects of the society, and the circumstances of the defender's connection with it)—The defender's dismissal was followed in three weeks by the abrupt resignation of the two chief collectors of the district—William Brown and Robert Best. Their letters of resignation were dated 20th April; and on the following day they were appointed collectors in the same district for a rival society in the same line of business—the Royal Liver Friendly Society. This was done under an arrangement with the defender by which he recommended them to the Royal Liver officials for the appointment, and was to participate in the commission earned by them for new business, to the extent of one-third share. . . . In point of fact, he drew sums from Brown and

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—It no doubt was the law that if a servant surreptitiously copied a list of names and addresses of customers from his master's books with the intention of using it for the purpose of obtaining orders after he left the service, he might be interdicted from so using it, or found liable in damages if he used it. But it had not been proved that the defender had copied anything from the pursuers' books. The list No. 146 of process was not a copy of any list in the books, and the result of the evidence was that the defender had compiled it from memory after he had left the pursuers' service. If that was so, the action failed. Unless he had entered into a special agreement to the contrary, a man was entitled to solicit orders from his former master's customers, if he trusted to his memory only for their names, or to hand over a list of their names to another person, if such a list was compiled from memory only. It would impose an unreasonable restraint on the freedom of trade to hold otherwise.[1]

Argued for the pursuers;—It had been proved that the defender

Best on this head amounting to £10 or £11. Of course business diverted to the Royal Liver from the pursuers' society was 'new business' for the Royal Liver; and it is obvious that it was mainly in this direction that success was expected and was achieved. This went on for some weeks, during which the pursuers' collections in that district suffered materially; and the pursuers were put to considerable expense and trouble in sending down Mr Peel, Mr Foster, and other officials to counteract the movement.

"The defender had not since leaving the pursuers' employment entered the service of the Royal Liver, or of any other society. He took part with Brown and Best in canvassing and bringing over the pursuers' members partly for the sake of the commission I have just mentioned, and partly, I fear, to be even with the pursuers. They had brought his employment to an end on a week's notice; and they had further refused to meet a money claim which had stood over for two years, and for which, or part of which, he sued them in a Sheriff Court action, raised on 9th April. It is plain, and, in fact, the defender admits, that he thought himself badly used; and I hold it to be clearly proved by the testimony of credible witnesses, and in spite of the defender's denials, that he gave vent on several occasions in pretty strong language to threats of what he would do to the detriment of the pursuers, and the injury of their business in Fife.

"Down to this point, however, the pursuers' case discloses no good ground of action. I am not to criticise the motive of acts which are not in themselves illegal, or to decide questions of good taste, or of insurance etiquette. And the pleadings do not charge the defender either with seducing Brown and Best to break any contract with the pursuers or with diverting business from the pursuers' society by means of false representation as to the pursuers' conduct or position.

"The pursuers' case is rather this—That the defender, when he quitted the pursuers' service, was in illegal possession of confidential documents which are the property of the pursuers, and that he has since illegally disclosed their contents to third parties, to the pursuers' loss and damage. Their averment is,—that the defender having in the course of his service become intimately acquainted with the society's business, wrongfully and contrary to his duty, compiled lists of the members within his district, and kept them secretly in his possession, that he might use them afterwards for had compiled the list while he was still in the pursuers' service. Even if that had not been proved, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was well founded for the reasons given in his opinion, and was in accordance with the authorities mentioned by the Lord Ordinary.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The defender in this case, who was formerly sub-agent of the pursuers' society, having while in their employment the means of seeing the lists of persons insured with the pursuers, the allegation is that he copied these lists, and after ceasing to be in their employment made use of these lists in aid of the canvassing of another friendly society to obtain the transfer of their insurers to the other company, he getting a commission on the effecting of the insurances. The defender had not in the course of his duties as sub-agent any duty requiring him to be in possession of such lists. They were the collectors' books, and, although he might see them in the course of his duties, no part of his duty required him his own purposes; and further, that he did so use them, with a view to his own pecuniary gain, after he had ceased to be in the pursuers' service. The pursuers further say—(though they contend that it is not necessary to their case)—that he did this at a time when he was not in the service of any rival society, and had no legitimate occasion or motive for doing it.

"It is clear that he had ample opportunity for making such lists, and also that the contents of the collecting-books are strictly confidential. Moreover (if it be necessary to add this), the collecting-books themselves are, and remain, the property of the society; and there can, in my opinion, be no question that this property extends not merely to the boards and paper, but also to the contents. It is further proved (1) that a sub-agent has not in the course of his duty any legitimate occasion for making copies of the whole or any section of a collecting-book; (2) that such copies, if made, are highly dangerous to the interests of the society. (His Lordship then referred to the conclusions of the summons.)

"The pursuers have had no large measure of success in tracing documents of a confidential character to the defender's possession. As I understand the evidence, there are no missing collecting-books; and so far as actual recoveries are concerned, their case rests on the document or list (No. 146 of process), which is in fact a list in the defender's handwriting of the surnames and addresses of a large number of the pursuers' members in Kirkcaldy and district. The defender, when examined as a haver, deponed that he never had a list of the society's members in the Kirkcaldy district or in the Alloa or Dunfermline districts. And he gives, partly in evidence and partly through his counsel, an explanation and justification of No. 146 of process, which, if it were well founded, would go far to support his main contention.

"I may here say that I am afraid I can give but little weight to the defender's testimony. He seems to me to be discredited as a witness by the mass of contradictions which his evidence presents when compared with that of several other witnesses, and notably Messrs Peel, Foster, Queen, Wilson, and Brown. These gentlemen, all of whom seemed to me credible witnesses, are contradicted by the defender at many points, and in diverse matters; and the defender, who had heard their evidence, sums up the matter thus—'They have given narrations of conversations with me, the bulk of which I now declare emphatically on oath to be absolutely untrue.' This, with the observations made upon it that the pursuers' witnesses are paid officials of the society, would point to a conspiracy against the defender, of which I can find no trace, and in the existence of to have possession of them or copies of them. These lists were the property of the purchasers, and in the regular possession of their canvassers. I am satisfied on the evidence that the defender did make copies of the lists, and did so with a view to put them to his own uses. Only one of these copies of lists has been recovered, No. 146 of process, which is a list of members of the pursuers' society. The Lord Ordinary has expressed his opinion that the evidence of the defender on this and cognate matters is not trustworthy, and a perusal of the evidence leads one to agree in that view. I think it is established that the defender gave the use of this list to the agent of another society, intending it to be used in the interests of that society, and necessarily against the interests of the pursuers' society. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that this was illegal. This list has been recovered by the pursuers, and therefore no order in regard to it is required. But it is a question whether they are not entitled to protection from other similar lists being used by the defender. It is clear on the evidence that the defender admitted to numerous witnesses that he had such lists. This which I do not believe; and I see no escape from the alternative view. I arrive at this result after giving full weight to what was urged for the defender as to the effect of the testimony of Mrs Reid and the Nobles.

"Accepting, as I do in the main, the account given by the pursuers' witnesses, I find the facts established as to the list No. 146 of process are as follows: It was handed by the defender on 21st April to Mr Queen (then agent for the Royal Liver Society), as a list of the pursuers' members in the Kirkcaldy district, in order to be used for diverting members from the one office to the other, the defender adding that he would expect one-third of the usual 'procuration fee' for the new business thence arising. Mr Queen took it with some misgiving, and shortly afterwards (Cuthbert says 'in the beginning of May') passed it on to Cuthbert and Holburn, the Royal Liver officials in Kirkcaldy. They used the list with the object of getting over members, but met with little or no success. And thus it came about that the defender (through no fault of his own) made no gain by the transaction. The discovery of this list by the pursuers was in a sense accidental. (His Lordship then explained how the list No. 146 came into the possession of the pursuers.)

"The justification of this list, and of his conduct with regard to it, offered on the part of the defender, really amounts to this—(1) That it was compiled by him, entirely from memory, about 20th May 1898, after he had left the pursuers' service; and (2) that it is not really a list of the pursuers' members, but a list of families, some members of which were insured with the pursuers, and the other members of which furnished material for canvassing on behalf of another society. (1) On the first point, nice distinctions may no doubt be suggested as to the limits within which a person who has acquired confidential information in the course of his service is entitled after quitting the service to use his memory to the disadvantage of his late master's business. If he enters the service of a rival employer, he may be entitled to use his memory, even of confidential matters, in furthering the business of his new master, and to this limited purpose he may possibly be entitled to commit what he remembers to writing. For anything I decide in this case, that may be quite a legal thing to do. But this leaves unaffected the principle which is at the bottom of the pursuers' case, namely, that where a servant acquires confidential information in the course of his service, the law implies a contract that the information shall not then or afterwards be ultroneously disclosed to a third party. To constitute a breach of this contract, it is not necessary

he now denies, but the Lord Ordinary would not believe him, and therefore granted interdict. On the question of damages, the Lord Ordinary has awarded only £5, and I would not propose to interfere with his decision. On the whole matter, I see no reason to differ from the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and would move your Lordships to adhere.

LORD YOUNG.—The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor begins with this finding:—"Finds that the document No. 146 of process, which is in the handwriting of the defender, contains confidential information regarding the business of the pursuers' society, which was acquired by the defender in the course of his employment as their sub-agent." Now I am unable to assent to that. The document No. 146 of process contains, in my opinion, no confidential information regarding the business of the pursuers' society. It contains no information of any kind whatever, except information which the defender had acquired and become possessed of, as a canvasser and collector of the pursuers' society, regarding the

that the confidential information should be published to the world, nor that the information is communicated gratuitously. It is enough that the information so acquired is supplied to a third person without any just or legitimate occasion for supplying it. It was urged for the defender that the list was made up after he had left the service of the pursuers. I do not think that this is so in fact; but even if it was, I think it would be an unsound distinction which should make the use of such a list legal or not according as it was made up the day after or the day before the employment ended.

"(2) As to the return of the list itself it may, to a certain extent, answer the description put upon it by the defender. It is a list of family names, and not of individuals. But that is a barren and artificial distinction. The substance of the matter is that the list was furnished by the defender as and for a list of the Kirkcaldy membership, that it was capable of being so used by anyone following the names and addresses, and that it was in fact so used by Cuthbert and Holburn. The defender attempted to justify, or to palliate his use of the contents of the collecting-books, by opening the question whether the collector has not a qualified interest in the contents. The contention is, that an outgoing collector can 'sell his book' to his successor, the successor being willing to pay for this facility; and that this custom is well known to, and recognised by, the officials, subject only to the society's power of vetoing the nominee of the outgoing collector. The proof shews that the practice has been carried to considerable lengths; and it is obviously capable of gross abuse, and well worthy the immediate attention of the societies, if they desire to be served by the best men they can get, and not merely by the highest bidder. But I do not see how the existence of the practice benefits the case of the defender, who was neither an outging nor an incoming collector, and who, as a sub-agent, had no legitimate occasion to compile any lists. Accordingly, I hold this list No. 146 of process ought to be in the possession of the pursuers, and that the use made of it by the defender was illegal. As the pursuers were in the lawful possession of it when the action was raised, there is no need for giving them decree for the delivery of it.

"The question under the first conclusion of the summons, therefore, turns on whether other documents containing confidential information have been traced to the possession of the defender. The view I take of the evidence is, that the pursuers have failed to make this out as matter of fact. That they were justified in making their allegations, and in insisting upon an inquiry as to this matter, is, I think, clear. I hold it to be established that people whom he canvassed, and from whom he collected; and information so acquired is not, in my opinion, confidential information, but is information which the person who has acquired it may communicate to anyone whom he pleases. The Lord Ordinary goes on to find "that he," that is, the defender, "handed the said document to a third party in the expectation of obtaining pecuniary gain by and through the same being used adversely to the interest of the pursuers." Of course, anyone is at liberty to use to his own advantage information which he has acquired so long as that information is not private and confidential, which, as I have said, I do not think the information here is. If a solicitor or a director has legitimately acquired information which is not confidential in the course of the business under his charge, he is at liberty to use it in any way that he may think to his advantage. He may be acting in a manner which one may not be able to approve on other grounds, as not being in accordance with what is fitting in a moral sense, but anything of that sort lies outside the region with which we in this Court are concerned. The Lord Ordinary goes on: "Finds that although it is not proved that other similar documents are in the possession of the defender, the pursuers were and are in the reasonable belief and apprehension, founded on the defender's own words and acts, that he is possessed of such documents, and intends to make an improper and illegal use of them." I am unable to assent to that as a finding which is supported by the evidence. I do not on various occasions, and to various persons, and in particular to Peel, Brown, and Queen, the defender represented that he had other lists of the pursuers' members in his possession (specially a list of the Alloa district) which he was ready to use ultroneously against the pursuers. He now says he has none; and it appears that the active canvass which was carried on by Brown, Best, and the defender in the Dunfermline district, was done without lists, the collectors being familiar with the rounds. I am not at all satisfied that the defender has not in his possession copy collecting-books and lists of members, though his assertions on the subject may quite well have been empty boasts. But in the absence of definite information, I am of opinion that decree for delivery in terms of the first conclusion would be inappropriate, as it would be impossible to say when the decree was implemented. I therefore dismiss that conclusion. I think the interest of the pursuers will be sufficiently protected by an interdict.

"As to the conclusion for damages, the items claimed were all incurred in relation to the attack made by the defender on the pursuers' Dunfermline connection. They consisted of the expense incurred in sending inspectors to counteract the defender's scheme, and of the loss of premiums through the transfer of business, together with a sum for general damage. If the Dunfermline canvas had proceeded upon lists furnished by the defender, and not (as I hold) upon the mere memory of Brown and Best, I should have found the pursuers entitled to the full sum claimed. But the illegal communication affected only the Kirkcaldy district, where the canvassing proved a failure. There being, therefore, no specific damage resulting therefrom, I think the justice of the case will be met by an award of £5 in name of general damage for breach of the implied contract.

"On the question of law involved in the case, I was referred to the following authorities:—Brown's Trustees v. Hay, July 12, 1898, 25 R. 1112; Robb v. Green, L. R. [1895], 2 Q. B. 315; Lamb v. think that it is proved that the defender was possessed of any such documents. On the whole matter, therefore, my opinion is that the findings of the Lord Ordinary are not supported by the evidence, and I therefore think that his interlocutor ought to be recalled, and the defender assoilzied.

Burgh—Dean of Guild Court—Warrant to erect building—Procedure where warrant not applied for till building erected.—Held (diss. Lord Young) that an order by the Dean of Guild Court to lodge an application for a warrant and relative plans was competent, although the buildings to which the warrant referred were already erected.

2D DIVISION. Dean of Guild Court, Edinburgh.

IN pursuance of an agreement with the Corporation of Edinburgh, the Caledonian Railway Company, in 1899, began operations for the removal of a stone arch bridge which carried their Leith and Granton branch railway over the Corstorphine Road, Murrayfield, at a point within the municipal boundaries of Edinburgh, and for the erection in lieu thereof, first, of a temporary wooden bridge, and ultimately of a new girder bridge on the site of the original bridge, but of greater height and greater span. No warrant for these operations was applied for, or obtained, from the Dean of Guild Court. By the agreement with the Corporation, dated 9th and 17th May 1899, the bridge was to be reconstructed with the view of widening and improving the roadway, in accordance with plans approved of by the Corporation. The new bridge was to have a span of 54 feet with 16 feet 6 inches of headway for its entire span, in place of a span of 35 feet with 14 feet 9 inches of headway in the centre, the latter being the dimensions of the original bridge. It was provided that the work of removing and reconstructing the bridge should be carried out by the Caledonian Railway Company, and the whole cost borne by the Corporation, with the exception of a sum of £1000 to be contributed by the railway company.

On 29th December 1899 George Somerville, the procurator-fiscal of the Edinburgh Dean of Guild Court, presented a petition to the Dean of Guild Court against the company, on the ground that the operations in question required a warrant from that Court, and were, in the absence of such warrant, a contravention of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1891.* At the date of the petition the original bridge had been removed, the temporary wooden bridge erected, and the new bridge was in the course of construction. The petitioner craved the Court (1) to interdict the operations in question till a warrant was obtained; (2) to impose a penalty for proceeding with the operations without a warrant; and (3) to remove if, and in so far as, required by the Court, the works executed.

The Caledonian Railway maintained that they "were not bound to submit the plans of the reconstructed or renewed bridge for the approval of the Dean of Guild Court, or to obtain warrant of the Dean of Guild Court authorising the reconstruction of the said bridge." They stated,—(Stat. 6) "Section 59 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891, which the petitioner alleges to have been contravened, does not apply to the reconstruction or renewal of the bridge in question, and the said bridge is not a house or building in the meaning of the Act; and in the Edinburgh Improvement and Tramways Act, 1896,† which extends the powers of the Dean of Guild

Section 48. "Every person who proposes to erect any house or building, or to alter the structure of any existing house or building . . . shall lodge with the clerk of the Dean of Guild Court a petition for warrant to do so. . . ."

Section 59. "Every person who shall erect or begin to erect any house or building . . . without a warrant or otherwise than in conformity with a warrant of the Dean of Guild Court, and every person who shall in the erection or alteration of any house or building, the erection or alteration of which has been sanctioned by the Dean of Guild Court, deviate from the plan or plans, and section or sections, elevation or elevations, and detailed drawings so sanctioned, or shall in the erection or alteration of any house or building in any way contravene the building rules of this Act, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £25, besides being bound, if and in so far as required by the Dean of Guild Court, to take down and remove the said house or building, or to restore it to the state it was in previous to the alterations thereon, or to alter it in such a way as the Dean of Guild Court shall direct so as to make it in conformity with the warrant of the Dean of Guild Court."

Section 3. "In this Act, and for the purposes of this Act, unless there be something in the subject or context inconsistent with or repugnant to such construction, the several words and expressions to which meanings are assigned by the Acts of 1879 to 1890 have the same respective meanings."

"'House' means a dwelling-house and every part thereof."

The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. cxxxii.), by section 5 declares that "the word 'building' shall extend to and comprise all buildings and erections of what kind and nature soever, and every part of such buildings, excepting dwelling-houses."

† The Edinburgh Improvement and Tramways Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. ccxxiv.), enacts, Part V. sec. 57,—"In addition to the requirements of section 48 of the Act of 1891 and section 35 of the Act of 1893, a warrant of the Dean of Guild Court shall, from and after the passing of this Act, be required for excavations intended to be made for and in connection with houses or buildings intended to be erected, and no such excavations shall be made by any person without obtaining a warrant of the said Court, and all penalties prescribed by the Act of 1891 and the Act Court, it is provided by section 74 that the provisions of Part V. of that Act should not apply to railways or stations of any railway company, or the buildings connected therewith."

The Railway Company pleaded;—(2) No jurisdiction. (4) The works and operations of the respondents (the Railway Company) having been approved of by the Corporation of Edinburgh, the respondents are not bound to submit plans to the Dean of Guild Court.

On 22d February 1900 the Dean of Guild Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the respondents, the Caledonian Railway Company, without any warrant of Court, and in contravention of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police (Amendment) Act, 1891, section 59, have removed the bridge in question, and are presently erecting a new permanent bridge on the site thereof, as set forth in the petition: Finds that there is nothing in section 74 of the Edinburgh Improvement and Tramways Act, 1896, to exclude from the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild Court buildings to be erected by railway companies, and that a warrant of Court is necessary for the operations in connection with the bridge in question: Therefore, in the meantime, ordains the respondents forthwith to lodge an application for warrant, with relative plans, and continues the cause."

The Caledonian Railway Company appealed to the Court of Session. When the case came up for hearing the new bridge had been completed, and had been approved by the Board of Trade.

Argued for the appellants;—The question was whether an offence had been committed under the Act of 1891, and in particular under sections 48 and 59. That Act contained a complete code of procedure, and virtually repealed the code in the Act of 1879, and the definition of "buildings" in the Act of 1879 was therefore inapplicable. The construction of the term "house or building" in the Act of 1891 must therefore be found in that Act itself, which contained a definition of "house," but not of "building," and on the well-established principles of construction "building" must be held to include only what was ejusdem generis with "house." In particular, the expression could not include railways and buildings in connection with railways.[1] The case of Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company v. Dymock[2] did not proceed on the view that the company must first obtain the warrant of the Dean of Guild Court; all that it decided was that where railway operations involved danger to the public the Dean of Guild Court could interfere as representing—at the date of that decision—the street authority in order to see that the operations were conducted safely. Even if it were held that this was a "building," the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild Court did not extend to of 1893 with respect to any breach of the provisions of these Acts or either of them shall apply to such excavations as if the provisions herein contained were contained in the Act of 1891 and in the Act of 1893, or in either of these Acts."

Section 74. "The provisions of Part V. of this Act (except sections 70 to 73, both inclusive) shall not apply to the railways or stations of any railway company, or the buildings connected therewith (other than dwelling-houses), or to any street or road belonging to any railway company."

"buildings" erected by railway companies. Section 57 of the Act of 1896 re-enacted the provisions of the earlier Acts as to applications for warrants to the Dean of Guild Court, with the addition that excavations should not be begun before the warrant was obtained. Section 74, which provided that the provisions of Part V. of the statute (including sec. 57) should not apply to railway companies, would be grossly anomalous if it did not mean the exemption to apply to the whole matter of application for warrants to the Dean of Guild, not merely to the additional provision introduced by the Act of 1896.

Argued for the respondent;—If the definition in the Act of 1879 applied then there was an end of the question, because the bridge was clearly an "erection of what kind and nature soever." In North British Railway Company v. Moore[1] a ventilating shaft, and in M'Millan v. Bennett[2] a wall, had been held to be a building. The Dean of Guild Court had clearly jurisdiction over railway companies, as over other incorporated companies, unless that jurisdiction was excluded by statute.[3] There was nothing in Part V. of the Act of 1896 which affected the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild, and therefore the exemption from the provisions of Part V. of railway companies did not exempt them from complying with the provisions of the Act of 1891. The inspection by the Board of Trade had no reference to safety of passengers and vehicles on the road, but only to traffic on the railway. It was thus necessary that the Dean of Guild Court should be responsible for the safety of passengers in the street.[4] The only question of substance in the case was the question of jurisdiction. The plans would be passed as a matter of course.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is not disputed that the appellants built the stonework of a bridge crossing a street of the city of Edinburgh without having applied for and received the authority of the Dean of Guild Court to execute the works. The questions in this case are (1) whether the sanction of the Dean of Guild Court was necessary to the legality of the proceeding with the work, and (2) if it was, whether the procurator-fiscal of that Court has asked for the proper remedy for this irregularity.

I have no doubt that, according to the statutes under which the Dean of Guild has power, the Railway Company were not entitled to do the work which they did until they had warrant from the Dean of Guild Court. The appellants do not deny the jurisdiction of that Court generally, but they plead first that railway works are exempt from it, and secondly that even if they are not, that the work they executed did not fall within the scope of the statutes, it not being a "building" in the sense of these Acts.

In support of the first of these contentions the appellants found on the recent Edinburgh Police Act of 1896. They maintain that, as section 74 of that Act exempts from the operation of Part V. of that Act railways or stations of a railway company, or the buildings connected therewith, the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild is ousted as regards such subjects. Now, Part V. does not, so far as I can see, touch or trench upon the powers of the Dean of Guild Court. Some detail matters connected with procedure in the Court are touched upon, but neither directly nor indirectly do any of the enacting words in any way deal with the jurisdiction of the Court. And whatever may be the effect of the General Police Act of 1892 upon such questions, that Act is not applicable to Edinburgh, which in these matters is governed by its own private statutes.

But then it is contended that the work executed was not a "building." To this I think it is a sufficient answer to quote the words of the interpretation clause of the Edinburgh Act of 1879, which certainly is not repealed, and which declares that "building" "shall extend to and comprise all buildings and erections of what kind and nature soever" (dwelling-houses are dealt with separately). That certainly is broad enough to cover the abutments and retaining walls of a bridge placed on either side of a public street, which are in every sense of the words "buildings," or "erections"—permanent structures of a substantial kind, in stone and lime, carrying a bridge over the street.

It only remains to consider whether the prayer of the Dean of Guild's procurator-fiscal is a proper and competent prayer in such a case. Can this be doubted, if the Railway Company laid itself open to a complaint for failure to obtain the necessary authority, and having proceeded without it? Whatever may be expedient to be done, the complainer was entitled in form to demand what he has demanded. His case is that a building erected without authority may be ordered to be taken down, and can only be erected after plans, &c., have been laid before the Court. The Court may have a discretion in the matter, but the time for the exercise of a discretion is when the Court is placed in the position of being able to exercise its powers. And the petition places the Court in that position, and is in that respect competent and regular. The prayer for imposition of a fine for the breach of law already committed is also competent and regular.

The whole case just comes to this: Although the appellants were acting with the approval of, and indeed for, the Corporation of Edinburgh, that did not relieve them from the duty of invoking the authority of a statutory Court entitled to oversee and regulate the erection of buildings. Although the burgh authorities are favourable to a work being executed, that cannot either exonerate a Court from failure to do its duty, nor enable a citizen to pass by its jurisdiction. And the matter being one, as I think, within its jurisdiction, and committed to its charge, the appellants, who failed to apply to it for authority, and carried out the works without its sanction, are amenable to its corrective jurisdiction for having done so. Accordingly, I would move your Lordships to refuse the appeal, and to remit the case back to the Dean of Guild Court.

Lord Young.—This is an appeal from an interlocutor of the Dean of Guild Court of Edinburgh pronounced upon a complaint by the Procurator-fiscal of that Court (the respondent in this appeal) against the Caledonian Railway Company (the appellants). The complaint is in substance that the appellants did, without a warrant of the Dean of Guild Court, and therefore in contravention of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891, section 59, remove a stone arch bridge which carried a branch of their line over the Corstorphine Road, erect in lieu thereof a temporary wooden bridge, and had begun to erect a new permanent bridge on and near the site of the old stone bridge. The prayer is to interdict the appellants from proceeding further with the operations until a warrant of Court be obtained therefor, to find the appellants liable in a penalty, and if and so far as required by the Court to take down and remove the buildings.

The appellants admit that they removed the old bridge and erected the new without a warrant of the Dean of Guild Court, explaining that they did so in execution of the agreement with the Magistrates and Council of the City of Edinburgh, and maintaining that on a sound construction of the statute a warrant of the Dean of Guild Court was not required for the work thus agreed upon and executed. This agreement is, or may be, an important feature of the case. It was stated to us that the purpose of it was the improvement of the Corstorphine Road (one of the public streets of Edinburgh) where it is crossed by the appellants' railway, by increasing its width by 19 feet (that is from 35 to 54 feet), and elevating the headway under the crossing-bridge to 16 feet 6 inches. It is very intelligible why the Magistrates and Council judged these improvements to be proper in the public interest with which they were charged, and therefore resolved that they should be made, if possible, as it was, with the consent and aid of the appellants, but not otherwise. The land required for widening the road was the property of the appellants, and the improved height of headway could only be effected by substituting for the stone-arch bridge—with a headway of 14 feet 9 inches, and that only at the centre of the arch,—a girder-bridge so placed as to give a straight headway of 16 feet 6 inches. By the agreement, the work, as might be expected, was to be executed by the appellants, but (with a limitation which I shall notice) at the expense of the Magistrates and Council, and to be paid for of course with municipal funds at their disposal for such a purpose. The limitation was that the appellants should contribute £1000, being, as was explained to us, the estimated worth to them of the superiority of the new bridge over the old. The appellants had obviously no other interest in the subject of the agreement, the import of which is simply that they should aid the Magistrates and Council in effecting the street improvements which they desired in the interest of the citizens, and at the city's expense, giving the land which was requisite for the widening of the street, and submitting to considerable temporary inconvenience for the consideration—and there was no other—of getting a new and better bridge at the cost to them of only £1000. The work which the appellants contracted to execute is specified in the agreement, and a plan of it there given so far as a plan was possible, for I suppose a plan for the removal of the old bridge, or for the erection and removal of the temporary wooden bridge was not required, or indeed reasonably possible.

On the Magistrates and Council there is by statute the duty imposed and the power conferred of improving the public roads and streets within the city, both carriageways and foot-pavements, as they may from time to time judge proper in the interest of the public, with whose safety and convenience in using the city thoroughfares they are charged, and to that end to cause them to be widened, and to acquire such adjoining land as they think necessary. See sections 31, 34, 35, 40, and 67 of the Act of 1891, on which this complaint is founded, also the fasciculus of clauses applicable to streets in the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, and particularly sections 133-6, and sections 146 and 148. The importance of this on the question immediately under consideration is the suggestion which it carries that in construing the general words "any house or building" as used in section 59 of the Act of 1891, on which the respondent's complaint is founded, we ought to avoid, if reasonably possible, attaching to them a meaning which would negative or interfere with the duty imposed on the Magistrates and Council of exercising their judgment in the matters to which I have been referring as distinctly committed to them exclusively, or the right of the public to have that judgment formed and acted on in their interest as the statute meant it should be. With respect to the duties and powers of the Magistrates and Council it may be useful also to notice section 46 of the Act of 1879.

Ground required for the purpose of being added to a street so as to widen it must of course be brought (whether by elevation or depression) to the level of the street, anything upon it inconsistent with the use to be made of it being removed. Here the ground which was thus acquired had been artificially elevated—had a railway upon it—I might say built upon it—the appellants' line both north and south of the Corstorphine Road being laid on an artificially elevated solum, although, I may observe, that it would not, in my opinion, signify if the elevation were natural with the road cut through it. The road, prior to the agreement and the operations executed under it, was at the part where it was crossed by the railway 35 feet wide, and was the boundary of the appellants' property, which adjoined it on both sides. The greater part of the ground acquired from them and added to the street (or road) was, I believe, on the south side, and for convenience of expression I shall assume that all of it was. It had, as I have said, a railway on it, the railway which crossed the road running on it till it reached the bridge which carried it across, and the height or elevation (whether natural or artificial does not signify) was about 20 feet above the level of the street to be widened. The removal of rails and reduction of elevation were the operations under the agreement on the acquired ground. There were no others. Every bit of that ground is now public street, having been made fit and suitable for vehicles, tramcars, &c., by operations directed by the Magistrates and Council with which the appellants had no concern or interest.

The question of the necessity or not of a Dean of Guild warrant for these operations is, so far as I see, not affected by the fact of a girder-bridge being put up. This question would, I think, have been just the same had there never been a crossing-bridge either before or after the adjoining land was acquired, and the operations on it which I have mentioned were executed. But the question of the necessity or not of such warrant for the erection of the bridge must also, of course, be considered, and being, as I think it is, the same, and depending on the same considerations as the other, I will take them together in expressing and explaining my opinion as to the import and meaning of the statutory provision on which the complaint is founded.

Caledonian Railway Co. v. Somerville.

The clause of the Act founded on subjects to a penalty every person "who shall erect or begin to erect any house or building without a warrant, . . . or otherwise than in conformity with a warrant of the Dean of Guild Court." The proposition of the respondent necessarily is, that the appellants when under the agreement or contract with the magistrates and council they removed rails from the ground which had been acquired to be added to the street, and by the removal of earth reduced the level thereof to that of the street, did in the sense of the Act "erect or begin to erect any house or building." I reject this proposition for reasons which I regard as too obvious to require expression.

With respect to the girder bridge, the respondent's proposition, of course, is that it is a "house or building" in the sense in which these words are used in the Act. The word we have to construe is "building," and in doing so we must take account of the word "house," with which it is always associated, not only in section 59 of the Act, but in every clause relating to the jurisdiction and duties of the Dean of Guild Court. The invariable combination is "any house or building." Having regard to this and the purpose and tenor of all the provisions in which the expression occurs, I am of opinion that the word "building" cannot reasonably and legitimately be taken as altogether separated and dissociated from its constant companion "house," and held to include everything, every operation or structure, which may be called a "building," or said to be built or erected. The language used suggests to my mind that the meaning intended is any house or any building of that kind and character—not merely any dwelling-house, but any building for the shelter and accommodation of human beings, for trade or business, education, worship, or amusement, or meetings of any description. This seems to me to be an intelligible and reasonable limitation of the meaning and import of the term "building" as used in the enactments which we have to construe. No other occurs to me, or, so far as my memory serves, has been suggested. The choice therefore seems to be between accepting the limitation which I have indicated and taking the word as including without limitation everything capable of being called "building." With respect to locality or site there is certainly no limitation other than this, that it must be within the burgh boundaries. Nor is there any limitation with respect to material—stone, brick, metal, wood, glass—or with respect to dimensions. The girder bridge now in question is of considerable dimensions, is made of metal, and, in the judgment of the proper statutory Government authority (the Board of Trade), is strong enough to carry safely a part of the Caledonian Railway. But if the term "building," as used in section 59 of the Edinburgh Police Act, 1891, includes this bridge, is there any stateable limitation of its meaning as used in the Act which will exclude any girder bridge within burgh without regard to size, material, or use?

We were referred to the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, for the meaning assigned in the interpretation clause (section 5) to the word "building," which being adopted by section 3 of the Act of 1891, "unless there be something in the subject or context inconsistent with or repugnant to such construction," certainly merits attention. The language of interpretation there employed is very general and comprehensive, and for that reason, were there no other, may require limitation and qualification in any particular application of it, as, for example, in the application of it to the word in question, as used in section 59 and also section 48 of the Act of 1891. All "erections of what kind and nature soever." These words taken without qualification or limitation would include a green-house, hot-house, or orchid-house of glass, a verandah or sunshade of iron or wood, a gardener's tool-house, a sundial, a flagstaff. These are erections of a "kind and nature" which may be, and frequently are, erected in fruit, vegetable, and flower gardens within burgh, not only in private grounds, but also in public grounds in the sense of being open to the public, such as West Princes Gardens, the Botanic Gardens, and the Arboretum. Further, common street lamps, Post-Office pillar letter-boxes, poles carrying telegraph wires, and the milestones, of which there are several within burgh, are, I should say, "erections of what kind and nature soever," if these words are taken absolutely and applied without regard to result or consequence. Very striking and certainly numerous and grave illustrations of the result or consequence to which the respondent's contention rested on this interpretation clause would lead may be seen and appreciated on a visit to any churchyard or cemetery within the bounds of the burgh, these being all of them crowded with erections of a "kind and nature" suited to the place. The word "building," and also the word "erection," taken without limitation, will apply to every structure I have referred to—lamp-posts, milestones, churchyard monuments. Either word (so taken) will apply to a garden wall or to a common stone dyke or fence-wall dividing fields, and that without regard to height, and it would follow that to substitute therefor, in whole or in part, a wooden paling or metal railing or a wire fence would, in the sense of section 48 of the Act, be "to alter the structure of an" (any) "existing house or building."

Many, I think most, if not all, the streets in Edinburgh—I mean, of course, not the houses, but the thoroughfares, carriage-ways, and foot-pavements of streets—have been originally constructed and thereafter kept up, and from time to time improved, by "building," often extensive and costly, not merely for drains and cesspools, &c., but for altering the levels and making them as ways more passable. The whole of Princes Street is the built-up embankment of the Nor' Loch, and not many years ago was widened by carrying this building-up a good many feet further south and into the ground (latterly garden) which sloped steeply down to the loch before it was drained out. Railways, which are ways or roads just as streets are, cannot, in this country at least, be constructed without frequent building, found necessary to maintain the normal elevation and level of the line in passing over uneven ground, or level ground too swampy and soft to be solum for sleepers and rails without building, frequently in the form of girder bridges of greater or less length and height, or of mounds of earth such as that which carried and still carries the Caledonian Railway up to the girder bridge now in question, by which it is continued across the Corstorphine Road. In constructing railroads as well as common roads and streets, difficulties occasioned by inequalities in the earth's surface or by the natural quality of the solum, which may be such that it requires artificial solidifying or strengthening before it can safely carry a street or railroad, must be overcome; generally this can only be done by building up or cutting down, which commonly requires the building up of the sides of the cutting. And I would remark that this building up of the sides of a cutting is really building up, and therefore "erection," however deep the foundation—all building being "up" from the foundation. Now, in my opinion, the Edinburgh Police Act founded on by the respondent does not commit to the Dean of Guild Court any authority or duty with respect to the original construction or subsequent improvement of either streets or railroads. It is perhaps superfluous to repeat that I mean only as ways roads and thoroughfares for passage. With regard to streets (so taken), the authority and duty committed, as I have pointed out, to the Magistrates and Council include the protection of the public against any unauthorised, dangerous, or inconvenient structure being made over any street.—See the Act of 1879, sec. 151. With regard to railways I have not been referred to anything, or myself found anything, which even suggests the idea that the Dean of Guild Court has any concern with their construction. Every proprietary interest is protected within the burgh of Edinburgh exactly as it is elsewhere. Every public interest, where a street is crossed by a railway bridge, is, so far as regards those using the street, protected by the Magistrates and Council, who are the guardians of their interest, and, so far as regards those using the railway, is protected by the Board of Trade, who must be satisfied with it before it can be used as part of the railway. That it is part of the railway and really nothing else is, I think, plain.

The Dean of Guild, by the interlocutor under appeal, finds that the appellants, without warrant, and in contravention of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891, sec. 59, "have removed the bridge in question, and are presently erecting a new permanent bridge on the site thereof . . . that a warrant of Court is necessary for the operations in connection with the bridge in question," and "therefore in the meantime ordains the respondents" (the appellants here) "forthwith to lodge an application for warrant, with relative plans, and continues the cause." In his note the Dean of Guild cites the case of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company v. Dymock,[1] as an authority in point and supporting his findings and order. It is not, in my opinion, in point. The prayer of the petition to the Dean of Guild in that case desired the Dean of Guild "to visit the premises—to issue from time to time such incidental orders as the circumstances of the case may require and the security and interest of the public may demand." The details are immaterial beyond this, that the Dean of Guild did no more than sustain the right of the fiscal "to apply, and for his Court to entertain the application where the allegation is that the safety of the lieges is in danger from the manner in which the operations are carried on," and that this Court on appeal did no more. In the appeal it was distinctly stated that the respondent (the Dean of Guild fiscal) did not require the advocators to apply for a warrant from the Dean of Guild. Lord Moncreiff in giving judgment observes,—"The want of the warrant is not the point here. The advocators are not asked to procure one, and I give no opinion on the question whether they are bound to do so if required. It is on the allegation of danger that the question arises."

Lord Cockburn, in expressing his assent to the Dean of Guild's judgment, points out that "all that the Dean of Guild says is, 'I am entitled to visit you and see that you do not expose either the public or your own workmen to any unnecessary danger.'" In point of fact no warrant was ever granted or applied for.

I am not sure that I quite understand what the Dean of Guild in his judgment here means by "the operations in connection with the bridge in question," for which he finds "that a warrant of Court is necessary." He cannot, I should think, mean that to remove the old bridge was to "erect or begin to erect any house or building," and therefore an operation for which a warrant was necessary. Neither can I suppose it probable that he had in his mind the idea that the temporary wooden bridge which (as we were informed at the hearing) was removed, having served its purpose, before 22d February, the date of the interlocutor, should be restored with a view to an order being granted for its removal as having been erected without warrant. Leaving out of view then the old bridge and the temporary wooden bridge as both gone for ever, and also the rails (no doubt also sleepers) which along with the no longer needed mound of earth which stood on the 19 feet of ground, which is now part of the street called Corstorphine Road, were removed, and so also are gone for ever, I conclude that the girder-bridge is the only thing in existence the use of which could in this process be interdicted or the removal ordered.

Does the Dean of Guild desire to see a plan of it? There is one in process of admitted accuracy, but I should think this or any plan superfluous now that the bridge itself exists, standing quite open to the inspection of the Dean of Guild or anyone he may desire to examine it. A plan of such a bridge would manifestly be just as superfluous and useless as would be a plan of the railing running on the garden side of Princes Street, or any other common fence railing standing open to inspection.

The complaint to the Dean of Guild was presented on 29th December 1899, at which time the work under the agreement had been going on continuously and uninterruptedly for about eight months. The old stone bridge had, as stated in the complaint, been removed, the temporary wooden bridge erected and in use, that is with the line running on it, and the erection of the girder-bridge begun. In February 1900, when the interlocutor appealed from was pronounced, the work was all but, if not quite completely finished; and in June, when the case came before us, was completely finished to the satisfaction of all parties, and also of the Board of Trade, without whose approbation the new bridge could not be used as it is and has been for now a long while. I have pointed out that everything but the new bridge has disappeared, and is practically incapable of being restored. The notion of interdicting the use, or ordering the removal of this bridge, and thus stopping indefinitely the traffic on the Leith and Cramond branches of the Caledonian Railway seemed prima facie so repulsive that at the hearing the learned counsel for the respondent was asked by one of us (possibly myself) whether anyone had complained to the respondent of injury done or threatened to his interests, and if not, whether, differing from the Magistrates and Council, the railway company, and the Board of Trade, he, as Dean of Guild fiscal, had any objection to the position or structure of the new bridge on which the line was running? The answer, as I understood it, was distinctly in the negative, the learned counsel saying in terms that no complaint had been made by anyone of injury to his interests done or threatened—that the respondent could state no objection to the position or structure of the bridge, and had no intention of asking for its removal, or for any alteration of it, and that what he asked and would be content with was an affirmance of the Dean of Guild's finding, that the bridge was a building which by the Act of 1891 required a warrant for its erection. He represented the legal question on which this finding depended, viz., the meaning and import of the expression "house or building" as used in the enactment founded on, as one of such public interest and importance as justified the Dean of Guild fiscal in pressing for a decision of it, although the decision might not, or even certainly would not, be followed by any practical consequence or result in this case. When the matter was thus presented to us at the hearing I ventured to suggest that prima facie it seemed objectionable to turn an appeal in such a Dean of Guild Court process as the present into a declarator of a legal question on which nothing practical and within the scope of that process was to follow. Nevertheless, recognising the importance of the legal question and the consequences to which the decision of it either way may lead, I have thought it proper to consider it carefully, and to form and express an opinion upon it. At the same time, for reasons already suggested, and others to which I shall shortly refer, I think it would be irregular and improper to pronounce a declaratory finding upon it in this appeal.

I have already called attention to the time during which the operations had been going on, and the very advanced stage which they had reached in the end of December, when the respondent made his complaint. The only explanation of this delay which suggests itself to my mind is, that it had not sooner occurred to him or to the Dean of Guild that the operations were such as to require a warrant. No other has been offered or suggested. I cannot impute to either of them ignorance of the fact that the operations had been agreed on between the appellants and the Magistrates and Council. The Dean of Guild being an ex officio member of the Council was a party to the agreement, and his fiscal was also fiscal to the Magistrates and Council, i.e., the city fiscal appointed by them. But ignorance is not suggested, and indeed could not be, looking to the character of the operations continued for months in a crowded thoroughfare under the superintendence of the city authorities. I cannot doubt the bona fides of the Dean of Guild and his fiscal in taking, and for six or eight months holding, the view which I think the sound one. But neither can I doubt the bona fides of the appellants and of the Magistrates and Council in taking the same view. It is perhaps more accurate to put it thus—that the appellants and the Magistrates and Council acted not contumaciously but in bona fides in not applying for a warrant, and acting without one, inasmuch as it did not, and excusably did not, occur to them or their ordinary officials and legal advisers that a warrant was needed. Now, assuming, contrary to the opinion which I have expressed, that the appellants and their advisers were in error in proceeding to build the bridge without a Dean of Guild warrant, what is the legal consequence of their having done so? I say nothing about a fine not exceeding £25, for had that been what was asked we should probably have been spared any litigation, at least in this Court, unless, indeed (which is possible), the appellants concurred with the respondent in thinking the legal question raised by the complaint and the Dean of Guild's interlocutor of serious public interest and importance. The prayer for an order to remove the bridge carrying the railroad, and for an interdict which might stop all traffic on the line at any moment, is what makes the case serious, and no doubt brings it here. Is this prayer reasonable, and such as may lawfully and reasonably be granted by the Dean of Guild? If so, the case may no doubt be sent back to the Dean of Guild, for he has not yet dealt with it. If not, we may terminate the case now. And this is what, in my opinion, we ought to do, for I am indeed very clearly of opinion that it ought not to have been brought at the date when it was, and in the then existing state of things, even on the assumption that a Dean of Guild warrant was formally required to carry into execution the agreement between the railway company and the city authorities.

Quod fieri non debet factum valet is true in many cases, and, I think, is so here. When anyone is so injured by the quod fieri non debet that the only remedy is its destruction, it will not be upheld. When the injury thus done is such as may be reasonably and sufficiently compensated otherwise than by destruction at unconscionable cost to the party who has in good faith committed a mistake, such destruction will not be ordered, but compensation given otherwise. But where such mistake has not been attended with injury to anyone, the idea of an order for destruction seems extravagant, and accordingly at the hearing we were, as I have already stated, informed by the respondent's counsel that there was no intention to ask for such an order. I thought this ought to have ended the case, because when taken along with the indisputable and indeed undisputed fact that the appellants had acted throughout not contumaciously but in good faith, it seems to me to shew that the complaint ought not to have been presented. It was, however, argued, that we ought to give a decision upon the construction of the statute as the Dean of Guild had done, and that if we did so, it necessarily followed that we ought to affirm his order on the appellants to lodge an application for warrant with relative plans such as in his opinion ought to have been lodged before the work was commenced. If the appellants ought not to have executed or even commenced the work without having applied for and obtained a warrant therefor, they must, of course, take such consequences as, looking to the circumstances, ought to follow, but an order made after the building has been erected to lodge an application with plans for a warrant to erect it does not commend itself to my mind as legal or even sensible. The view suggested in support of it apparently is that it is the right of the Dean of Guild Court to have an application for warrant and relative plans lodged, and thereupon, disregarding the finished building, and the admitted fact that it is in all respects satisfactory to everyone interested, to form a judgment upon and dispose of the application on the supposition that the building has not yet been commenced. There is no instance of such an order being made with the approbation of this Court, or, so far as we know, at all.

Nov. 6, 1900. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Somerville.

Passing through the West Princes Street Gardens I observed numerous buildings and erections which would certainly come under section 59 and section 48 of the Act of 1891 on the respondent's construction of them. They consist of girder bridges over the North British Railway, a band-stand, an ornamental fountain, an embankment with large architectural stairs, and several statues, also green-houses. On inquiry, I was informed that these had all been erected without any Dean of Guild warrant. I made the same inquiry and got the same information regarding the Scott Monument in East Princes Street Gardens, and the Albert Memorial Statue in Charlotte Square. I notice these facts, not as bearing or affording any argument on the construction of the statute, which they certainly do not, but as having an obvious illustrative bearing on the view which I have endeavoured to present on the application of the maxim quod fieri non debet factum valet. The trustees of the Scott Monument would, I should think, elevate their eyebrows with some surprise if now desired to lodge in the Dean of Guild Court an application with relative plans for a warrant to build the monument. It would be idle to continue the illustration by further allusion to the girder bridges, &c., in West Princes Street Gardens, or to the Albert Memorial Statue in Charlotte Square.

LORD TRAYNER.—I must, with all respect, express my dissent from the tenor of the opinion which has just been expressed. While I agree with the view that the appellants in erecting their bridge acted in bona fide, it is right to notice that such good faith has never been impugned or disputed; and on the other hand, the view that the respondent's proceedings have been nimious and oppressive appears to me to be quite unwarranted.

The question to be decided under this appeal is one of law; there is no material fact regarding which the parties are not agreed. The facts are these:—In the course of last year the appellants found that it would be convenient and desirable to replace a bridge which carried their railway across one of the streets of the burgh by a larger and more stable structure. They accordingly took down their old bridge, and built along the sides of the street I have referred to certain stone piers of considerable dimensions on which to rest their new bridge. This they did without asking or obtaining any warrant from the Dean of Guild. While the appellants' operations were in progress the respondent (the fiscal of the Dean of Guild Court) presented a petition to the Dean of Guild, craving (1) interdict against the appellants proceeding with their works without warrant; (2) for the imposition of a penalty; and (3) for an order for the removal, if and so far as required, of the unauthorised building. This petition was based upon the provisions of the Edinburgh Police Act of 1891, which need be no further noticed than to say that they fully warrant the prayer of the respondent's petition if they are applicable to the case before us. The defence to the petition, however, stated on record, and maintained in argument at the bar, was twofold—(1) that the statutory provisions founded on by the respondent do not apply to railway companies, and therefore not to the appellants; and (2) that even if this view was not sustained, the building complained of is not a "building" within the meaning of the Edinburgh Police Acts. This latter ground of defence seems to me untenable. The interpretation clause of the Edinburgh Police Act of 1879 (which has not been repealed, as the appellants erroneously contended) declares that "the word 'building' shall extend to and comprise all buildings and erections of what kind and nature soever," except dwelling-houses, which are separately defined. In view of this declaration I do not see how it can be maintained that the work complained of is not a building within the meaning of the Act. The work in question is certainly an "erection" of some kind; it is a series of stone piers, almost continuous like a wall, running along the sides and abutting on one of the streets of the burgh for a considerable length. Not only in the statutory but also in the popular sense of the term the piers are buildings; they are built up of stone and lime, the work of masons and builders, and are just as much buildings as the walls of a house.

No. 13.

Nov. 6, 1900.
Caledonian Railway Co. v. Somerville.

The other ground of defence seems to me also untenable. It is based upon a consideration of the terms of some clauses in the Edinburgh Police Act of 1896, and chiefly on the terms of section 74. Now, that section certainly provides that the provisions of Part V. of that Act (with certain exceptions which do not touch this case) shall not apply "to the railways or stations of any railway company, or the buildings connected therewith." But nothing in Part V. of the Act of 1896 repeals either expressly, or (as I think) by necessary or even reasonable implication, the statutory provisions on which the petition before us is founded. Indeed, Part V. makes no reference whatever to applications to the Dean of Guild for a warrant to erect buildings within the burgh, or any reference to the procedure of the Dean of Guild Court beyond providing how a citation to the Dean of Guild Court may be signed, and the length of time within which a Dean of Guild warrant may be acted upon. The Dean of Guild's jurisdiction is not touched upon in a single sentence of Part V., and no exemption from that jurisdiction is conferred on any individual or company. The only statute which exempts a railway company from the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild is the Burgh Police Act, 1892, section 517. But that Act does not apply to Edinburgh (section 5 and Schedule II.), which is expressly exempted from its provisions. In my opinion, therefore, both grounds of defence fail, and the appellants must therefore be dealt with as subject to the provisions of the Act of 1891.

The interlocutor pronounced by the Dean of Guild (now under appeal) after certain findings, in which I concur, orders the appellants forthwith to make "an application for warrant with relative plans." This may appear to order a superfluous proceeding, now that the bridge has been completed; and so far as the prayer for interdict is concerned it is. But it is not, or may not be, at all superfluous with reference to the prayer for an order to have the unauthorised building removed. I trust that no such removal will be found to be necessary. But the Dean of Guild will judge of that when the plans are laid before him. It was said at the bar, no doubt, that removal of the building was not in contemplation, and that one, probably the chief, purpose of the petition was to have it decided, whether the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction did or did not extend to the buildings of railway companies. I think that question was competently brought before us in the present form, and should be here decided.

In my opinion the interlocutor pronounced by the Dean of Guild, now

No. 13.

Caledonian Railway Co. v. Somerville.

appealed against, is one within the competency of the Dean of Guild to pronounce, and one with which we should not interfere.

It is scarcely necessary to notice the plea urged by the appellants that their new bridge was erected with the sanction and under an arrangement with the Lord Provost and Magistrates of the city. That body has no authority to exercise the functions of the Dean of Guild Court. It can neither sanction nor refuse sanction to the erection of buildings within burgh. Any agreement or arrangement, therefore, made with it appears to me to be irrelevant to the matter before us. I have not overlooked the fact that under the Edinburgh Police Acts large powers are conferred on the Corporation for widening, altering, making, and improving the streets of the burgh; but I can find no clause or provision in this Act (and none was referred to) which entitles the Corporation to build or authorise building within burgh at its own hand, or without the sanction and warrant of the Dean of Guild.

I think the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I shall content myself with making a few observations upon the only points on which I understood the appellants to rely in argument, which did not, according to my recollection, include several of the considerations upon which Lord Young dwelt. I agree that we should simply dismiss this appeal, and remit the case to the Dean of Guild to proceed. I am quite satisfied with the reply for the respondent, which I think was exhaustive and complete. The appellants have entirely failed to shew that in Edinburgh the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild does not extend to railway companies as fully as to other proprietors within the city, except to the limited extent to which railways are exempted by the 74th section of the Edinburgh Improvement and Tramways Act of 1896. Apart from that clause there is no express exemption, and I do not see any reason for thinking that any further exemption is to be implied.

During the discussion I had some difficulty in ascertaining the precise conditions and limits of the appellants' argument. Counsel admitted, and indeed could not dispute, that the Dean of Guild has jurisdiction over dwelling-houses which are the property of a railway company as in the case of any other proprietor. But he endeavoured to shew that the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act of 1891, on the 59th section of which this petition is founded, does not in the case of any proprietor confer jurisdiction on the Dean of Guild over any buildings except dwelling-houses and buildings connected with dwelling-houses. He endeavoured to establish this by an examination of certain clauses in the statute which he said could only relate to dwelling-houses; and to infer it from the absence in the interpretation clause of any definition of the word "buildings." In regard to the latter point the answer is complete, that in the Act of 1879, which is incorporated with the Act of 1891, the word "buildings" is declared "to extend to, and comprise all buildings and erections of what kind and nature soever, and every part of such buildings, except dwelling-houses." In regard to counsel's criticism of various sections in the Act of 1891, while it is true that many of these sections relate to dwelling-houses and buildings connected with them, the 48th and 59th sections are sufficiently wide to apply to buildings of all descriptions.

The appellants' argument on section 74 of the Act of 1896 seemed to be that it contains a recognition of the previous exemption of railways from the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild, except in connection with dwelling-houses. This is an assumption which the clause, in my opinion, will not bear. The clause itself applies only to certain new provisions introduced by the Act of 1896; it does not profess to affect the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild either at common law or under the provisions of previous statutes. The language of the section seems to be taken from a clause (section 577) in the General Police Act of 1892 (which does not apply to Edinburgh), by which the whole of the procedure of that Act relating to the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild, except as regards dwelling-house, was declared not to apply to railways; and this seems to have suggested to the appellants the idea that neither under statute nor at common law had the Dean of Guild in Edinburgh jurisdiction over railways, except in connection with dwelling-houses. In my opinion this contention is erroneous, and it is satisfactory to find that the practice, as we were told by Mr Wilson, has been for railway companies within the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild of Edinburgh to apply for this authority when erecting buildings such as this bridge. The bridge abuts upon a public street, and therefore seems to be just such a building as in the public interest the Dean of Guild should have jurisdiction over. The jurisdiction of the Magistrates and Council, in regard to streets, is distinct and separate from the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild over buildings abutting upon streets, and does not supersede the latter.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and remitted the case to the Dean of Guild to proceed.

Expenses—Several defenders—Successful and unsuccessful—Liability inter se.—Galbraith, who had been trustee on a coachbuilder's sequestrated estate, was sued in 1899 after his discharge, by Mackintosh for delivery of a carriage he had deposited with the coachbuilder, and for damages. Galbraith denied liability, and stated that in 1897 he sold the bankrupt's stock in trade to Arthur, and that Arthur by mistake had sold the pursuer's carriage along with the stock, and pleaded all parties not called. The pursuer then raised an action against Galbraith and Arthur, jointly and severally, pleading—"The defender Galbraith having carelessly and negligently failed to protect the said car, and the defender Arthur having acted illegally and wrongfully in taking possession of and selling same, they are jointly and severally liable to the pursuers for the loss and damage thereby sustained." Arthur's defence was that he never had possession of the pursuer's carriage, and had not sold it. After a proof, the Sheriff held Arthur liable in damages, and assoilzied Galbraith, and found Arthur liable in expenses to both parties.

Mackintosh v. Galbraith and Arthur.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

In an appeal the Court affirmed the judgment on the merits, but (diss. Lord Young) found that the pursuer was liable for Galbraith's expenses, and that Arthur was not liable for them.

MAJOR GEORGE MACKINTOSH, with consent and concurrence of Mrs Mackintosh, of Balnespick, Inverness, raised an action in 1899 in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against W. B. Galbraith, C.A., Glasgow, who had been trustee on the sequestrated estates of J. & W. Reid, coach-builders, Inverness, but had been discharged, concluding (1) for delivery of a Ralli car which he had deposited with Messrs Reid for the purposes of repair and storage, and for payment of £20, or (2) failing delivery and payment as aforesaid, for payment of £50.

Galbraith denied liability, and stated in defence that in 1897 he sold the bankrupt's stock in trade to David Arthur, auctioneer, Glasgow, who by mistake had sold the pursuers' carriage along with the stock, and pleaded, inter alia, (3) All parties not called.

In consequence of this defence and plea, the pursuers thereupon raised a second action with the same conclusions as in the first, directed against both Galbraith and Arthur, jointly and severally, and pleaded, inter alia;—"(2) The pursuers having entered into a contract of safe keeping or deposit with the said J. & W. Reid, and they having become bankrupt, and the said W. B. Galbraith having taken control and possession of their business and effects as condescended on, the said contract became binding upon him, and the same not having been implemented, the pursuers are entitled to decree against him as craved. (3) The defender Galbraith having given no notice to the pursuers that he would not be responsible for the safe keeping of the said car, and having acted carelessly and negligently, as condescended on, to the pursuers' loss and damage, is personally bound to indemnify the pursuers against loss incurred through his fault. (4) The Ralli car in question being the property of the pursuers, and the defender Arthur having illegally and wrongfully taken possession of and sold same, the pursuers are entitled to decree against him as craved, with expenses. (5) The defender Galbraith having carelessly and negligently failed to protect the said car, and the defender Arthur having acted illegally and wrongfully in taking possession of and selling same, they are jointly and severally liable to the pursuers for the loss and damage thereby sustained.

In defence, Galbraith repeated his defence to the previous action, and Arthur, while admitting he had sold the car, denied liability on the ground that the car had been sold and delivered to him by Galbraith's representative as part of the bankrupt stock.

The actions were conjoined, and proof led, and on 22d January 1900 the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced an interlocutor in which he found, inter alia, that Galbraith had not sold the car to Arthur, and was not guilty of culpa in connection with the disposal of it, and that Arthur had not taken sufficient care with regard to the exclusion from the bankrupt's property of the car in question, but had sold it at the auction without any effectual investigation, after a question had been raised as to its not being part of the bankrupt stock; and having found that the car was not in a position to be restored, assessed its value at £20, and for that sum gave decree against Arthur, and assoilzied Galbraith.

With regard to expenses, the interlocutor proceeded,—"Finds the defender Arthur liable for the expenses of the pursuer, as also for the expenses of the defender Galbraith."

Mackintosh v. Galbraith and Arthur.

On appeal the Sheriff (Berry), on 25th May 1900, affirmed this interlocutor.*

The defender Arthur appealed, and, in addition to an argument on the merits, argued as to expenses;—The pursuer was not entitled to convene several defenders and leave them to fight out at their own expense the question which was liable. He was bound to know and select his proper objector, and if he convened a defender against whom he had no claim, he must pay that defender's expenses himself. The practice in cases of poor-law settlement was not applicable. The question there was one entirely between the defending parishes.

Argued for pursuers;—The conflicting positions taken up by Galbraith and Arthur rendered it necessary to call both; which was in fault depended on considerations personal to each. The liability necessarily lay between them, and Arthur said it lay on Galbraith. The pursuers could not know till after the proof, and were not bound to put themselves in the position of having to decide between the two.[1] The case was analogous to poor-law settlement cases, where the parishes of birth and settlement were convened as defenders, and the unsuccessful had to pay the successful defender's expenses as well as the pursuer's.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case I have come to the conclusion that the decision on the merits at which the Sheriffs have arrived is the right conclusion. I think that no fault is attributable to Galbraith the trustee, who in selling the bankrupt stock to Arthur did nothing which could lead Arthur to suppose that the pursuer's Ralli cart was included in the sale. On the contrary, it was by the inventory made plain that the Ralli cart was the property, not of the trustee, but of a customer of the bankrupt. I think, therefore, that Galbraith is entitled to be assoilzied. Arthur, on the other hand, was plainly in fault, and I think that it is proved that he proceeded to sell the cart notwithstanding warning conveyed to him that it was private property, and therefore that he was rightly decerned against for the price.

Upon the question of the expenses in the Court below, I do not agree with the view taken by the Sheriffs, who have found Arthur liable for the expenses both of the pursuer and of the defender Galbraith. I think that here the pursuer might, had he exercised due care in his inquiries, have ascertained that the case he truly had was not against Galbraith but solely against Arthur. I do not therefore think that the case is one in which the one defender who was in the wrong should be made to pay the expenses of a defender who should not have been convened in the case, and if convened, should have been allowed to be set free of the case at once. I think, therefore, that the proper person to pay Galbraith's expenses is the pursuer who brought and pressed the case against him.

* "NOTE.— . . . On the question of expenses it was contended for the defender Arthur that he should not be found liable for those incurred by the trustee, or for anything beyond the expenses of the action against him. It was, however, the natural course for the pursuer to bring the action at first against the trustee who had succeeded the bankrupts in possession of the Ralli car, and it was not till after Arthur had been brought into the field, and it was shewn by the proof that its disappearance was due to fault, not on the part of the trustee but on his part, that the responsibility for the loss could be brought home to him. In the circumstances I think that he has properly been found liable in expenses to both the other parties to the litigation. He must also be found liable to both in the expenses of this appeal."

LORD YOUNG.—I have no hesitation in concurring with the judgment proposed in regard to the merits,—that is, that the pursuer is entitled to judgment against the defender Arthur, and that the defender Galbraith is entitled to decree of absolvitor.

With respect to the question of expenses, your Lordship has expressed the opinion that Arthur should not be liable in Galbraith's expenses. I am of a different opinion, and think with the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute that he should. I agree with them that Galbraith is entitled to his expenses if he is assoilzied, and further, that he is entitled to a decree against the pursuer, unless he is satisfied with a decree against his co-defender to pay them. If he is satisfied with such a decree, it would be ridiculous to go through the form of making the pursuer liable, by a decree against him, to pay the expenses, and then to ordain Arthur to relieve him. There is a practice, and occasionally there is an opportunity for acting upon it, of finding one of two defenders liable in expenses to the other. The question is whether this is or is not a case for the application of that rule. The pursuer here brought his action against both defenders; in his first petition he called Galbraith, and that was immediately followed by another against both Galbraith and Arthur, with a prayer to conjoin the actions. That was thought reasonable, and a record was made up between the pursuer and both defenders without objection. No additional expense was caused to Galbraith by this procedure, and I therefore deal with the question as if there had been only one action against both defenders. What was the question to be tried? It was admitted that one or other of the defenders should be found liable to the pursuer, and on what did the solution of that question depend? It depended on this, whether Arthur had taken away the car without authority and disposed of it, as Galbraith said; or whether, as Arthur said, Galbraith had sold and delivered it to him. It occurs to me that that question could only be properly tried with both defenders, and could not be properly tried without both. No doubt the pursuer might, if ill advised, have tried it with one of them, but the result would not have been binding on the other. And if he were unsuccessful, and then brought an action against the other, the decision would not have been res judicata, and he might have failed in his second action also. I therefore think that the only reasonable course was to try the question with both. A more typical case for the application of what is admittedly competent, viz., to make one defender pay the expenses of the other, I cannot conceive. I repeat the qualification, that the successful defender may refuse to take a decree against his co-defender. But a sensible defender usually would give his consent, and such consent is constantly given. I am therefore of opinion that there is no ground for interfering with the judgment which has been pronounced by both Sheriffs.

LORD TRAYNER.—In so far as concerns the merits of this case I concur in

No. 14.

Nov. 6, 1900.
Mackintosh v. Galbraith and Arthur.

the judgments pronounced by the Sheriffs. I think it is established by the evidence in the case (1) that the car in question was not sold by Galbraith to Arthur, and (2) that Arthur sold the car after he had been duly warned that it was not part of the stock which he had bought. In these circumstances there can be no doubt that Arthur is bound to pay the value of the car to the pursuer. But I am unable to concur with the Sheriffs in regard to their disposal of the question of expenses. The matter stands thus: When the pursuer discovered that his car had been sold he claimed its value from Arthur, who had sold it. Arthur repudiated liability on the ground that the car had been sold to him by Galbraith, whereupon the pursuer claimed from Galbraith, who in turn repudiated liability on the ground that he had not sold the car to Arthur. The pursuer then raised his action against Galbraith, who stated in defence judicially what he had already explained extrajudicially to the pursuer, but pleaded that all parties had not been called, on the ground that Arthur was the proper debtor in the claim, if there was a claim at all. On this the pursuer raised an action against Galbraith and Arthur, and the two cases were conjoined. Now, in my opinion, the pursuer having before him the conflicting views of the two defenders, should have informed himself of where the truth lay, and directed his claim, and insisted in his claim, against the person (and him only) who, according to his information, was responsible. I do not think a pursuer is entitled to convene two or more defenders who each and all deny liability, and say that liability lies on one or other of them. He must select his debtor and proceed against him. If he takes the other course—the course adopted here—he does so at the risk of being found liable in expenses to those defenders who were not his debtors, and against whom consequently no action should have been brought. But I see no reason why an unsuccessful defender should be held liable in expenses to a successful defender who, as the result shewed, should never have been called. I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriffs were wrong in finding the defender Arthur liable in expenses to the defender Galbraith. As between the pursuer and Galbraith the question presents more difficulty. I think the plea of all parties not called should not,—certainly need not,—have been put forward. If Galbraith was not liable to the pursuer it was no concern of his who was, and calling Arthur into the field did nothing to strengthen Galbraith's defence. On the other hand, the pursuer might have disregarded that plea and insisted on his right to a decree against Galbraith, if he could establish Galbraith's liability. On the broad ground that the pursuer's action against Galbraith was unfounded, and unsuccessful, I think the pursuer must be found liable in expenses to Galbraith. What I have now said refers only to the expenses incurred in the Court below.

I should perhaps add, that the cases arising under the Poor-Law Act, referred to in the debate, do not, in my opinion, form any precedent for what the Sheriffs have done. In these cases where two defenders are summoned, the one representing the birth parish and the other the parish of alleged residential settlement, the pursuer having called the defenders practically retires from the case. The defenders there admit that one or other is liable, and the question which is liable is a question between themselves. But if a relieving parish raised an action against two parishes on the ground that the pauper had a residential settlement in one or other of these parishes, and both denied liability, then the pursuer would get his expenses against the parish found liable, and be liable in expenses to the parish assoilzied. That is the kind of case we are dealing with here.

LORD MONCREIFF.—On the merits I agree with the Sheriffs.

On the question of expenses, however, I am of opinion that, while the defender Arthur is liable in expenses in the Sheriff Court to the pursuer, he is not liable to his co-defender Galbraith.

Where a pursuer convenes two defenders, I do not doubt that in certain circumstances it is in the discretion of the Court in the event of one defender being found liable and the other not to find the unsuccessful defender liable in expenses not only to the pursuer, but to the successful defender. We are familiar in practice with this being done in poor-law cases; but the reason for that is obvious, as the form of the summons in such cases shews. Where, as usually happens, the relieving parish obtains an admission that the pauper was born in the parish of A, and A avers that a residential settlement has been acquired in the parish of B, the relieving parish brings a summons against A and B, concluding against them alternatively; and, having nothing to prove, simply watches the case while it is determined between A and B whether the pauper has or has not acquired a residential settlement. Whichever of the parishes A or B is unsuccessful pays the expenses of the successful parish, as well as those of the pursuer.

But except in poor-law cases such practice as to expenses is exceptional, though not incompetent, the general rule being that, if a pursuer convenes two defenders and one is assoilzied, the pursuer, and not the unsuccessful defender, pays the expenses of the successful defender.

In the present case, while I sympathise with the pursuer, I do not see sufficient grounds for subjecting the defender Arthur in the expenses of the successful defender Galbraith. The pursuer did not, as it were, put this question of liability in medio, and leave the two defenders to fight it out. Whether this would have been competent is very doubtful; but he did not do it. His object was to obtain a decree against both defenders jointly and severally. The fifth plea in law for the pursuer is—"The defender Galbraith having carelessly and negligently failed to protect the said car, and the defender Arthur having acted illegally and wrongfully in taking possession of and selling same, they are jointly and severally liable to the pursuers for the loss and damage thereby sustained." And the defenders' witnesses were all cross-examined on behalf of the pursuer, as well as on behalf of the other defender. No alternative case is made on record, or in the course of the proof.

Besides, a very little inquiry should have satisfied the pursuer that he had not sufficient grounds for proceeding against Galbraith. It was certainly not a sufficient reason for his doing so that Arthur alleged that Galbraith sold the Ralli car to him. Galbraith's assurance, supported by the bankrupt Morris Reid and others, should have satisfied him that there was no sale of that car.

The result is that I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to expenses against Arthur in the Court below; that, as Galbraith has been assoilzied and is not entitled to expenses against Arthur, he must get his expenses in the Court below from the pursuer.

Mackintosh v. Galbraith and Arthur.

As to the expenses in the appeal, I think there should be no expenses as between the pursuer and Arthur. Galbraith must get his expenses as against the pursuer.

THE COURT, finding in fact and law in terms of the interlocutor of 22d January 1900, dismissed the appeal quoad the merits: Quoad the expenses, the Court pronounced these findings:—"Recall the said interlocutors in so far as they find the defender Arthur liable in the expenses of the defender Galbraith: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses against the defender Arthur in the inferior Court only: Also find the defender Galbraith entitled to expenses against the pursuer both in the inferior Court and in this Court; and quoad ultra find no further expenses due as between the pursuer and the said defender Arthur."

CADZOW COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Appellants.—Salvesen, Q.C.—Chree.
CHARLES GAFFNEY, Respondent.—Johnston, Q.C.—Younger.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), First Schedule (1) (b).—A miner entered the service of a coal company on Friday, 23d March; he did not work on Saturday, the 24th; he worked on Monday, the 26th, and on every day thereafter until Thursday, the 29th, when he received injuries, on account of which he claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, from his employers.

Held that these facts afforded a sufficient basis for calculating the claimant's "average weekly earnings" in terms of the First Schedule (1) (b) of the Act.

Opinion per Lord Trayner that the word "weekly" in the schedule referred to calendar weeks.

Opinion per Lord Moncreiff reserved on the question whether a workman who had been in the employment during one week only was excluded from the benefit of the Act.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

CHARLES GAFFNEY, miner, Hamilton, having claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, against the Cadzow Coal Company, Limited, the matter was referred to the arbitration of the Sheriff-substitute (Davidson) at Hamilton, who awarded compensation, and, at the request of the company, stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—The respondent entered the defenders' employment on Friday, 23d March last, on which day he earned 7s. 7d. On the 24th he did not work. He worked on Monday, the 26th March, and every day thereafter till the 29th, on which day he was knocked down by a hutch and so severely injured that he was unable to work till 14th May. During the four days from 26th to 29th March inclusive he earned the sum of £1, 12s. He was not paid any wages by the defenders before the accident. He and other miners in appellants' employment were engaged from day to day. Wages were paid fortnightly on Saturday, but if the miners desired they could usually get their wages on the intermediate Saturdays. The 24th of March was an intermediate Saturday.

The Sheriff-substitute decided that the amount the respondent earned on Friday, the 23d March, was his wages for the week in which that Friday occurred; that the amount he earned on the following week, viz., the 26th, 27th, 28th, and 29th March, was his wages for that week; and that the Court was entitled to strike an average between them, which the Sheriff-substitute did, and awarded compensation at the rate of 9s. 10d. per week.

The question of law was,—"Whether the respondent, having entered the employment of the appellants on 23d March 1900, and worked on that day, and having also worked on the 26th, 27th, 28th, and 29th March 1900, on which last day he was injured, is entitled in law to compensation under the First Schedule (1) (b) of the said Act?"*

The undernoted authorities were cited at the hearing.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Whatever anomalies there may be in regard to the right to compensation under this statute, we must deal with the statute as we find it. Its purpose is to give a right to compensation to workmen who have been injured in the course of their employment apart from any question of fault on the part of the employers. But when it came to the working out of that right to compensation the Legislature has thought proper to enact that the amount of compensation shall be based on the average weekly earnings of the injured person, and it has been said that, as you cannot have a case of a weekly average if you have only one week to determine by the injured person must have worked for more than one week in order to entitle him to compensation. From this it is argued by the appellants here that the present case must be taken to be a case of working for one week only, because the respondent had been in their employment at the date of the injury for a single day only in one of the weeks. I am unable to assent to that. It is not wages to which the injured person would be entitled if he worked for two full weeks that we are to take as the basis of computation, but earnings which he did in fact make. If he worked for a short time only in one week, and in consequence earned little for that week, then

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), sec. 1, enacts,—"(1) If in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the First Schedule to this Act."

The First Schedule contains the following:—

"(1) The amount of compensation under this Act shall be," inter alia—

"(b) Where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury, a weekly payment during the incapacity after the second week not exceeding fifty per cent of his average weekly earnings during the previous twelve months, if he has been so long employed, but if not, then for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer, such weekly payment not to exceed one pound."

he must suffer, because he cannot bring up to a high figure the sum from which the average is to be struck. This is how the Sheriff-substitute has dealt with the case. It seems to me that he has taken the proper course, and that we should adhere to his judgment.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. The principle of the Act is that a workman in an employment to which the Act applies shall be entitled to compensation from his employer for injuries received by him in the course of his employment. The amount of compensation to which the workman is to be entitled is fixed by the First Schedule of the Act, and it has been held that a workman cannot recover compensation under the Act unless he has been at least two weeks in the employment, because the statutory standard for measuring compensation can only be applied in circumstances which enable the Court to strike an average. I think we can here fix the amount of compensation to which the respondent is entitled in terms of the statutory standard. In the course of the argument use was made of the words "wages," "weekly wages," and "average weekly wages." But that is not the language of the statute, and to introduce these terms may only add to difficulties in connection with the construction of this statute, already sufficiently great. The statute makes no reference to the wage or weekly wage of the workman, but to the amount of his "earnings" in a week. A workman obviously might earn in any week less than what would be recognised as his weekly wage by working for less than a full week, or he might earn more by working overtime. The statute, however, only takes account of what the workman "earned" in the week. It was also suggested that as in some employments the working week may begin, say, on a Tuesday, and end on the following Monday, we should regard "week" in the statute as if it were six full days. I do not think so. The statute is not dealing with special employments, but with the general question, and when it speaks of weeks I regard it as meaning the space of time which commences on Sunday and ends on Saturday. In the present case it appears that the respondent worked for one day in the week ending Saturday, 24th March, and that the sum which he received for that day's work constitutes his earnings for that week. In the same way, the sum he received for his four days' work in the following week constitutes his earnings for that week; and if these two sums be added together and then divided, you get his average weekly earnings in the two weeks preceding his injury. The Sheriff-substitute has awarded compensation on this principle, and I think that his judgment is right.

LORD MONCREIFF.—Although the decision which we are about to pronounce goes further than any previous decision on the point, I think that it is in accordance with the proper construction of the statute. There is nothing in the body of the statute to the effect that an injured workman shall not be entitled to compensation unless he has been in the employment for more than one week. Continuity of employment is not a condition of the right to compensation according to the body of the statute. The question arises only inferentially from the terms of the first schedule to the Act. That schedule provides that the amount of compensation in the case of a workman who has been totally or partially incapacitated for work shall be based on his average weekly earnings during the period of his employment. This has been held to imply that service for at least two weeks is an essential condition of a right to compensation, because, it is said, you cannot strike a weekly average unless you have the earnings of at least two weeks. But I should like to reserve my opinion on the question whether a workman who had worked only for, say, five days in a single week is excluded from the benefit of the Act. I doubt whether such a result was within the view of those who framed the Act; but assuming that work during two weeks is essential to the right to compensation, I think that even on that construction the conditions of the statute are here sufficiently fulfilled. The respondent did work during two weeks in a popular sense, for he worked (no doubt for one day only) in the week ending 24th March, and he also worked in the following week each day until the 29th March, when he was injured. He earned 7s. 7d. for the first week, and £1, 12s. for the second week. If we add these two sums together and then divide the total, we get the average weekly earnings of the respondent. This method of computation is in favour of the employers, because the respondent's earnings were small in the first week, as he then worked for only one day, and thus the average is greatly reduced. I think that the Sheriff-substitute has arrived at the right conclusion, and that we should answer the question accordingly.

No. 15.

Nov. 6, 1900. Cadzow Coal Co., Limited, v. Gaffney.

Said mineral line has a communication with the Caledonian Railway Company's system at a point near Newmains, shewn on the plan produced, and also at a point near Prospecthill, also marked on said plan. Said mineral line has a communication with the respondents' system at a point near Newmains, marked on said plan, but it has no other communication with the respondents' line. The Caledonian Railway Company are in the habit of sending daily a small part of their through goods traffic from the point first above mentioned to the point second above mentioned, both on their line, over the said mineral line, instead of sending it exclusively over their own line, which is somewhat longer, but they do not do this in virtue of any Act of Parliament or of any arrangement between them and the owners of the private line. The respondents, by means of their own engines and trucks, deliver at the Coltness Ironworks, by said private line of railway, ore consigned to the Coltness Iron Company from various parts of the country, and take away in a similar way mineral consigned by the Iron Company to various consignees. The respondents have no arrangement with the owners of the private line with regard to the carriage of goods other than those above mentioned, and they do not use the said line for the carriage of such other goods. The accident occurred on a siding connected with the said private line at a point about three-quarters of a mile from the only point at which the main mineral line is connected with the respondents' system.

"On 20th June 1900 I gave judgment. I held in law that the said accident did not take place on, in, or about a railway within the meaning of section 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and dismissed the application, with expenses to the respondents.

"The question of law for the opinion of the Court is,—Whether the accident took place on, in, or about a railway within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897?"*

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The accident took place "on" a railway. The siding might not belong to the railway company, but the Regulation of Railways Act distinguished between "belonging to" and "of." This was a siding "of" the railway company pro tempore and in a reasonable sense for the purposes of its business in delivering and accepting traffic, and quoad that the railway company was the undertaker. It was using the siding by agreement with the iron company, and was thus virtually in the position of a lessee.

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, enacts (sec. 7):—"This Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers, as hereinafter defined, on or in or about, inter alia, a railway." Subsec. 2.—'"Railway' means the railway of any railway company to which the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, applies, . . . and 'railway' and 'railway company' have the same meaning as in the said Act of 1873."

By the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, section 3, the term "railway company" includes any person being the owner or lessee of, or working any railway in the United Kingdom constructed or carried on under the powers of any Act of Parliament, and the term "railway" includes "every station, siding, wharf, or dock of or belonging to such railway, and used for the purposes of public traffic."

No. 16.

Nov. 6, 1900.
Brodie v. North British Railway Co.

Further, the siding was used for public traffic. It carried traffic to and from the public and the iron company by means of the railway company's rolling stock and servants at the ordinary rates. It was used also by the Caledonian Railway Company for public traffic. (2) In any event, in a reasonable sense, this was an accident "about" a railway. It was immaterial whether the accident took place three-quarters of a mile or one hundred yards from the railway. In all decisions as to "in or about," regard had been had to the circumstances.[1]

Argued for the respondents;—The accident had not occurred "on" a railway, as the siding was not a railway to which the Regulation of Railways Act applied. That Act applied only to railways under the jurisdiction and regulation of the Railway and Canal Commissioners, which did not cover private railways in private ground. This was a siding of the iron company, and not of the railway company. The words "or belonging to" in the Act were exegetical of the word "of." Further, it was used for the private traffic of the iron company only, and the agreement between the railway company and the iron company had reference only to such traffic. The Caledonian Railway had no leave to use the siding, and could be prohibited. The limit of a railway company's liability was for accidents on public railways; the burden was not imposed on them on private lines. (2) The accident could not be said to have taken place "about" a railway. "About" was referable to the locality of the railway, and not to the business of the railway carried on at some distance from it.[2] Here the accident took place three-quarters of a mile from the railway, which could not be said to be "about."

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts in this case are very clearly stated by the Sheriff-substitute. The real question is, whether the accident which occurred took place on, in, or about a railway to which the Regulation of Railways Act of 1873 applies, for unless it did the section 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act will not apply. I am of opinion that the place being three-quarters of a mile from the respondents' railway, and on a private line made for the service of a private company, and under the control and management of that private company, the accident did not occur upon a railway to which the Regulation of Railways Act of 1873 applies, and I therefore would propose to answer the question submitted to the Court in the negative.

LORD TRAYNER.—The appellant, a servant in the employment of the respondents, was accidentally injured in the course of his employment, and he claims compensation in respect of his injuries under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The answer made to the appellant's demand is, that in the circumstances stated the appellant can maintain no claim under the Act on which he founds. The Sheriff-substitute has given effect to this answer and dismissed the appellant's petition. I think he is right.

The injury which the appellant received was so received on a railway siding belonging to the Coltness Iron Company, about three-quarters of a mile from the place where that siding connects with the respondents' system. In one view, therefore—the popular view—the appellant was injured on, in, or about a railway. But was it a railway within the meaning of the Act? Railway is there defined as meaning the "railway of any railway company to which the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, applies." The siding on which the injury was received was not, and is not, the railway of any railway company, but is the railway of the Coltness Iron Company. Nor is it a railway to which the Regulation of Railways Act applies, in respect (1) it was not constructed, nor is it carried on, under the powers of any Act of Parliament, and (2) it is not used for public traffic, but only for the traffic of the Coltness Iron Company.

It was maintained, however, for the appellant that even if the siding on which he was injured was not a railway within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, yet that the railway of the respondents was so, and that he was injured on, in, or about that railway. I cannot adopt that view. The result of the decided cases, both in England and here, is that the words "on, in, or about," imply local contiguity to the factory or railway where the injury for which compensation is claimed was received. There was no such contiguity here. The site of the injury was three-quarters of a mile away from the respondents' railway, and a much less distance than that has been held, more than once, not to satisfy the condition of "on, in, or about." I am therefore of opinion that the question put to us should be answered in the negative and the appeal dismissed.

Lord Moncreiff.—I think the Sheriff-substitute's decision is right. The claim is made under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, against the appellant's employers, the North British Railway Company. Under that Act compensation can only be obtained for injuries sustained on or in or about a railway. "Railway" is defined as meaning the railway of any railway company to which the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, applies. Under that Act, section 3, the term "railway company" includes any person being the owner or lessee of, or working any railway in the United Kingdom constructed or carried on under the powers of any Act of Parliament, and the term "railway" includes "every station, siding, wharf, or dock of or belonging to such railway, or used for the purposes of public traffic."

Now, the accident occurred upon a siding on a private line of railway belonging to the Coltness Iron Company. This private line had a connection with the respondents' main line at Newmains, and the place where the accident occurred was at a distance of three-quarters of a mile from the connection. Under an arrangement between the respondents and the Coltness Iron Company, the former were in use to deliver and take away by means of their own engines and trucks by that private line of railway ore consigned to, or mineral consigned by, the Coltness Iron Company.

The question is, whether the Act of 1897 applies to the private line in question. It was argued in the first place that the siding could be regarded as a siding of the respondents' railway. I do not think that this contention is well founded. The siding is a siding of a private line belonging to the Coltness Iron Company, and not of any part of the system of the respondents' company. No. 16.

Nov. 6, 1900. Brodie v. North British Railway Co.

Next, it is said that the accident occurred "about" the respondents' railway. This is a more plausible ground, because the private line is connected with the respondents' railway, and the respondents' engines and trucks daily use it in connection with the public traffic which is carried on upon the respondents' railway. But this is not in my opinion sufficient. It is true that by means of the connection the respondents' engines and trucks can, under the arrangement with the Coltness Iron Company, deliver and take up ore in the way in which I have mentioned. But for all that the line is a private line, and the position of the respondents in regard to it is just the same as if in a town they had sent their carts to the private premises of a trader for the purpose either of delivering goods consigned or taking away goods for carriage by their line.

Further, the accident occurred at such a distance from the respondents' own line that I think the siding cannot in any reasonable sense be described as being about the respondents' railway.

I would only add in conclusion that the private line appears to be connected not only with the North British but with the Caledonian system, and it might with equal force be maintained that it was a part of that system. It is settled by decision that in order to bring the locus of an accident within the scope of the statute it is not enough that the workman should at the time of the accident have been employed on the employer's business. It is also necessary under the 7th section that the accident should have occurred "on or about" the premises there mentioned. It was not intended that the Act should apply to private railways, and I think that we should be setting a dangerous precedent if we hold that this line of railway fell within the scope of the Act.

Writ—Testament—Holograph Addition—Subscription.—A man executed a will, written for him by another person, by subscribing it before two instrumentary witnesses. Some time afterwards the testator inserted in a space which had been left between the end of the will and his subscription and those of the witnesses, a holograph addition which began "Codicil," and made provision for the disposal of an annuity which had lapsed through the death of the annuitant since the execution of the will.

Held that the holograph addition was a valid part of the testamentary writings of the deceased.

Gray's Trustees v. Dow.

2D DIVISION.

THIS was a special case for the determination of a question as to the validity of two holograph additions to a testamentary deed left by Mr Robert Gray, 10 Roslin Terrace, Dundee, who died unmarried at Dundee on 19th December 1899.

The facts, as stated in the case, were as follows:—

The testamentary deed in question (a facsimile of which was produced with the case) was written on a printed form of will in the English style. In so far as written it was (apart from the holograph additions) written by Mr John Miln, actuary in the Dundee Savings Bank, at the testator's request and according to his instructions, and was duly subscribed by the testator in presence of two witnesses (who subscribed as such) on 7th July 1893.

By his will, as thus framed, the testator appointed certain persons to be his trustees and executors, and bequeathed to "Mrs Agnes Wilson, my housekeeper, an annuity of thirty pounds per annum payable" at the terms and on the conditions specified, "I also bequeath to Mrs Barbara Wilson of Glasgow, mother-in-law of the said Agnes Wilson, an annuity of ten pounds per annum." Then followed an annuity of £5 to a Mrs Robert Dow and one of £10 to a niece of the testator. The testator then directed his trustees, on the death of the last surviving annuitant, to pay over the residue of his estate to the Association for the Education of the Deaf and Dumb in Dundee, to be applied in establishing bursaries or scholarships.

When the will was found in the testator's repositories after his death it had on it the holograph additions in question, both of which were written in red ink. The case bore that "when it was signed and witnessed there was no writing in red ink on the will. After it was signed the will was handed to the deceased, who retained the custody of it."

The first of these additions was written on the margin at the point containing the bequest to Mrs Barbara Wilson. It was in these terms:—"Mrs Barbara Wilson died on the 22nd of December, year 1894. Her annuity falls to Agnes Wilson afore mentioned." These words were neither signed nor initialled by the testator.

The other holograph addition was written in a space which had been left as if for a testing-clause between the end of the will and the testator's subscription. This addition had no special signature or initials appended to it. It was in the following terms:—"Codicil.—The will above was written by John Miln, formerly clerk to John Sturrock, writer, Dundee. I hereby enjoin that the annuity of ten pounds designed for Mrs Barbara Wilson, who died in Glasgow last year, shall be added to the annuity of Mrs Agnes Wilson forementioned, together with free use of my house furniture for her life, including my library, and my trustees foresaid may choose anything if they like for themselves."

The case further stated that the admitted facts with regard to the additions in red ink shewn on the will were as follows:—Mrs Barbara Wilson died on 22d December 1894. About a week after her death the testator had a conversation with Mrs Agnes Wilson in his house. "He asked her whether she wished to remain in his house after his death, seeing that she would have no home in Glasgow in consequence of the death of her mother-in-law, who lived there. Mrs Agnes Wilson said she would like to remain, and the deceased then told her that the £10 annuity which he had left to her mother-in-law would be added to her annuity, as he did not think she would have enough, and that she would get the use of his furniture during her life. . . . On the same day he told her that he had written a codicil to his will in red ink, and that it was all right now. He told her also that the codicil gave her an additional annuity of £10 and the furniture until she died, and that the furniture was then to be sold by his trustees. He many times, on later dates, repeated these statements to Mrs Agnes Wilson."

The parties to the special case were—(1) The trustees and executors under the will, (2) Mrs Agnes Wilson, (3) Mrs Robert Dow, (4) the directors of the Dundee Institution for the Education of the Deaf and Dumb.

The question of law was,—"Are the red ink holograph additions to the said will, or either and which of them, valid and effectual as part of the testamentary writings of the deceased Robert Gray?"

The first and second parties maintained that the holograph marginal note, and the holograph addition written in red ink of the will beginning "Codicil," or at least that the addition beginning "Codicil" contained a good and valid testamentary provision by the deceased, which must receive effect.

The third and fourth parties maintained that the two additions in question were invalid and ineffectual, being unsigned and otherwise destitute of the formalities necessary to give them due testamentary effect under the law of Scotland.

At the hearing the first and second parties did not offer any argument in support of the validity of the marginal addition. On the question regarding the validity of the addition beginning "Codicil," the undernoted authorities were cited.[1]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The document, of which a facsimile is before us, bears on its face to be signed by the testator, with the exception of the marginal addition on the first page, which has no special authentication. Taking the document as it stands, I have no difficulty in holding that it is effectual in all its parts, with the exception of the marginal addition, and that it is quite in accordance with the rules which govern the authentication of deeds to hold that the red ink addition which is written between the testator's signature and the body of the will must receive effect. It is, no doubt, distinguished from the deed by being headed "codicil," in the testator's handwriting, and being written in red ink, but I think these facts afford no reason for not giving effect to it, looking to the position which it occupies in the deed. The marginal addition is not in form a part of the deed; it could not be got in except by something which shewed that it was intended to be brought in. What is written on the margin is deliberative, and does not shew a final resolve in the mind of the testator. But the codicil is not in that position.

Nov. 7, 1900. Gray's Trustees v. Dow.

If we are entitled to look at the facts, we find that the testator had said to Mrs Wilson that it was his intention to make the additional provision for her which he made by his codicil, and further, that he told her that he had done so. There is, therefore, nothing in the admitted facts to throw doubt upon the conclusion which I draw from the deed itself.

I am accordingly of opinion that the question of law should be answered by declaring that the marginal addition is not effectual, but that the "codicil" is.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. Of course a testamentary writing to be effectual must be subscribed; and the question here is, is this document subscribed? The case against it is that it is difficult so to hold, because of the use of the word "codicil," and also because it contains within itself evidence that it was written after the earlier part of the deed. I think the codicil is not the less truly subscribed because the testator's name was already written below it, and, in my opinion, that name authenticated everything that was written above it. In fact, the whole deed, including the codicil, is subscribed—the testator's name is "subscribed" to it all. It is probable that the testator, finding that he had room between the end of the deed and the signature to put in the codicil, did so, intending that the one signature should serve for the whole deed. And in doing so I think he complied with the strict rule that a deed must be subscribed. If we go past the deed itself and take into account the stated facts—although I doubt the propriety of doing so—the statements and admissions of the parties exclude the idea that this addition was merely deliberative, for we are told that the testator not only said that he was going to make these additional provisions, but also said that he had done so. But I think the codicil is effectually made part of the deed apart from that extrinsic evidence.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. I assume that every holograph will must be authenticated by the signature of the testator, or by his initials, if it was his habit to sign by means of his initials. In some cases parole evidence has been admitted to connect the signature with the writing; and where that is necessary it would appear to be competent. The point which is to be ascertained here is, whether the addition in red ink—I do not mean the marginal addition—was deliberative or not. I think it is clear that the testator's intention was that the codicil should get the benefit of, and be authenticated by the signature "Robert Gray" which he had already written as his subscription to the body of the deed. The peculiarity of the case is, that the signature does duty both for the will and the codicil. But if it is plain that the testator intended it to serve for both, I see no reason why his intention should not receive effect.

The only other observation I have to make is this—it often happens that a testator in making holograph interlineations or marginal additions to his will neglects to authenticate them by his initials. Now, it is quite settled that the mere fact that the will itself is subscribed will not be sufficient to sustain such holograph alterations, although in a sense they are inserted above the subscription, because often these are put on tentatively; and if they are not authenticated it would not be safe to regard them as the expression of a completed intention. Here, instead of making a marginal addition or interlineations, the testator has put this addition immediately above his signature at the end of the deed. I am clearly of opinion that he intended the addition so made to form part of his testamentary writings, and I therefore agree that the question should be answered as your Lordship proposes.

Bill of Exchange—Proof—Parole—Collateral Agreement—Bill drawn on behalf of another.—A bill was drawn by A and accepted by B, who became bankrupt. In the sequestration a claim was made by C, who produced, along with the bill, an affidavit signed by A, to the effect that he had drawn the bill on behalf of C, and in pursuance of this A blank indorsed the bill to C after C's claim had been lodged. In a proof before the trustee it was established by parole evidence that A had signed the bill as drawer on behalf of C, and that B had accepted the bill in consideration of a debt due by him to C. Held that the parole proof was competent, and that C as holder, indorsee, and true creditor, was entitled to a ranking.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff-substitute of Dumfries and Galloway.

THE estates of Robert Crosbie, farmer, Nether Keir, Auldgirth, were sequestrated on 21st January 1899. On 6th February 1899 Mrs Sarah M'Adam or Crosbie, M'Cubbington, Dunscore, the mother of the bankrupt, lodged with the trustee, Henry Hay Brown, an affidavit and claim for sums of £121, 4s. 1d. and £273, 14s. 2d. On an appeal from a deliverance of the trustee rejecting these claims the Sheriff-substitute, at Dumfries (Campion), on 30th June 1899, recalled the deliverance of the trustee, allowed the appellant a proof prout de jure in support of her claim, and remitted to the trustee to take said proof, and thereafter to re-adjudicate on the claim.

In regard to the claim for £121, 4s. 1d. the following facts were proved:—On 29th October 1890 the bankrupt, Robert Crosbie, got a loan of £100 from John Hiddleston, draper, Dumfries, for which a bill was drawn by Hiddleston upon and accepted by the bankrupt and Mrs Crosbie. After several renewals the amount of the bill was paid by Mrs Crosbie on 29th October 1894. The signature of Hiddleston was thereafter cancelled.

This bill Mrs Crosbie produced in support of her claim for the principal sum of £100. The balance of the claim, £21, 4s. 1d., was made up of interest from 29th October 1894, the date of payment of the bill, to 26th February 1899, the date of lodging the claim. Apart from the bill there was no writ to support this part of the claim.

No. 18.

Nov. 7, 1900. Crosbie v. Brown.

As regards the second item of £273, 14s. 2d., the following facts were proved:—On 16th April 1892 Robert Crosbie obtained from Robert Stoba, solicitor, Dumfries, a loan of £200, which was secured by a heritable bond granted by Mrs Crosbie over Lagganlees, a small property belonging to her. Mr Stoba also took a bill for the £200 from Robert Crosbie. Lagganlees was subsequently purchased by John Gibson, Olive Bank, Maxwelltown, Mrs Crosbie's son-in-law, under burden of the bond in favour of Stoba, and in January 1897 the bond was paid up by Gibson and discharged. The bill for £200 was at the same time delivered up by Stoba to Gibson on the understanding that the latter was acting for Mrs Crosbie. Thereafter, on 17th February 1897, Gibson drew a new bill upon Robert Crosbie (who accepted) for £250, representing the original bill of £200 and accrued interest. Gibson deponed that he had no instructions from Mrs Crosbie to get the bill, but that he considered he had a right to it on her behalf in order to preserve legal evidence of the debt due to her by Robert Crosbie. He also appended an affidavit to Mrs Crosbie's claim in the sequestration, in which he declared "that the interest as creditor in the bill for £250 is entirely in my mother-in-law Mrs Crosbie," and eight days after the claim was lodged he blank indorsed the bill to Mrs Crosbie. It farther appeared that Gibson had on other occasions transacted business for Mrs Crosbie, who was a woman of seventy-three years of age. Mrs Crosbie produced the bill, drawn by Stoba and accepted by the bankrupt, for £200, and the bill for £250, in support of her claim, which consisted of the principal sum of £250 and interest thereon from 17th February 1897 to the date of the claim, amounting to £23, 14s. 2d.

By a deliverance dated 4th April 1900 the trustee rejected Mrs Crosbie's claim on the ground that what was sought to be proved, in both branches of the claim, was a loan by the claimant to the bankrupt, and that this could not be established by parole, while the bills could not be treated as documentary evidence of the loans. The Sheriff-substitute, on 15th June 1900, affirmed this deliverance on the same grounds.

Mrs Crosbie appealed, and argued;—(1) It was competent at common law to shew by parole evidence that the appellant accepted the bill as cautioner, and was entitled to relief for the whole sum expended in retiring the bill against the other obligant who had received the proceeds, and was the principal debtor.[1] Apart from this, parole proof was expressly authorised by sec. 100 in a case like the present. This was not a case where parole proof was offered to contradict the bill, because the bill did not determine what were the liabilities inter se of the joint acceptors.[2] Apart from proof, the presumption was that each, in a question with the other, was liable for a half, and to this extent the claim ought, in any event, to have been sustained. (2) As regarded the bill for £250, the appellant was as indorsee of the bill entitled to a ranking, unless the transaction was fictitious and without value, but the proof shewed that the appellant was the true creditor in the bill, and that the whole transactions were bona fide.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The argument that parole proof was competent at common law was negatived by the case of Walker's Trustees v. M'Kinlay.[1] Since the date of the cases quoted from Morison's Dictionary by the appellant, the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, had limited proof of guarantee to writ. The statutory requirement was not satisfied merely by a name on the face of a bill, which could not be regarded as proving anything except the liabilities attached to this species of instrument. But, further, this was not a bill at the date of the claim, as the drawer's name was cancelled. Accordingly, what the appellant asked the Court to sanction was parole proof of a loan without any extant obligation in writing as a foundation for such proof. For the same reason the claim could not be maintained even to the extent of one-half. The 100th section of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, even if it applied to a cancelled bill, did not cover a case like the present. It only related to questions arising on the bill, and the rights inter se of co-acceptors; rights arising on payment of the bill, and after its existence as a bill was ended, could not be said to fall within this category. It had been decided in a recent case[2] that payment of a bill could only be proved by writ, and the same limitations must apply to a claim of relief which depended on proof that the proceeds of the bill had been received as a loan by one of the co-obligants from the other. Such a loan must be proved independently of the bill, by competent evidence (just as in the case of payment of the bill), because it was admitted that the bill itself did not determine the mutual rights and obligations of the co-acceptors. (2) As regarded the second item, it was clear that the indorsation of the bill for £250, not having been made till after the lodging of the claim, could not give a title unless the appellant had all along held the equitable right as true creditor in the bill. This did not appear on the face of the bills, to which the claimant was not a party, and in order to prove that she was the true creditor the appellant proposed to prove by parole a loan by her to the bankrupt. This was clearly not competent. It was said that Gibson, who was the drawer of the bill for £250, acted as agent for the appellant, but he had no authority and never disclosed the transaction to the alleged principal. The appellant never intended to keep up the loan. Unless there was proof of consideration, the granting of the bill was struck at by the Act 1621, c. 18, as an alienation to a conjunct and confident person. Gibson, to whom the bill was granted, stood in this relation, and it was not said that he gave value. It had never been held that the Act could be elided by proof that the person to whom the alienation was made acted as agent for another.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this case is whether certain facts relative to two bills of exchange claimed on by the appellant, Mrs Crosbie, in the sequestration of the estates of her son, Robert Crosbie, can competently be proved by parole evidence, and if such evidence is competent whether the proof adduced is sufficient to establish these facts?

Crosbie v. Brown.

The two bills of exchange upon which the appellant claims are one for £100, dated 20th December 1893, drawn by John Hiddleston, upon and accepted by the appellant and the bankrupt, and the other for £250, dated 17th February 1897, drawn by John Gibson upon and accepted by the bankrupt.

The question relative to the first-mentioned bill is whether a claim of relief by the appellant against the bankrupt for the sums which she paid under the bill can be proved by parole. She alleges in effect that she accepted the bill to procure the advance for the bankrupt, that he got the whole proceeds, and she accordingly claims a ranking on his estate for total relief.

It was not disputed in the argument before us that where there are two acceptors of a bill there is from the form of the instrument a presumption that, as between themselves, the acceptors are ultimately liable only each in one-half of the amount, and that if one has paid the whole the other would prima facie have a claim of relief to the extent of one-half. But as the question of relief does not depend solely or mainly on the terms of the bill, but the real nature of the transaction, and as proof of the true relations of the acceptors inter se would not in any way contradict the terms of the bill, I consider that those relations can competently be proved by parole, so that, if in the result it is established that the bill was exclusively for behoof of one of them who got the whole proceeds of it, the other would be entitled to total relief. I arrive at this conclusion independently of section 100 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and consequently it does not appear to me that for the purposes of the present question we require to give any opinion as to the construction or effect of that section.

The case of the bill for £250 is somewhat different, as the name of the appellant does not appear upon it, the sole drawer being John Gibson and the sole acceptor being the bankrupt; and the question relative to it practically resolves into this, whether it is competent to prove by parole that John Gibson, in drawing the bill, acted on behalf or in the interest of the appellant, and that the sum of £250, in respect of which it was granted, was truly due by the bankrupt to her. It is alleged that in taking the bill John Gibson virtually acted as a negotiorum gestor or volunteer agent for the appellant, to whom he was aware that the bankrupt was owing a just debt of the amount for which the bill was granted. This again is a question as to which it appears to me that parole proof is competent, as it does not in any way contradict the terms of the bill, but relates to something outside of it. It appears from the proof that in April 1892 the bankrupt required an advance of £200, and that Mr Stoba agreed to give a loan of that amount upon the appellant granting to him a postponed bond for it over a small property which belonged to her, the bankrupt at the same time granting a bill to Mr Stoba as a sort of collateral security for the same sum upon the bond, and the bill being granted the £200 was advanced to the bankrupt. The advance was repaid in January 1897 by John Gibson, a son-in-law of the appellant, who purchased the property under burden of the bonds upon it, including the £200 bond. As the £200 was truly due to the appellant, John Gibson got up the bill, with a view to recovering the amount on her behalf, and afterwards obtained for the benefit of the appellant the bill for £250 claimed on as representing the £200 due under the prior bill and accrued interest. Upon these facts I think that the appellant is entitled to a ranking for the amount of the last-mentioned bill, seeing that the debt was truly due to her by the bankrupt, and parole proof being, in my view, competent, because it is not adduced to contradict or interfere with the terms of the bill, but to establish relevant facts collateral to and outside of it.

LORD ADAM.—There were two questions argued in this case—(1st) whether Mrs Crosbie is entitled to rank in respect of the bill for £100, and (2d) whether she is entitled to rank in respect of the bill for £250.

The bill for £100 was drawn by John Hiddleston, and accepted by Mrs Crosbie and the bankrupt. It was paid by Mrs Crosbie when it became due, and was then handed over to her. In the meantime, Mr Hiddleston's signature was deleted, as often is done in such cases, to prevent, I suppose, the bill from getting into circulation again. Well, Mrs Crosbie having paid the £100 to the drawer of the bill, no question arises between him and the acceptors. The only question is, whether the acceptors can have their mutual relations as acceptors settled outwith the bill, and the true state of liability between them proved by parole evidence, and not by reference to writ or oath. It was said by counsel for the trustee that Mrs Crosbie could not, in any view, prove this by parole evidence, because the allegation made by her was that she paid the bill as cautioner for the bankrupt, and that, accordingly, there was a difficulty arising out of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (sec. 6), which prevents guarantees or cautionary obligations from being proved otherwise than by writ. But that argument is used under a misapprehension of the circumstances of the case. The only cautionary obligation—if any there was—was between the creditor on the bill and Mrs Crosbie, she guaranteeing that her son, or failing him, she herself, would pay the bill. And the present question is, whether, having paid the bill in full, she is entitled to have relief for that payment from the other acceptor. It is not a question of caution at all, but of relief, and I cannot see why the extent of the liability must be determined by writ only and not by parole evidence. It was not disputed that in the case of this bill the presumption is—there being no evidence to the contrary—that the acceptors were each liable in one-half of the bill, and that if one paid the whole he would be entitled to relief from the other. Now, I see no incompetency in Mrs Crosbie proving that she paid the whole amount, and that her son was the true debtor, and in that case why should she not be entitled to relief against him? It is not a question of proving a loan by parole evidence, but of whether or not it was the fact that the whole amount was paid by Mrs Crosbie, and that her son was the true debtor.

With reference to the bill for £250, the position is this: There is a document of debt for £250, of which she is the indorsee, holder, and creditor. Why should she not be ranked in respect thereof? The answer is that she did not pay the value. That is not true in point of fact, for she did pay the sum of £200 to the debtor on the bill, and her money went to the renewal of a bill for £200, of which this present bill is the representative.

Crosbie v. Brown.

Again, it is said that because the name of her son-in-law, who was negotiating for her, appears on the bill, it could not be held that she really gave value for it. I do not agree with that view. I think it is clearly proved that Crosbie got the £200 from her in 1892. I therefore concur in holding she is entitled to rank on this bill.

LORD M'LAREN.—I have very little to add, but I shall state my opinion on the points in the case in the order in which they have been argued to us.

1. With reference to the bill for £100 signed by the mother and son as joint acceptors, it appears to me that in the case of a joint obligation, whether undertaken in a bond or cash-credit obligation, or by joint subscription of a bill, it is no doubt of the essence of the obligation that each party is liable in solidum to the creditor, but there is nothing whatever in the words of the obligation to determine the reciprocal liability inter se of the joint obligants, or the extent of the right of relief which will arise when payment is made by one of them. We are familiar with the rule of law that payment of money in a question between debtor and creditor can only be proved by writ or oath, but I have yet to learn that this rule applies when the question is not one between debtor and creditor, but where payment is to be proved with reference to a collateral right, such as the right of relief of a co-obligant who pays the debt out of his own funds. There is no presumption that joint obligants are liable in equal shares inter se, and in business it is a common occurrence that a signature should be appended to a bond or bill without the party signing receiving value, and with the view of assisting or accommodating his cosignatory. If there is no presumption of fact as to the liability inter se of the joint obligants, the question of liability must be investigated by proof at large, if, as I assume, there is no limitation to writ or oath. In this case the proof is clear that Robert Crosbie received the whole proceeds of the bill, and in a question with his mother, who has paid the bill, is liable in total relief.

2. In regard to the bill for £250 I shall only say this, that Mrs Crosbie is holder as indorsee, and prima facie is entitled to enforce it against the bankrupt, who is the acceptor, and the proof, so far from displacing this presumption, appears to me to support it.

LORD KINNEAR.—By their joint acceptance of the bill for £100 Mrs Crosbie and her son, Robert, are placed in the position of joint obligants in a question with the drawer, but their reciprocal obligations inter se are not determined by anything on the face of the bill. If these reciprocal obligations are to be ascertained at all, and they are not constituted by written instrument, they must be ascertained by parole proof. There is no question of the rule of law that if one of two joint obligants pays more than his share of the debt he is entitled to relief against the other obligant, and the fact of payment, as well as the facts which go to shew that the actual payment has exceeded the obligant's share, are proper subjects for judicial inquiry. In this case it is proved that Robert Crosbie received the contents of the bill, and that the bill has been met by Mrs Crosbie, and if he got the money for his own purposes, and she has paid the whole amount, the consequence is that she has paid his debt, and is entitled to be reimbursed by him. I know of no rule of law which should prevent the mother from making good this claim, and it does not appear to me to be necessary to consider any question as to the application of section 100 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. As to the claim upon the bill for £250, I have nothing to add to what your Lordships have said.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 15th June 1900, together with the deliverance of the trustee, dated 4th April 1900: Remit to the trustee to rank and prefer the claimant (appellant) in terms of her claims as stated in her affidavit and claim, with the exception that the interest found due on the bill for £250 is restricted to interest on £200, and decern," &c.

Expenses—Taxation—Excerpts from Session Papers.—The expense of making and printing excerpts from session papers disallowed as between party and party.

(IN the Court of Session, March 3, 1899, 1 F. 658, and in the House of Lords, May 28, 1900, 2 F. (H. L.) 57.) 1ST DIVISION.

In both these appeals the House of Lords found the Duke of Atholl and Others entitled to expenses in the Court of Session and in the House of Lords. The Auditor in his taxation allowed a charge of £40 for making and printing excerpts from the session papers in cases in Morison's Dictionary and in Shaw's Reports.

On the report coming up for approval, the defenders objected, inter alia, to this charge.

LORD ADAM.—As regards this objection it appears that there were several old cases referred to by both parties, which are very briefly reported, and it is alleged that the reports were incorrect, and that the grounds of these decisions could not be understood or the point decided ascertained without reference to the session papers. In the course of that investigation Mr Johnston's clients printed large excerpts from the session papers, and the question is whether he is entitled to charge the expense thereby incurred against the unsuccessful party. These excerpts may have been useful to the Court and to counsel, but I take it they are of the nature of things which a party may do to facilitate the apprehension of the case by counsel, but which he cannot charge against the opposite party. In the ordinary course counsel obtains and reads in the course of his argument the session papers, and I think we cannot allow the expense of procuring and printing excerpts from them.

LORD M'LAREN.—As regards this objection, I agree that it would be an innovation to allow the expense of excerpts from printed reports because they are referred to merely as precedents. Where a reference to old documents is necessary in the course of a historic inquiry, the rule might be different.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT disallowed the charge.

Arbitration—Award—Leave to Appeal—Failure of Justice—Housing of Working Classes Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. c. 70), Schedule II. (26).—Under Schedule II. (26) of the Housing of Working Classes Act, 1890, leave to appeal against the arbitrator's award fixing the amount of compensation for lands compulsorily taken under the Act can be granted by the Court only "upon being satisfied that a failure of justice will take place if such leave is not granted." In an application for leave to appeal by the owner of the lands in terms of the Schedule, held that it was not a sufficient ground for granting leave—(1) that the arbitrator had limited the skilled evidence of the value of the lands to two witnesses on each side, or (2) that he had, in addition to hearing such evidence, personally inspected the lands in the presence of the parties, and in his award had proceeded in part on his own judgment as a man of skill.

Observations on the meaning of the words "failure of justice" in Schedule II. (26).

1ST DIVISION.

THE EDINBURGH CORPORATION, as Local Authority, prepared in 1897 an improvement scheme under Part I. of the Housing of Working Classes Act, 1890, dealing with an "unhealthy area" within the city. The scheme was duly confirmed by Act of Parliament. In carrying out part of this scheme it was necessary for the Corporation to acquire certain lands, consisting of dwelling-houses in Allan Street, Stockbridge, which belonged to the late Alexander Macknight, advocate, and which, at his death, formed part of his trust-estate. Hugh Martin, S.S.C., was the sole accepting and surviving trustee upon Mr Macknight's estate.

On 6th December 1899 a notice to treat was served by the Corporation upon Mr Martin as proprietor and trustee, with relative plans of the lands proposed to be taken. Certain negotiations followed, but the parties failed to agree as to the compensation payable, and on 20th February 1900 Mr Hall Blyth, civil engineer, Edinburgh, was, in virtue of the powers conferred by the Act of 1890, appointed arbitrator under the improvement scheme by the Secretary for Scotland. The trustee lodged a claim in the arbitration for £2500, while the Corporation offered £1030, 16s. On 3d May 1900 the arbitrator inspected the property in question in presence of the parties and their advisers, and on 5th May he issued an order allowing the parties a hearing, with power to examine two witnesses only on each side.

At this hearing on 12th May Mr Marwick, architect, and Mr Lawrence, surveyor, were examined for the claimant, and agreed in estimating the value of the subjects at £2470.* Bailie Brown, valuator and house factor, who was also convener of the committee for carrying out the improvement scheme, the only witness examined for the Corporation, valued the property in its existing state at £1133. With reference to section 21 of the Act this witness stated that in his view the property fell under the second subsection of that clause, being in a defective condition as regards sanitation and repair. He estimated the amount required to put the property into a proper state at £1000, including loss by non-occupancy during the repairs. Mr Marwick's evidence on this point was that the houses were in fair condition for houses of the class, and that they could be put into a reasonably good state of repair for £30 to return the existing rental, and with this view Mr Lawrence agreed. Mr Marwick admitted, however, that the tenants were of an inferior class, and that the wear and tear upon the houses was very great.

In the proceedings before the arbitrator it was brought to his notice that in the previous negotiations the property had been valued on behalf of the Corporation by three city valuators at £2117. This was admitted by the Corporation, who explained that this valuation was made on the basis of avoiding the expenses and delay of arbitration, and without taking into account the special provisions of section 21 of the Act.

On 15th May the arbitrator issued proposed findings, and after hearing parties he issued his final award on 6th June 1900, finding the claimant entitled to £1556 as compensation for the lands; and he thereafter, on 17th August 1900, issued a certificate for this amount, in terms of the Act.

The claimant thereafter presented a petition to the First Division of the Court of Session for leave to appeal in terms of Schedule II., sec. (26).†

Argued for the petitioner;—(1) The arbitrator was bound to regard the evidence before him, and was not entitled to act on his own knowledge as an expert. He was not a mere valuator, but an arbitrator. Under section 21 evidence was declared to be receivable "to prove" the condition of the property as regards sanitation and repair. The arbitrator had dealt with this property as insanitary, and in bad repair, and as thus falling under subsection 2. In doing so, he relied not upon the evidence, but upon his own examination. If he allowed evidence he was not entitled to disregard it in favour of his own view. If the petitioner was right in this contention, then the arbitrator's decision was clearly against the weight of the evidence. Both as regards the valuation, and as regards the condition of the property, Bailie Brown's evidence was unsupported, and was in direct opposition to that of the other two witnesses, and, as regards the valuation, was also inconsistent with that of the three city valuators who had placed the value at £2117. Bailie Brown was too intimately associated with the scheme to be an unbiassed witness. (2) The arbitrator had acted irregularly in limiting the evidence to two witnesses on each side. Apart from this limitation, the petitioner would have brought forward other witnesses, including the city valuators, who had previously valued the subjects. It was true that he had not tendered further evidence, but this would have been useless in face of the limitation. A retrial should be granted on the two grounds that the arbitrator had erred in limiting the proof, and had given an award contrary to the evidence which he had allowed to be led.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The Court was not sitting here as a Court of appeal, but to correct a "failure of justice," arising from some specific error in the conduct of the arbitrator. The function of the Court was much the same as in motions for a new trial in jury cases. In regard to the first objection taken by the petitioner, there was nothing in the Act to prevent the arbitrator from proceeding upon his own knowledge as an expert, either wholly or with the assistance of such evidence as he might deem necessary. In fact, the

the party dissatisfied may, upon obtaining the leave of the High Court, which leave may be granted by such Court or any Judge thereof at Chambers in a summary manner, and upon being satisfied that a failure of justice will take place if the leave is not granted, submit the question of the proper amount of compensation to a jury, provided that such party give notice in writing to the other party of their intention to appeal within ten days after the cause of appeal has arisen.

language of section 7 of the Second Schedule seemed to shew that he might ascertain the facts necessary for his decision in any manner he should find most convenient. An arbitrator had this power at common law (Bell on Arbitration, p. 264), and in this summary procedure the arbitrator would presumably have powers as wide. It was, therefore, not a "failure of justice" that the arbitrator acted on his own skill as an expert who had examined the subjects for himself. (2) As to the second ground of complaint, it came to this that the award should be set aside because the petitioner had other witnesses whom he might have examined, but whom he did not tender. Besides, the arbitrator was not bound to hear an unlimited number of skilled witnesses on a matter of value as to which he was as able as an expert to form an opinion.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This petition raises an important question, for we are told that this is the first occasion on which such an application has been made to this Court under the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, although many cases must have been settled under that Act throughout Scotland without any attempt to have the award of the statutory arbitrators set aside. In dealing with the question raised we must walk entirely by the code which the statute provides for arbitration proceedings, and what may be called complaints arising out of such proceedings. Such a code we find in the Act of 1890, and the Schedules annexed thereto. The first matter is the appointment of an arbitrator, and under Schedule II., section 4, that appointment is to be made by the Secretary for Scotland. In this case Mr Blyth was appointed, who, it is a matter of common knowledge, has had great experience of the matters with which he required to deal, and I cannot doubt that the Secretary for Scotland in nominating him had regard to his obvious qualifications for the duties which he would have to perform. The Schedule next goes on to make certain provisions for the procedure in the arbitration. Under section (7) it is provided that "In every case in which compensation is payable . . . the arbitrator shall ascertain, in such manner as he thinks most convenient, the amount of compensation demanded by the claimant, and the amount which the Local Authority may be willing to pay; and after hearing all such parties interested . . . as may appear before him . . . he shall proceed to decide on the amount of compensation to which he may consider the claimant to be entitled." Under the procedure thus prescribed great latitude is left to the arbitrator. The Schedule further by section (9) provides that "after the arbitrator has arrived at a decision he shall make an award under his hand and seal, and such award shall be final, and be binding and conclusive (subject to the provisions concerning an appeal hereinafter contained), upon all persons whomsoever, and no such award shall be set aside for irregularity in matter of form." So that, subject to the provisions regarding appeal, as high a degree of finality is given to the decisions of the statutory arbitrator as could well be. The provisions as to appeal, under which the case comes before us, are contained in section (26) of the Schedule. It is there provided that the claimant, if dissatisfied with the amount of compensation awarded him, may, if that amount exceeds £1000, "upon obtaining the leave of the High Court, which leave may be granted by such Court or any Judge thereof at Chambers in a summary manner, and upon being satisfied that a failure of justice will take place if the leave is not granted, submit the question of the proper amount of compensation to a jury." An appeal is not to be granted as matter of course, or otherwise than on special cause shewn. It would have been a very singular scheme of legislation to have provided that where an arbitration in regard to such a matter is initiated by a high officer of State appointing an arbitrator, his decision should have been lightly set aside, and a jury trial granted. Such a scheme is not what we are accustomed to in legislation regarding such matters. It is difficult to imagine language which would more carefully define and limit the grounds upon which alone the Court is to allow the dissatisfied party to have jury trial, as the provision is that it must be satisfied that a failure of justice would take place if it is not granted. This being so, the position of the petitioner in this case is that he must satisfy us that there will be a failure of justice if a retrial of this case before a jury is not allowed.

We have had a full statement of what took place before the arbitrator, and we are therefore in a position to form an opinion as to whether a failure of justice would take place if the leave sought is not granted. It appears that Mr Blyth, the arbitrator, examined the property, and one would suppose such a skilled person would be well able to judge from such examination what was the class and character of the property with which he had to deal. But he did not rely solely upon his examination of the property—he heard evidence. Two gentlemen were examined as witnesses on one side and one on the other, and the arbitrator seems to have thought he was entitled to limit evidence when, as in this case, it amounted to little more than expression of opinion as to value. One of the matters on which there was a sharp difference of opinion between the witnesses was as to the number of years' purchase of the rental which should be taken in fixing the amount of compensation for property of such a class and in such condition as the property in question, one of the witnesses putting it as high as twelve years' purchase, and another at only half of that period. Which of the estimates is right must depend very much on the condition, the age, the class, and the surroundings of the property, whether the rents are well or ill-paid, whether the tenants are destructive or not, and whether the cost of repairs is great. Now, the account of this property, as we find it in the proof, is rather a depressing one. It is situated in an area which we are told has been scheduled as insanitary, but it is said that the particular building is not itself insanitary, though its surroundings are so. No doubt that was duly considered by the arbitrator when he visited the property. On the question of cost of repairs we have some very clear, if somewhat lurid, light from what Mr Marwick, the petitioner's leading witness, said in reply to a question put by the arbitrator,—"A workman's house I would put on a slightly higher scale than this, but here you have the wasters of society, and the 'drunks,' who kick the panels out of the doors, and an immense number of children, who make holes in the plaster, and break it down." Now, that is a sentence from the testimony of the leading witness for the petitioner, and it requires no comment. It does not appear to me surprising that the arbitrator thought he should take a somewhat moderate number of years in converting the rental of such subjects into a capital sum. There are clauses in the Act of 1890 which afford some guide to persons charged with the duty of considering the question of compensation. Section 21, subsection (2), provides that when dealing with premises situated within an unhealthy area evidence may be taken; "(2dly) that the house or premises are in such a condition as to be a nuisance within the meaning of the Acts relating to nuisances, or are in a state of defective sanitation, or are not in reasonably good repair," and if the arbitrator is satisfied with the evidence, the estimated expense of putting the property into a proper state is to be deducted from the amount of compensation allowed. It would not be surprising if the arbitrator thought that these provisions had some application to the present case. And again, in the same subsection, it is provided that evidence may be taken to shew "(3dly) that the house or premises are unfit and not reasonably capable of being made fit, for human habitation," in which case the compensation is to be the value of the land and the building materials on it. All these provisions go to shew that a moderate standard of compensation is to be taken in these cases, and the evidence goes to prove that the property in question, if not within these classes, was not very far removed from them. We have no reason to suppose that the arbitrator did not apply his mind to all these matters, and he was eminently qualified to determine the amount of compensation which should be awarded. In determining whether injustice would be caused by refusing a retrial before a jury we have to consider the provisions of the statute as applied to the information before us, and when we find, as we do here, that the arbitrator has conducted the proceedings in accordance with the provisions of the statute, and that there is no reason whatever for thinking that a failure of justice will take place if the leave sought is not granted, I think that we should refuse to grant that leave. It would be very unfortunate if it came to be regarded as anything like a matter of course that an arbitrator's award upon a question of the value of urban property which he had examined should be set aside, and the elaborate and costly machinery of a jury trial set in motion, especially in the case of property of small value where the cost would be quite disproportionate to any likelihood of getting a more satisfactory decision from the jury than from the arbitrator.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is necessary to keep in view that the present process is not an ordinary process of appeal. It is an application for the retrial of a matter submitted to a statutory tribunal on the grounds specified in the statute. I think there is much force in an observation which was made by the Lord Advocate in the course of his argument, that the statutory grounds upon which such a retrial may be granted are not dissimilar to those upon which a new trial will be granted as against the verdict of a jury. In this connection I would remind your Lordships that in the Act 55 Geo. III., introducing jury trial into Scotland, in the clause dealing with the grounds for a new trial, after specifying as such grounds misdirection by the presiding Judge, a verdict contrary to the evidence, &c., the clause proceeds, "or for such other cause as is essential to the justice of the case." This last expression is very nearly the same as that which we have to construe as a ground of allowing an appeal, viz., "failure of justice." The one expression is affirmative, the other is negative; but the essential condition contemplated by both is that it would be inconsistent with justice that the determination complained of should be allowed to stand.

In considering the facts of the present case it is to be observed that this is an award by an arbiter eminent in his profession, and of great experience as a railway engineer in cases of valuation of houses and property. It is not alleged that he has deviated in any way from the procedure enjoined by statute. He has applied his mind to the matter submitted, after hearing evidence and after a personal inspection of the property. I observe from the terms of the award that prior to issuing it, the arbiter submitted it to the parties in draft, and heard their representations in regard to it, so that it is very unlikely that he can have overlooked or omitted any consideration material to the case.

The only tangible objection to the award is that the arbiter heard but one witness for the Corporation, and that witness was a bailie, and therefore biassed in the direction of a low valuation. There might have been some reason in this objection if the arbiter had accepted the figure put forward by this witness, but he has not done so; he has taken as the true valuation one which lies between Bailie Brown's valuation and that proposed by the witnesses for the appellants. Whether he was right or wrong as to the value he has fixed, it is not for this Court to inquire. The question for us is, whether there has been in the conduct of this arbitration a failure of justice, and I am very clearly of opinion that no such case has been established, either in law or in fact, so as to entitle us to sustain this application.

Trust—Trustee—Application for Appointment of Judicial Factor.—An application was presented by two out of four trustees, with the concurrence of certain of the beneficiaries, craving the Court to supersede the administration by the trustees and appoint a judicial factor on the ground that the trust had become unworkable owing to differences between the petitioning trustees on the one hand and the two remaining trustees on the other. The remaining trustees and the chief beneficiary under the trust opposed this application.

Circumstances in which the Court refused the application.

1ST DIVISION.

JOHN M'CASLAND YUILL, fruit and spice merchant, Glasgow, died on 8th June 1900, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby he disponed and conveyed his whole means and estate to and in favour of Thomas James Gilchrist Boyes, writer in Glasgow; Alexander Ross, writer in Hamilton; Andrew Arthur Gavin Yuill, fruit and spice merchant in Glasgow, his brother; and Robert Osborne Pagan, Writer to the Signet, Cupar-Fife, as trustees for the ends, uses, and purposes therein mentioned. The trust purposes were (1) payment of debts; (2) delivery of his furniture and plenishing to his widow, and (3) to convey, realise, and distribute the remainder of his means and estate to and amongst the parties who might be entitled thereto, including his widow, for her rights of terce and jus relictæ, in addition to the furniture, at the time of his death according to the law of Scotland.

The truster was survived by his widow, who was entitled to one-half of his moveable estate, by his brother Andrew Yuill, one of the trustees, by two sisters,—Mrs Boyes, wife of Thomas J. G. Boyes, also a trustee, and Mrs Watson,—and by his mother Mrs M'Casland or Yuill, who was entitled to one-third of the remaining half of the moveable estate. The trustees accepted office, and obtained confirmation on 13th October 1900.

Differences having arisen between Mr Yuill and Mr Boyes on the one hand, and Mr Ross and Mr Pagan on the other, the two former presented a petition on 22d October 1900 to the First Division for the appointment of an additional trustee, or alternatively craving that the administration of the trustees should be superseded by the appointment of a judicial factor.

The petition set forth:—"The trust has become unworkable on account of the opposition of Messrs Pagan and Ross to the appointment of a law-agent in the trust. The whole beneficiaries, with exception of the widow, are desirous that Messrs Boyes & Fergusson should be the law-agents, but Messrs Pagan and Ross decline to assent to this, and in consequence there is a complete deadlock, to the great detriment of the estate. Several matters in connection with the trust require immediate attention. None of the truster's debts are paid, a bond-holder is threatening to raise an action of maills and duties, rents fall to be uplifted, and none of the estate is being ingathered. The estate amounts to upwards of £8000, and it is not being administered on account of the obstinate refusal of Messrs Pagan and Ross to give effect to the all but unanimous desire of the beneficiaries for the appointment of law-agents. In order to end this deadlock, which threatens to be disastrous to the estate, the petitioning trustees approached the other trustees on 13th August, suggesting the appointment of a fifth trustee, and on the invitation of Mr Ross, submitted a list of four totally disinterested persons, who are all capable men of business and were intimate friends of the truster, that they might select one of them to be assumed as an additional trustee, but neither Mr Ross nor Mr Pagan will take any step in the matter, and the estate is thus left without anyone to manage it."

The petition was presented with the concurrence of all the beneficiaries with the exception of the truster's widow, but at the hearing it was intimated that Mrs Watson had withdrawn her concurrence.

Mr Ross and Mr Pagan, along with Mrs Yuill, the truster's widow, lodged answers.

From the petition and answers it appeared that the trustees differed in regard to two points (1) the appointment of a law-agent, and (2) the institution of proceedings against Andrew Yuill, one of the petitioning trustees, for the recovery of debts alleged to be due by him to the truster.

As regarded the first of these matters, Mr Boyes, who was supported by Mr Yuill, claimed the law-agency of the trust on the ground that he had been agent for the truster. This was opposed by the respondent trustees on the grounds, inter alia, that Mrs Boyes was not only a beneficiary whose interests conflicted with those of the deceased's widow, but was also a debtor to the trust; and, further, that Mr Boyes was the personal agent for Mr Andrew Yuill, who was also largely indebted to the trust. The respondent trustees further objected to Mr Boyes voting upon the question of the appointment of his own firm, and accordingly claimed that their motion against his appointment was carried by a majority of the trustees entitled to vote. In their answers the respondents further stated that the petitioners had opposed a motion at their instance to take steps to recover the amount due to the trust-estate by the petitioner Andrew Yuill. In this matter also the respondents claimed "that their motion was carried by a majority, upon the ground that Mr Yuill was not entitled to vote in this matter." The respondents Mr Ross and Mr Pagan, thereafter instructed Messrs Smith Clark, W.S., to take the proceedings in question, but before the summonses were served, the present petition was boxed on 22d October 1900.

At the hearing the undernoted cases were cited.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is always a somewhat delicate question whether in any particular case a judicial factor should be appointed to supersede trustees in the administration of a trust. This is what is asked for in this case, as the alternative proposal for the appointment of an additional trustee was not seriously pressed. In general a judicial factor will only be appointed where there is danger to the estate, or where there is such a deadlock in the administration of the trust as to make the situation impossible. Now, in this case, although the situation is inconvenient and unfortunate, it is not proved that the trust has become unworkable. Mr Pagan and Mr Ross have conducted the business of the trust and have obtained the services of agents when that was necessary. The position of the other two trustees is different, and not so favourable. Mr Yuill is in the position of being the largest debtor to the trust, and Mr Boyes is in the position of being a candidate for the agency of the trust. The leading beneficiaries are not desirous that the administration of the trustees should be superseded by that of a judicial factor, and of those who were originally represented as having consented to the present application some have withdrawn. In particular the widow of the truster is not a consenter, but desires the administration by the trustees to continue. Again, the administration of the trust by a factor would be much more expensive than the administration by the trustees. An additional consideration which weighs with me is that the two trustees who oppose this application have not been guilty of any remissness or neglect in the administration of the trust, and that they are willing to continue that administration. If it was necessary to make any unfavourable observations they would rather be directed against the petitioners.

On the whole matter, I am not satisfied that a case has been made out for the appointment of a judicial factor, and I think the petition should be refused.

Yuill v. Ross.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The first question we have to consider here is not what has been the conduct of the parties, but what is most for the benefit of the estate. Whatever I might think of the conduct of the petitioners, that would not weigh with me if it appeared for the benefit of the estate that their petition should be granted. Those who are carrying on the trust here have done nothing, so far as I can see, which they should not have done; but if I had been persuaded a deadlock in the management of the estate would result, I would not have hesitated to appoint a judicial factor. But there are no signs of a deadlock here. So far as the conduct of the trust hitherto is concerned, I venture to think these two trustees were quite entitled to appoint a law-agent for the purpose of recovering a debt due by a person who happened to be himself a trustee, and that there was nothing blameable in that matter. And what confirms me in that opinion is that the beneficiaries seem to take the view that there would be no deadlock created by our refusal. The widow, who is a large beneficiary, takes that view, and is opposed to the proposal to appoint a judicial factor, and that is, I think, a strong reason for our not doing so. In view of the expenses attendant on a judicial factory I think a beneficiary is quite entitled to say that he prefers the existing administration. On the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that the case for removal and appointment is not made out.

LORD M'LAREN.—I cannot help thinking that it would be for the interest of the beneficiaries that all the trustees should signify their willingness to retire and assent to the appointment of a judicial factor. But I think there has not been a sufficient trial of the existing trust administration.

The objection is that in the case of two trustees, who are responsible for the raising of this case, the one is anxious to be appointed law-agent to the trust, and the other is a debtor to the trust. That is not put as an imputation against the trustee. If he is a debtor to the trust, it is only because the truster had lent him money. I am not prepared to assent to the proposition that where a difficulty arises in administration through two trustees having interests adverse to the trust we are therefore to supersede the administrators. I am not satisfied that they are entitled to call on their colleagues to take that course.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

1st Division. Sheriff of Chancery.

By his trust-disposition and settlement, dated 18th April 1826, Peter Paul, grocer in Greenock, conveyed to trustees his whole estate, heritable and moveable, which should belong to him at the time of his death, directing them, inter alia, to dispone, convey, and make over his said estate (subject to a liferent in favour of his wife) to his children therein named, and nascituri, in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and to their children in fee, in terms substantially repeated in the conveyance after mentioned. Peter Paul died in 1832, predeceased by his wife. On 3d December 1847 John Walker, sole surviving trustee and executor of Peter Paul, executed a disposition in implement of the said trust-disposition and settlement which contained the following clause:—"In the second place, I do hereby give, grant, assign, dispone, convey, and make over to and in favour of the said Mary Paul, Andrew Paul, Janet Paul, Jean Paul, Peter Paul, Catherine Paul, and William Paul, the only surviving children of the said Peter Paul, equally among them in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly," &c., "and the share of each liferenter to the children to be lawfully procreated or already procreated of his or her body, equally among them, males and females, in fee."

Mrs Janet Paul or Macdougall, one of the disponees named in the above disposition, died in 1890, predeceased by her eldest son, Dugald Macdougall, who left two children, Dugald Græme Macdougall and Mrs Laidlaw. Mrs Macdougall was survived by four younger children, Mrs Corney, Mrs Williams, Mrs Paterson, and James Macdougall.

In January 1900 the two grandchildren and the four children of Mrs Macdougall presented a petition to the Sheriff of Chancery for service as "nearest and lawful heirs of provision in general to the said Mrs Janet Paul or Macdougall, under and by virtue of said trust-disposition and settlement and disposition."

Mrs Macdougall had taken infeftment under the disposition in liferent only.

The Sheriff of Chancery (Chisholm), on 14th February 1900, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the deceased Mrs Janet Paul or Macdougall died at Caulfield, Melbourne, in the colony of Victoria, on the 16th day of January 1890, and had at the time of her death her ordinary or principal domicile furth of Scotland: Finds that the petitioners Dugald Græme Macdougall and Mrs Marion Macdougall or Laidlaw are children of the deceased Dugald Macdougall: Finds that he was the eldest son of the said Mrs Janet Paul or Macdougall; and further, finds that the said Dugald Macdougall has left no other children or issue of children now surviving: Finds that the petitioners Mrs Catherine Johnstone Macdougall or Corney, Mrs Margaret Macdougall or Williams, Mrs Ann Jane Macdougall or Paterson, and James Macdougall, are all children of the said Mrs Janet Paul or Macdougall: Finds that she has no other children or issue of children now surviving other than as above mentioned: Finds that under the destination in the disposition founded on the said Mrs Janet Paul or Macdougall was only a liferenter for her liferent use allenarly, and that there is nothing in her hæreditas jacens which requires to be taken out of it by a service: Finds further that the petitioners are not heirs of provision to her under and by virtue of the trust-disposition and settlement and the said disposition, both mentioned in the petition; therefore refuses the prayer of the petition, and decerns." *

* "Note.—In this case I am of opinion, on the authority of the case of

No. 22.

Nov. 15, 1900. Macdougall.

The petitioners appealed to the First Division.

Argued for the petitioners;—The Sheriff had decided that the children of Janet were disponees, and therefore not entitled to service. Apart from Maule's case (referred to by the Sheriff) there had been a practice of using service for the purpose merely of establishing propinquity in cases of children nascituri. The objection to a declarator for that purpose in this Court was that it was impossible to get contradictors. The Court of Chancery was the only Court where such a proof could be obtained. The petitioners only desired declaratory service as heirs of provision. They did not maintain that service was necessary to take up the right, but that it was necessary to declare it. The mother was only infeft in liferent, and therefore the feudal fee was in the disponer, so that the appropriate service was general service. The practice was supported by the authority of conveyancers and by decisions.[1] The cases of Carleton and Peacock shewed that service had been used as a means of preserving evidence of a fact. In Peacock the only use of the service was to establish the extrinsic fact that the heirs of the body had failed and the right of the conditional institute emerged. The Sheriff had judged of this question by too narrow a test, viz., that of logical consistency with the theoretical principles of conveyancing.

LORD M'LAREN.—This appeal has been brought from the Sheriff of Chancery to determine whether the appellants, who are in the position of beneficial fiars, are entitled to be served heirs of provision in general to their mother, who is designed in the deed as a liferenter for her liferent use allenarly. There is no doubt, at this period of the history of the law, as to what is the meaning of such a destination. It vests in the mother a fiduciary fee for her children unborn and unnamed, and gives her a beneficial interest in the income only. The mother having died, the fiars now desire to make up a heritable title to the property. If they cannot make up a title by service it is not easy to see how they can make up a marketable title.

The question is, whether as a general deduction from the theory of such destinations, or as a consequence of a practice continued for such a length of time as to have the force of law, these children are entitled to be served heirs of provision to their mother.

The difficulty which presented itself to the Sheriff of Chancery was this: that as the mother took only a liferent title in the estate, there was no fee in her hereditas to be taken up by her heirs. The view of the Sheriff is Maule (3 R. 831), that the service craved is not competent. The petitioners claim service as heirs of provision under two deeds: (1) a trust-deed, in which there is no conveyance, but merely a direction to convey to the person to whom they are claiming to be served heirs of provision, viz., Mrs Janet Paul or Macdougall; and (2) a disposition in implement of the direction of the trust-deed. By these writs the said Mrs Janet Paul or Macdougall has only a liferent for her liferent use allenarly, and there is a destination over to her children. In these circumstances I do not think that the petitioners are heirs of provision under the deeds."

that the children are direct disponees under the settlement, and that they ought to be infeft by a notary on the disposition. I am not sure whether the Sheriff had fully considered that, although the beneficiary right of the mother under the deed is limited to a liferent use, yet she had a nominal fee in contemplation of law which might, if supported by practice, be used as the basis of a general service. I do not think that there was any substantial right such as could be taken up by special service, but there was at least a nominal fee in the mother, and this, it is said, entitles her children to be served heirs in general to her, to the effect of having their propinquity ascertained and their characters as heirs determined. Much might be said for and against the competency of this procedure if the point were open; but it is known to the profession that for a very long time it has been the practice to serve children heirs of provision to their parents under destinations such as the present. The cases of Dundas[1] and Peacock[2] are very direct authorities for this procedure. I have reason to know that this procedure has been largely followed, because when I held the position of Sheriff of Chancery I had to inquire into the practice.

The Sheriff is under a misapprehension in thinking that the case of Maule,[3] to which he refers, is an authority inconsistent with the practice of making up a title by what has been called a declaratory service. The question in that case was not one of title, but of substantial right, and the observations of the Lord President must be taken with reference to a case of that character, and by way of illustration of the nature of the destination.

I do not doubt that it might be possible by a declaratory action to have it established that these fiars are entitled to be infeft, but that would be an unusual mode, and not satisfactory to a purchaser. The decree in such an action would not usually proceed on evidence, though I do not say that an ex parte proof would not be competent. Lord President Inglis gave great attention to feudal questions, and was certainly not less conversant with this than with other branches of the law, of which he was so eminent an exponent. If his Lordship had intended to discountenance the practice, I should have expected that he would have made a more direct pronouncement on the subject. I do not think that the question was in his Lordship's mind, nor did it enter into the decision of the case.

I think that the petitioners, provided their propinquity is proved, which in this case is merely a formal matter, are entitled to decree of service.

LORD ADAM.—I agree. My understanding certainly is that it has been the practice to make up titles in this way.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordships. If this had been the first application for the service of children as heirs of provision to a fiduciary fiar there might have been much to be said against it. But the strongest thing would have been that there was no practice to support it. This is a matter in which practice is everything. But there is no doubt about the practice, and it is therefore unnecessary to consider the logical difficulty which embarrassed the Sheriff in reconciling that practice with certain technicalities of the law of inheritance. No. 22.

THE COUNTY COUNCIL OF THE COUNTY OF LANARK, Defenders (Respondents).—Johnston, Q.C.—Cook. No. 23.

Nov. 20, 1900. Glasgow Court Houses Commissioners v. Lanarkshire County Council.

Statute—Construction—Glasgow Court Houses Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. lviii.), sec. 13.—For the purpose of providing and maintaining Sheriff Court Houses, the county of Lanark is divided into four separate districts, one of which, the Lower Ward District, comprises the Lower Ward of the county, the city of Glasgow, and the burgh of Rutherglen. The Sheriff Court Houses of Glasgow are the Sheriff Court Houses of this district alone.

By sec. 13 of the Glasgow Court Houses Act, 1890, the Court House Commissioners were empowered to apportion, assess, and charge sums of money borrowed by them under the Act upon three public bodies, the Corporation of Glasgow, the County Council of the county of Lanark, and the Magistrates of Rutherglen, "in proportion to the gross valuation for the year ending on the 15th May 1890 of the lands and heritages situated within the respective areas under the jurisdiction of such public bodies."

By sec. 15 it was provided that the County Council of Lanark "as representing the Lower Ward thereof" should pay to the Glasgow Court Houses Commissioners the sum chargeable against the County Council.

In an action by the Commissioners against the County Council of Lanark for £7669 as their proportion of the sum chargeable under the Act against the three bodies, the sum sued for being arrived at by taking the gross valuation of all lands and heritages within the county as the area within the jurisdiction of the County Council, the defenders maintained that the valuation should have been limited to the Lower Ward of the county, which was alone liable for the assessment.

The Lord Ordinary (Low) held that, having regard to the facts that the power of assessing was limited to the Lower Ward, and that the other parts of the county had no interest in the Glasgow Court Houses, the words in sec. 13, "the respective areas under the jurisdiction of such public bodies," were capable of being read as referring only to areas which are under their jurisdiction for purposes connected with the Glasgow Court Houses, and fell to be so read.

The pursuers having reclaimed, held (rev. the judgment of Lord Low) that the terms of sec. 13 were unambiguous, and not capable of construction; and that the "area under the jurisdiction of" the County Council referred to in the section was the whole county.

Held further (aff. judgment of Lord Low) that, while the valuation for the year ending 15th May 1890 was to be taken as fixing the value of the subjects in the different areas, the Commissioners were to take the respective areas of jurisdiction of the three public bodies as these actually existed at the date of apportioning the assessment.

THIS was an action at the instance of the Glasgow Court Houses Commissioners, incorporated under the Glasgow Court Houses Amendment Act, 1872, against the County Council of the county of Lanark, and also against the Corporation of the city of Glasgow, and the Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the royal burgh of Rutherglen for any interest they might have, to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £7669 sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of £5 per centum per annum from 16th December 1899 till payment.

The sum sued for was the proportion of money borrowed by the pursuers under the Glasgow Court Houses Act, 1890, which, by resolution dated 24th November 1899, they had charged upon the County Council of Lanark in virtue of the powers conferred on them by sec. 13 of the Act. The County Council alone defended.

The following narrative of the facts and of the contention of parties is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Low):—

"By the Glasgow Court Houses Act, 1890, the pursuers were authorised to acquire certain lands and buildings for the purpose of enlarging and improving the Sheriff and Justice of Peace Court Houses in the city of Glasgow. For the purposes of the Act the pursuers were authorised to borrow, upon the security of the assessments to be levied by them under the provisions of the Act, a sum not exceeding £100,000.

"By the 13th section of the Act it is provided: 'The Commissioners may apportion, assess, and charge the sums of money from time to time borrowed and outstanding under the powers of this Act, and all interest due thereon, upon the several public bodies mentioned in the schedule to this Act annexed, in proportion to the gross valuation for the year ending on the 15th day of May 1890, of all the lands and heritages situated within the respective areas under the jurisdiction of such public bodies.'

"The public bodies mentioned in the schedule are the Magistrates of Glasgow, the County Council of the county of Lanark (the only defenders who have lodged defences), and the Magistrates of Rutherglen.

"The pursuers now sue the defenders for payment of £7669, which they allege to be the proportion of money borrowed under the Act which has been charged upon and is payable by the defenders in terms of the 13th section.

"The sum sued for has been arrived at by taking the gross valuation for the year 1890 of all lands and heritages within the whole county of Lanark, and by including as within the county a certain area (the valuation of which for the year 1890 was £354,859) which in 1891 was taken out of the Lower Ward of the county and added to the city of Glasgow.

"The defenders maintain (1) that in fixing the amount of the borrowed money which they are to contribute the pursuers are not entitled to take into account the valuation of the county of Lanark as a whole, but only of the Lower Ward; and (2) that it is not competent for the pursuers to treat lands which are, in fact, in the city of Glasgow, as forming part of the county. No. 23.

Nov. 20, 1900. Glasgow Court Houses Commissioners v. Lanarkshire County Council.

"For the purpose of providing and maintaining Sheriff Court Houses, the county of Lanark is divided into four separate districts, one of which, the Lower Ward District, comprises the Lower Ward of the county, the city of Glasgow, and the burgh of Rutherglen. The remaining wards of the county are in other districts, and have nothing to do with the Glasgow Sheriff Court Houses. Further, the defenders maintain that the whole of the sum charged upon them under the 15th section of the Act of 1890 falls to be paid by assessment upon the Lower Ward alone.

"In these circumstances, the defenders' contention is that the words in the 13th section 'lands and heritages situated within the respective areas under the jurisdiction of such public bodies,' refer, so far as the defenders are concerned, only to the Lower Ward.

"The pursuers, on the other hand, maintain that the 13th section is not open to construction, and that, as the jurisdiction of the defenders undoubtedly extends over the whole county of Lanark, the valuation of the whole county must be taken in fixing the proportion of the borrowed money to be paid by them."

On 15th June 1900 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers, in ascertaining the amount for which they are authorised to charge and assess the defenders, the County Council of the county of Lanark, in terms of the 13th section of the Glasgow Court Houses Act, 1890, are not entitled to take into account the valuation for the year ending on the 15th day of May 1890 of the lands and heritages within the whole county of Lanark, but only within the Lower Ward thereof; and further, that the pursuers are bound to deduct from the said valuation of the Lower Ward, and to add to that of the city of Glasgow, the valuation of those parts of the Lower Ward taken from the county and annexed to the city by the City of Glasgow Acts, 1891 and 1896; with these findings, appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure, and grants leave to reclaim."*

* "OPINION.—. . . Now, I agree with the pursuers to this extent, that, prima facie, the area over which the County Council has jurisdiction is the whole county. But I think that the words used in the 13th section are capable of construction, and that the context and the subject-matter of the enactment may shew that they were intended to be used in a more restricted sense than that which they would naturally bear if standing alone.

"The 13th section, in the first place, and in the part under construction, only provides how the proportions of money borrowed by the pursuers, payable by the three public bodies named, are to be ascertained, and it is then enacted that 'such public bodies shall be bound as quickly as possible to pay to the commissioners any such sums so apportioned.' Now, of course, a county council is only a representative body, and I think that the presumption is that the capacity in which it is directed to pay the money is also the capacity in which it is referred to for the purpose of fixing the proportion which it is to pay. If therefore the defenders are given power to assess the whole county for the Glasgow Sheriff Courts, there is no difficulty. But if the defenders' power of assessment is limited to the Lower Ward, it is difficult to see any principle upon which the amount which they have to pay, in a question with the city of Glasgow and the burgh of Rutherglen, should be fixed by reference to the valuation, not of

The pursuers reclaimed.

The arguments are sufficiently set forth in the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and of the Court.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The first question in this case is whether the 13th clause of the Glasgow Court Houses Act of 1890 is to be read according to the plain meaning of the words to be found in it, or whether they are open to construction, and must be read in the different sense. By a series of statutes provision was made for Court Houses for the different Courts of law which held their sittings in Glasgow, and the taxation necessary for providing the funds to be expended were, as regards the landward part of the county of Lanark, put on the Lower Ward of that county. In many clauses this is expressed in distinct terms. And even in this statute of 1890, in the 15th section, special matters relating to assessment on the Lower Ward are dealt with, where an alteration is being made upon the assessment in connection with some of the previous Acts. These clauses in the Lower Ward, but of the whole county. It was said that the buildings which the pursuers are authorised by the Act to erect are to be used as an Appeal Court for the county as a whole. That would have been a very good reason for making the whole county contribute, but I do not think that it is any reason why the Lower Ward should contribute more than its proportion.

"The main question therefore seems to me to be, whether the defenders have power to raise money to pay the amount charged against them under the 13th section except by assessments laid upon the Lower Ward only?

"The assessing clauses of the Act of 1890 are the 10th and the 15th, but in order to understand the effect of these sections it is necessary to go back to earlier statutes.

"The Glasgow Court Houses Amendment Act, 1868, proceeded upon the narrative that 'it would be for the advantage and convenience of the said city' (of Glasgow), 'and of the Lower Ward of the county of Lanark' (including the burgh of Rutherglen) 'that additional accommodation should be provided for the Judges attending the Justiciary Courts at Glasgow, and for the Sheriffs, Justices of Peace, Magistrates, and Council, and inhabitants of the said county and city.' The commissioners were therefore empowered to acquire lands and to erect Court Houses, and for defraying the expense of doing so they were by section 10 authorised 'to levy and raise by assessment annually for such period as they may find to be necessary, on and from all heritages situate within the parliamentary and municipal boundaries of the city of Glasgow, and within the Lower Ward of the county of Lanark, including the burgh of Rutherglen, such sums of money as shall be sufficient for the several purposes before mentioned.'

"The buildings authorised by the Act of 1868 were duly constructed, and in 1878 certain arrangements had been made between the commissioners and the city of Glasgow and the Lower Ward, the result of which was that (to use the words of the preamble of an Act which was passed in the latter year for the purpose, inter alia, of giving effect to these arrangements) 'the only amount which the Court House Commissioners will require to levy under the Court Houses Acts will be the amount necessary to defray the expenses of maintaining that portion of the said buildings occupied by the Justices of Peace Court and the buildings occupied by the Justiciary Court.'

"Accordingly by the 6th section of the Glasgow Municipal Buildings Act, 1878, it was provided: 'On the passing of this Act the power of the Court Houses Commissioners to levy assessments under section 10 of the former Acts and in this Act are made the ground for the contention that section 13 must not be read according to its literal meaning, but must be read as if there were words in it which would restrict the assessment to the same area as that to which it is restricted under the other statutes relating to the Court Houses of Glasgow. But the formidable difficulty of doing so is to be found in the very contrast between this clause and those occurring elsewhere which relate to similar matters. This clause says in so many words—(His Lordship read the section)—and the public body mentioned in the schedule is the "County Council of the county of Lanark." These words seem to me to be distinct and unambiguous, and in such sharp and marked contrast to the other assessing enactments in the statutes preceding, that it is impossible to find sufficient ground for putting any gloss upon them not consistent with their direct meaning. It is impossible for the Court to gather what the Legislature intended except from the language used, and the language used being so specific, I feel myself unable to hold that it can be made to mean something different because of likelihood sug-

Glasgow Court Houses Amendment Act, 1868, shall cease and determine, and in lieu thereof the Court House Commissioners are hereby authorised to estimate, apportion, assess, and charge, in manner after mentioned, the amount necessary to meet the cost, charges, and expenses of conducting the business of the Court Houses Commissioners, and of maintaining and repairing the buildings apportioned to, and occupied by, the Sheriff Courts, Justices of Peace, Justiciary Court, and their several officials, and generally in carrying into effect the purposes of the Court Houses Acts, as amended by this Act, so far as such costs, charges, and expenses shall not be borne by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury.

"By the 7th section it was provided that in lieu of an assessment under the 10th section of the Act of 1868 being levied by the commissioners within the city of Glasgow, the Corporation should pay to the commissioners year by year, 'out of the assessment by this Act authorised,' such sum as the commissioners should apportion as the share payable by the Corporation.

"The powers of assessment by the Corporation there referred to are to be found in section 29 and subsequent sections of the Act.

"By the 8th section it was provided that, in lieu of an assessment under the 10th section of the Act of 1868 being levied by the commissioners within the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire, the public bodies having powers of assessment within that ward should pay to the commissioners the sum apportioned as the share of the Lower Ward out of certain specified assessments.

"By the Act of 1878, therefore, this change was made in the mode of assessment, that instead of the Glasgow Court Houses Commissioners themselves laying on assessments directly, they merely fixed the amounts payable by the city and the county respectively, and the assessments necessary for raising the money were laid on by the local authorities.

"Coming now to the Act of 1890, it was provided by section 10 that the cost, charges, and expenses of purchasing lands and buildings, and of reconstructing and improving buildings, and the like, 'under the authority of the Act, shall be deemed and held to form part of the costs, charges, and expenses mentioned in section 6 of the Act of 1878, and the power of assessment by that Act conferred upon the commissioners shall apply to and include all such costs, charges, and expenses.

"The pursuers argued that that section had nothing to do with money borrowed under the powers conferred by the Act, but only applied, like the gested from the correlation in which it is found. I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be altered in so far as relates to the first question.

In regard to the second question, which is the question whether in apportioning the assessment the pursuers are bound to deduct from the valuation of the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire, and to add it to that of the city of Glasgow, the valuation relating to the lands and heritages of the Lower Ward which have been annexed to the city, I am of the same opinion as the Lord Ordinary, that they are bound to do so, and upon the same grounds.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur.

LORD TRAYNER.—There are three public bodies liable to the pursuers in the assessment in question, who may be briefly designed as (1) the Corporation of Glasgow, (2) the Corporation of Rutherglen, and (3) the County Council of Lanark. The last-named body alone defends this action, and it contends that the proportion of the assessment for which it is liable is only provision in the Act of 1878, to annual expenses. I cannot take that view. The section applies to the cost of the purchase of lands and other capital expenditure, and the power of assessment is given to enable the pursuers to raise the amount necessary to meet such costs. It seems to me that the assessments authorised in this section are the very assessments upon the security of which the pursuers are authorised to borrow money for the purposes of the Act.

"The 15th section of the Act comes in place of the 8th section of the Act of 1878, and provides that the County Council of Lanark (the defenders) 'as representing the Lower Ward thereof and the police burghs therein,' and the Magistrates and Town-Council of Rutherglen, shall pay to the pursuers, out of certain specified assessments, 'such sums as the commissioners shall estimate, apportion, assess, and charge as the shares payable respectively by the said County Council and Magistrates of the royal burgh of Rutherglen, for the costs, charges, and expenses of carrying into effect the Court Houses Acts and this Act and the Act of 1878, so far as applicable to the commissioners.'

"No provision is made in the Act of 1890 for the way in which any sum apportioned by the pursuers to the city of Glasgow is to be raised by the Corporation, and I imagine that the provisions of the 7th section of the Act of 1878 are still applicable to them.

"I therefore think that it is plain that whatever sum is apportioned to the defenders under the 13th section must be raised by them by assessment upon the Lower Ward alone, and accordingly I am of opinion that the construction of that section for which the defenders contend must be adopted. As I have already indicated, it seems to me that the words 'the respective areas under the jurisdiction of such public bodies,' are capable of being read as referring only to areas which are under their jurisdiction for purposes connected with the Glasgow Court Houses, with which alone the Act deals. I quite recognise that the fact that in the schedule the County Council are named without any words of limitation, whereas in the 15th section they are described 'as representing the Lower Ward,' is a point in favour of the pursuers' view, but I do not think that that is a sufficient ground for holding that the words in the 13th section are not open to construction, or for putting a different construction upon them than that which would otherwise fall to be adopted.

"The next question is whether the pursuers, in allocating the borrowed money among the three public bodies, are justified in calculating the amount that proportion which effeirs to the valuation of lands and heritages in the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire, instead of the lands and heritages in the whole county. The Lord Ordinary has sustained this contention on what he holds to be the proper construction of the 13th section of the Glasgow Court Houses Act of 1890. In reaching this construction his Lordship has taken into account the provisions in several Acts of Parliament of earlier date, in which the assessment (the same or equivalent assessment to that now sued for) has been imposed upon the lands in the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire alone. I should regard what the Lord Ordinary has done as legitimate if it could be said that the 13th section of the Act of 1890 was open to construction. But if that section is plain and unambiguous, then it must have effect according to its plain meaning irrespective of anything to be found in previous Acts. Now, I am of opinion that the section before us is not open to construction, and that the view which the Lord Ordinary has taken is unsound. The section provides that the assessment is to be imposed on the three public bodies I have already designed "in proportion to the gross payable by the defenders upon the basis of the valuation of the Lower Ward as it stood in 1890, and before a large part of its area was added to the city of Glasgow.

Nov. 20, 1900. Glasgow Court Houses Commissioners v. Lanarkshire County Council.

"The last clause in the 10th section of the Act of 1890 appears to me to have a direct bearing upon that question. It is in these terms:—'Provided that such powers of assessment shall be held to apply to the whole area included within the municipal boundaries of the city and royal burgh of Glasgow, as the same may extend under any Act of Parliament, including any portion of the county of Renfrew over which such area may extend.'

"Now, if I am right in the construction which I have already put upon the assessing sections, the words 'powers of assessment' in that clause simply mean the power which the pursuers have of fixing the amount which the Corporation must raise by assessment, and that is just what the pursuers are empowered to do in regard to borrowed money by the 13th section. The clause therefore seems to me to amount to this, that in allocating the sum for which the Corporation are to assess, the pursuers are to have regard to the whole area which is in fact included within the city of Glasgow at the time when the assessment or allocation is made.

"And that view appears to me to be quite consistent with the 13th section. The main object of that section is to fix the proportions in which money borrowed under the authority of the Act shall be paid by the three public bodies named. The words are, 'in proportion to the gross valuation for the year ending on the 15th day of May, one thousand eight hundred and ninety, of the lands and heritages situated within the respective areas under the jurisdiction of such public bodies.' Now, it is clear that the value of the assessable subjects within the three areas is to be taken from the Valuation-roll of 1890 alone, but I do not think that it follows that the extent of the respective areas is also to be taken in all time coming as that which existed when the roll of 1890 was made up. The words used are no doubt capable of bearing that meaning, but I also think that they are capable of meaning that the value as given by the roll of 1890 shall be applied to the areas which at the time when the allocation is made are in fact under the jurisdiction of the respective public bodies. And it seems to me that there is a sufficient reason for adopting the latter construction. What the commissioners are empowered to assess and charge upon the three public bodies are the sums of money 'from time to time' borrowed and outstanding. The Act therefore contemplated that the pursuers might valuation for the year ending 15th May 1890 of the lands and heritages situated within the respective areas under the jurisdiction of such public bodies." There are two things here provided for which are fixed and unchangeable, namely, the three bodies who are to pay the assessment, and the standard by which the amount of the total assessment is to be ascertained. This is clear enough. But it appears to me equally clear and fixed what it is that each is to pay as its proportion, for that is to be estimated on the given valuation of the "lands and heritages situated within the respective areas under the jurisdiction of such public bodies." Jurisdiction is not perhaps the most correct word to use in the circumstances, as the County Council of Lanark has and can exercise no jurisdiction proper in the county. But the meaning of the phrase is clear enough. It is the area over and in which the County Council exercises the power and performs the duties which the Legislature has conferred or imposed upon it. That area is the whole county of Lanark, and therefore it appears to me that the necessary meaning of the statutory provision is that the County Council of Lanark shall pay the assessment in question in the proportion which the valuation (as at the given date) of the lands and heritages in the county of Lanark bears to the valuation of the lands and heritages in the city of Glasgow and burgh of Rutherglen.

There is nothing in the clause before us which limits the proportion which the defenders have to pay to the value of the lands and heritages in the Lower Ward alone, and nothing to suggest such a limitation, and it rather appears to me that the correct inference to be drawn from the difference between the terms of the Act of 1890 and previous Acts is, that in 1890 it was not intended to distinguish between one part of Lanarkshire and another, otherwise the terms of the earlier Acts would have been repeated. The terms of section 15 of the Act of 1890 lends some support to this view, for the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire is there dealt with (as distinguished from the whole county) in such a way as to suggest at least that the two things were present to the mind of the Legislature or those who framed the Act.

But while it is fixed once for all who are to pay the assessment, and what is to be the standard of valuation according to which the respective proportions are to be estimated, I think one of the features necessary for ascertaining the amount of each party's contribution is not so fixed. The area under exercise their borrowing powers gradually, and might charge and assess upon the public bodies one sum one year and another sum another year. Now, if the pursuers are bound to assess the Corporation of Glasgow and the defenders according to the respective areas of the city of Glasgow and the Lower Ward as appearing in the Valuation-roll of 1890, although since that roll was made up these areas have been entirely changed, it is plain that the proportions fixed by the 13th section will be entirely overturned. I am therefore of opinion that the duty of the pursuers is to apportion the sum to be assessed according to the areas actually included within the city of Glasgow and the Lower Ward respectively, but upon the basis of the value of the lands and heritages within these areas as given in the Valuation-roll of 1890. Such an apportionment seems to me to satisfy the language of the 13th section, and to maintain the proportions thereby directed.

"I am therefore of opinion that upon both the questions raised in the case the defenders are entitled to prevail."

No. 23.

Nov. 20, 1900. Glasgow Court Houses Commissioners v. Lanarkshire County Council.

the jurisdiction of each of the parties may change, and in fact has changed. While the standard is the valuation of May 1890, it has to be applied to the actual state of facts at the time the assessment is made. Accordingly I am of opinion that the three bodies are liable in that proportion of the assessment which effeirs to the lands and heritages under their jurisdiction respectively when the assessment is made, and that if any lands (for example) have been taken out of the county of Lanark and included within the city of Glasgow, the assessment in respect of the value of such lands must be borne by the city and not by the county. The result is that the County Council of Lanark must pay the assessment in respect of the value of all lands within the county of Lanark at the date of the assessment, except, of course, such lands as are included in the city of Glasgow and burgh of Rutherglen.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree in the second finding of the Lord Ordinary, but differ as to the first. The language of the 13th section of the Glasgow Court Houses Act, 1890, differs in such a marked way from that of the previous statutes and other clauses of the Act of 1890 to which the Lord Ordinary refers that I am forced to conclude that the difference is intentional. The clause which we have to construe occurs in a group of clauses—11, 12, and 13—which deal with power to borrow money on security of assessments; and the 13th section deals with the apportionment of such assessments. As regards the County Council of the county of Lanark, the question is whether the area under its jurisdiction which is to be subjected to assessment is the whole county or only the Lower Ward. The Lord Ordinary has held that, while prima facie the clause extends to the whole county, the words may be so construed as to confine them to the Lower Ward. Though not without difficulty, I have come to the conclusion that they cannot, for the reason which I have already stated. The clause as it stands it is not merely unambiguous, but in sharp contrast with previous enactments by which burdens in connection with the Glasgow Court Houses were thrown on the Lower Ward alone, and also with clauses which follow in the same statute which shew that when it is intended to confine an assessment to the Lower Ward of the county this is expressly stated. I refer in particular to the 15th section and to the 19th of the Act of 1890.

As to the Lord Ordinary's second finding, I agree with him on the grounds which he states, that the pursuers are bound to deduct from the valuation of the county the valuation of those parts of the Lower Ward which were taken from the county and annexed by the City of Glasgow Acts, 1891 and 1896.

THE following was the interlocutor of the Court:—"Recall the said interlocutor reclaimed against: Find that the pursuers, in ascertaining the amount for which they are authorised to charge and assess the defenders the County Council of the county of Lanark, in terms of the 13th section of the Glasgow Court Houses Act, 1890, are bound to take into account the valuation for the year ending on the 15th day of May 1890 of the lands and heritages within the whole county of Lanark; and further that the pursuers are bound to deduct from the said valuation, and to add to that of the city of Glasgow, the valuation of those parts of the said county annexed to the city by the City of Glasgow Acts, 1891 and 1896: Remit the cause to the said Lord Ordinary to proceed therein."

Contract—Essential Error—Mutual Error—Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37).—An employer tendered £2, 7s. 4d. to D, a workman, who had been injured in his employment, as in full satisfaction of any claim he might have against him, stating, as was the fact, that he had obtained a report from a surgeon that D would be fit to return to his work in six weeks from the date of the accident. D accepted the money, and granted a discharge in full. The medical opinion on which both parties relied proved to be mistaken, for D was not able for work for more than six months from the date of the accident.

Held (diss. Lord Young) that the above facts were not sufficient to shew that the parties, in entering into the agreement for settlement of the workman's claim, were under essential error to the effect of rendering the discharge null and void.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, John Dornan, labourer, Glasgow, sought decree against James Allan senior & Son, ironfounders, Glasgow, for 12s. 6d. weekly, beginning the first payment on 12th September 1899, and continuing until the future orders of the Court.

The Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie), awarded compensation, and on the crave of James Allan senior & Son, stated the following case:—

"Parties were heard before me, of this date (16th March 1900), when the following facts were admitted or proved:—

"1. That the respondent was hurt in the course of his employment in the appellants' works in Possil Road, Glasgow, on 29th August 1899, and that notice of the injury was given on 15th September.

"2. That the respondent signed the receipt and discharge (No. 3/1 of process) on 27th September 1899.*

"3. That the appellants' foreman, John M'Cusker, on that day called for respondent, as he was in the habit of doing, and presented to respondent the said receipt and discharge, and asked him to sign it, in return for a payment of £2, 7s. 4d., being equivalent to four weeks' compensation under the Act, telling him that Dr Mechan, surgeon of the Employers' Association, had reported that he would be fit for work in six weeks from the date of the accident, that is to say, in about a fortnight from the date of the conversation.

"I, John Dornan, 337 Garscube Road, Glasgow, do hereby acknowledge receipt of the sum of two pounds seven shillings and fourpence paid to me by Messrs James Allan senior & Son, ironfounders, Glasgow, in full satisfaction and discharge of any claim competent to me in consequence of personal injury sustained by me on or about 29th August 1899 in the course of my employment with the said firm."

"4. That the respondent did not, before signing the document, consult the surgeon (Dr Gunn) who attended at least once a week, as surgeon of the friendly society to which he (the respondent) belonged.

"5. That the respondent read over the document and signed it, and received the money.

"6. That Dr Mechan did report to the appellants as stated by M'Cusker to the respondent.

"7. That it was not alleged or proved that any other representation inducing the respondent to sign the discharge was made by M'Cusker.

"8. That Dr Mechan's report was erroneous, and the respondent was unfit for his usual work till 6th March 1900, a period four times as long as was indicated by Dr Mechan's report.

"9. That both parties in entering into the agreement for the discharge relied on Dr Mechan's report.

"10. That notice of 15th September was given to the appellants in due time, and that in any event the appellants in the circumstances suffered no detriment by delay.

"11. That the respondent's average wages in the appellants' employ were 23s. 8d. a week.

"I found in law that the discharge could not be set aside on the ground of error, induced by misrepresentation of the appellants, but that both parties relied on Dr Mechan's report, and were under essential error, and that the discharge was void and null.

"I accordingly awarded compensation to the respondent at the rate of 11s. 10d. a week from Tuesday 12th September till Tuesday 6th March last, less £2, 7s. 4d. paid to account, and found him also entitled to expenses.

"The following is the question of law which the appellants submit for the decision of the Court:—Whether, in entering into the agreement for the settlement of respondent's claim for compensation, the facts and circumstances are sufficient to shew that the parties were under essential error, to the effect of rendering the discharge in question null and void?"

Argued for the appellants;—The Sheriff's first conclusion in law was sufficient to determine the case against his view. There was here no such error as would make the discharge void. The question was as to whether an honest bargain for settlement could be entered into before it was known how long the effect of the injuries would last. The duration of the effect of the injuries was ascertained as far as possible by the opinion of a reliable man, and a settlement was entered into, both parties accepting that opinion. The error into which the respondent fell was thus not induced by the appellants; neither was there any misrepresentation or concealment. There was no difference between this case and a proposed sale and purchase of stocks relying on the opinion of a stockbroker which turned out to be erroneous; nobody could say that such a contract could be set aside on such a ground, even assuming that the opinion—though bona fide —had not been the result of sufficiently careful investigation. Where parties were agreed as to what was the contract they had entered into, it could not be set aside merely because it turned out to have been based on an erroneous calculation, even though both parties had erred in the calculation. To set such a contract aside it would be necessary to have in the bargain that it was to subsist only if the calculation was correct. Error to set aside a contract must (1) be error as to existing facts, and not as to expectations of the future, and (2) it must have been induced by misrepresentation of the party founding on the contract.[1] In the passage from Lord Watson's opinion in the case of Menzies[1] relied on by the respondent, the word "representation" was obviously used in the sense of "misrepresentation." Here there was no misrepresentation, but a representation which the Sheriff has found to be true. In the absence of misrepresentation there were no grounds for saying that the contract could be set aside merely because it was founded on mutual error. Such a case might arise when there was no consensus in idem as to the subject-matter of the contract, or where, there being such consensus, the subject-matter of the contract did not in point of fact exist, or was in reality different from what the contracting parties thought it was.[2] As to the other contentions of the respondent, besides being unsound in themselves, they were not raised before the Sheriff, and could not be raised now. The Court could decide only the question decided by the Sheriff, and the case could not be sent back to him[3] to state any new question.

Nov. 22, 1900. Dornan v. Allan & Son.

Argued for the respondent;—There was here no element of compromise by taking a sum down in place of a larger possible sum, which distinguished this from such cases as Wood.[1] The Sheriff's finding, which was one of fact, and conclusive against the appellants, was that the parties relied, not on the opinion of the surgeon, but on his report. They contracted with reference to the positive statement of the surgeon that the man would be better in three weeks. It was a contract based upon a payment for four weeks, and a recovery from the accident in six weeks, and there was no contemplation by either party of a risk that the time might be longer or shorter. The absence of this element of risk distinguished this case from one of buying or selling stocks. This was a discharge for a specified claim, and could not be founded on to defeat emerging claims not in the contemplation of either party at the time of the discharge, and it was immaterial whether in such a case the mutual error was induced by one of the parties or not.[4] Misrepresentation was not necessary to essential error in order to void a contract; whenever two parties entered into a contract on a mistaken assumption—which might be induced, not by misrepresentations but by innocent representations—but for which they would have declined to contract, there was essential error.[5] Further, the Sheriff, who could deal only with questions under the Act, was not entitled to take the discharge into account, in respect that it amounted to an assignation to the employer of the workman's right to weekly payments, which was incompetent by section (14) of the First Schedule to the Act; and also because it was a settlement for a lump sum, which was competent only after payments had continued for not less than six months, in respect of section (13) of the same schedule—if such a settlement took place before the lapse of six months, it was not final, but could only be imputed to what the Sheriff, irrespective of it, might hold to be the proper weekly payments.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question in this case put by the Sheriff is—(Reads). I am of opinion that the question must be answered in the negative. The essential error is said to have been that the parties in settling the claim of the pursuer against the defenders proceeded upon the opinion of a doctor who thought that the pursuer would be free from total disablement in three weeks, whereas in the event he was disabled for a much longer time. It is not the fact that by any act of the defenders, or of any person acting for them, any misrepresentation was made to the pursuer. The Sheriff's findings entirely negative any such idea. What was represented to him was true, viz., that the doctor was of a certain opinion. I cannot hold that, where a doctor gives an opinion, on which parties act in compromising a case for a certain sum, the fact that his opinion proves to be erroneous entitles a party to set aside the settlement made on the ground of essential error. I am unable to see any distinction between this case and the case of Wood,[1] in which it was decided in the House of Lords that if a party compromised a case and took a sum of money as compensation for a bodily injury, acting on medical opinion given at the time, the injured party could not get over the settlement, and obtain a judgment for a larger sum, because it proved that his recovery did not take place for a considerable time, and his actual loss from the accident proved to be greater than was anticipated at the time of the settlement.

I therefore am of opinion that the question must be answered in the negative.

LORD YOUNG.—I regard this as a case of very considerable importance. The statute on which the case is submitted to us is one about which there is a variety of opinions. But its object is plainly that where a workman or labourer, such as the respondent, without any serious or wilful misconduct, receives an injury in the course of an employment attended with danger, he shall be entitled to receive such a sum from his employer as will keep him from starving and off the poor's-roll. The Legislature regards such an accident as a risk incident to trade, and which accordingly must be taken by the persons engaging in it. The respondent has brought the matter before the Sheriff by means of arbitration under the Act, on the ground that he had sustained an injury which incapacitated him from work. It does not appear to me from the facts in the case that there was any difference between the parties needing to be compromised. There was no room for compromise. Parties are agreed as to the fact that at the time the agreement was entered into the respondent was injured so as to be incapacitated for work. This is not a matter of dispute, and it occurs to me that the present case is not one of compromise in the sense that there was a dispute between the parties to be settled by a compromise. In the observations which I have to make it must be distinctly understood that I do not question the view that if an honest agreement is entered into between different parties it will not be set aside because it turns out more favourable to one of the parties than was expected. But in dealing with such a discharge as the present, attention must be paid to the whole circumstances of the case. Thus, in the case of Wood,[1] Lord Selborne commences his opinion by referring to facts to shew that the party injured was, when he granted the receipt, in a condition to exercise an independent judgment. Here one of the material circumstances of the case is that the person from whom this receipt was taken was a working-man admittedly suffering under the effects of an injury incapacitating him totally from work. The findings of the Sheriff-substitute shew that the respondent was hurt in the course of his employment on 29th August 1899 so as to be unfit for his usual work till 6th March 1900, and the terms of the receipt which has been presented by the appellants shew that they were well aware when they presented the receipt to the respondent for signature that this workman was incapacitated for work as the result of the accident, and was therefore entitled every week to half a week's wages as long as he remained incapacitated. The respondent was entitled to a weekly payment as from 12th September, and as the receipt was taken upon 27th September, he was at that date, to the knowledge of the appellants, entitled to compensation for a fortnight. On that day the employers' foreman presented this suffering labourer with a receipt headed, "This is a final discharge," and induced him to sign it in return for £2, 7s. 4d., being four weeks' compensation under the Act, telling him that Dr Mechan, the appellants' surgeon, had reported that he would be fit for work in a fortnight. I should have thought that what would have occurred to anyone intending to do justice would be to pay this workman the compensation to which he was entitled for the past fortnight, and continue to make payment of weekly compensation another fortnight. Then, if the doctor's opinion had been right, the payments would have stopped. Justice would then have been done, and I think that this was the reasonable course to take. Was it a case in which good sense or justice suggested an idea of compromise? There was no difference or dispute to be compromised, and no consideration was given to the workman. Was it conscionable to think that no further payment than that mentioned in the receipt was to be made if the incapacity for work continued longer than the doctor certified that it would?

I do not impute falsehood to the appellants. I take the Sheriff's opinion that they honestly believed that their workman's incapacity for work through the injury would end in a fortnight, but I think it was neither conscionable nor proper for them to take this discharge with the intention of depriving their workman of further compensation in the event of his disability continuing as it did for six months. Such action subverts the purpose for which the statute was passed, viz., to prevent the workman from requiring to go to the poorhouse or suffering starvation. Suppose the doctor, after the receipt had been signed, had come to the appellants and said, "I find I was mistaken when I made my report. The period of incapacity will be six months instead of three weeks." If the appellants had said in such a case, "That does not matter. We have got our receipt, and we won't pay more." I do not think we would have countenanced such a reply as a legal position for them to take up, and I do not think any such result follows from the case of Wood.[1] I am of opinion that there was here essential error on the part of both parties when they entered into this contract, and that there should be restitution. Every consideration of truth and honesty leads to restitution, so that this workman may receive the compensation which the statute intended he should receive. Therefore, in conformity with the views of the Sheriff-substitute and those which I have added, I think this question should be answered as it has been answered by the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD TRAYNER.—The respondent in this case has put forward a claim against the appellants, his employers, and the defence is that the claim has been discharged. That defence was one which the Sheriff was bound to adjudicate upon, whatever might be the species facti on which it was founded. The discharge founded on by the defenders is produced, and its genuineness is not disputed. That appears to me to be conclusive against the pursuer, unless he avers relevant grounds for setting the discharge aside. He now says that he signed the discharge under essential error, and that is his only ground of objection. But essential error, to form a ground of reduction, must be error induced by misrepresentation or undue concealment on the part of the person in whose favour the deed sought to be reduced was granted. The facts of this case as set forth by the Sheriff-substitute negative any such misrepresentation or concealment by the appellants. I think, further, that neither of the parties to the discharge was under any essential error whatever in regard to any fact then existing and ascertained or ascertainable. They were equally informed. They both knew of the accident, of the claim advanced and made, of the probable duration of the incapacity for work, of the average earnings on which the compensation should be calculated. They neither of them knew, and could not know, that the doctor's estimate of the time necessary for the respondent's recovery was understated—but they both believed the doctor, whose opinion was given in good faith. The parties were therefore under no error as to fact; they were both disappointed in their expectations; but that is not a ground for reduction. I think the case of Wood[1] is quite in point, and it has been followed in several cases.

I cannot concur in the view on which the Sheriff-substitute has proceeded, that the discharge has to be set aside as ineffectual because of mutual error. Mutual error may be pleaded in support of the contention that there is no contract binding on the parties in respect that by reason of their mutual error they were never agreed in idem. But it is a novel view that mutual error as to the consequences which may follow from a contract will invalidate the contract itself. That is not error in regard to fact—it is error in opinion merely.

I regard this discharge as the outcome of a bona fide agreement between the parties to settle a claim regarding which one party knew as much as the other, and a discharge therefore not liable to be set aside, but one entitled to full effect. I am therefore for recalling the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and remitting to him with directions to dismiss the respondent's application.

LORD MONCREIFF.—The only question of law submitted is—(Reads).

It is not competent for us to consider any other question, nor to remit to the Sheriff to state another. There is nothing in the Act to prevent an employer settling with his workman as was done here. The Act contemplates that employer and workman may agree not only as to liability under the Act, but as to the amount and duration of the compensation. And if there is an agreement there can be no arbitration—See section 1 (3).

There is no question here of the bona fides of the appellants in accepting the discharge from the respondent, and we are not entitled to proceed on any view which we may take of their conduct in now insisting on it. On the question raised there is no doubt that in one sense both parties to this transaction were in error—that is to say we must hold that they both expected that the workman would be able to return to work at the end of six weeks from the date of his accident, their reason for so thinking being that Dr Mechan, the medical man consulted by the employer, reported to that effect. But it does not follow that this was an error which went to the root of the contract. In order to succeed in reducing the discharge granted by the respondent, he must shew that it was an implied condition of the contract that Dr Mechan's report should ultimately prove to be well founded—with this result, that if on the expiry of the six weeks from the date of the accident it were found that the respondent had not recovered, the discharge should be disregarded, and the respondent should be at liberty to claim compensation as if it had not been granted.

Now, I do not think that that is the true nature of this contract. I think that it was the respondent's intention to accept a lump sum in respect of the injuries which he had received, and that the report which was communicated to him was no more than a means to enable him to decide whether he should accept the appellants' offer or not. The case was just the same as if each party had consulted their own medical man, and both doctors had agreed in saying that the workman would be fit for work in six weeks from the date of the accident. In that case both parties would have been under the same error as here, and would have entered into the contract on an erroneous assumption. But I cannot suppose that in such a case the error so induced would be held to be a sufficient ground for setting aside the contract. The fact is that in all such cases there is always an element of transaction or risk, however much the parties may be guided by the professional advice which they receive. There must be finality about such transactions, and it would never do if it could not be determined whether a discharge so granted was to hold good until it was seen whether the opinions upon which the parties acted were justified by experience or not.

If authority were required, it will be found in the case of Wood[1] in the [1] 18 R. (H. L.) 27.

House of Lords, where the person injured was induced to accept compensation (which proved to be inadequate) on the faith of a report obtained by the railway company. No. 24. Nov. 22, 1900. Dornan v. Allan & Son.

In short, I think that the error which undoubtedly existed here was not a fundamental error, although no doubt it influenced both parties in entering into the contract.

I will only add that the matter might be well tested by considering whether, if the respondent had proved to be fit for work in a day or two, the appellants could have recovered from him the excess of the compensation which they paid him. I think clearly not.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative, sustained the appeal, recalled the award, and remitted to the arbitrator to dismiss the claim.

No. 25. Nov. 22, 1900. Paul & Co. v. Corporation of Glasgow.

Sale—Warranty—Express Warranty—Advertisement—Implied Warranty—Sale of article under patent or trade-name—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. c. 71), sec. 14.—Paul & Co. were the sole licencees and makers of an apparatus known in the trade as "Patterson's Smoke-Prevention Suction Draught for Land and Marine Boilers."

In March 1897 Paul & Company wrote to the engineer of the Corporation of Glasgow calling his attention to their apparatus as a means of both increasing boiler capacity and largely reducing or entirely preventing smoke; and also enclosing a circular, in which it was stated that "The smoke prevention is absolute, and is attained by a proper arrangement of," &c.

In March 1898 the Corporation by letter accepted a written offer by Paul & Company to instal their apparatus at a price stated. Neither the offer nor the acceptance contained any reference to the circular.

The apparatus having been erected, and the Corporation having thereafter rejected it as disconform to contract, Paul & Company brought an action against the Corporation for the price.

The defenders denied that the pursuers had implemented their contract, and stated—that they, the defenders, had ordered the installation, "relying on the statements and warranty contained in the said circular," and—that the apparatus erected did not prevent smoke. They pleaded that the apparatus supplied being disconform to warranty and having been rejected they ought to be assoilzied.

The pursuers pleaded that the contract did not contain any warranty as to the prevention of smoke.

The pursuers renounced probation; the defenders asked for a proof.

The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney) refused to allow a proof, and granted decree, holding (1) that the defenders were not entitled to found on the circular as containing an express warranty, as the circular was not referred to in the contract; and (2) that in respect of the proviso contained in sec. 14, subsec. 1, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, there was no implied warranty, the apparatus in question being a specified article sold under its trade-name—diss. Lord Young, who held that the defenders ought to be allowed a proof before answer of their averment that the pursuers had not implemented their contract.

Paul & Co. v. Corporation of Glasgow.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Kincairney.

THIS was an action at the instance of Matthew Paul & Company, Limited, Levenford Works, Dumbarton, against the Corporation of the city of Glasgow, to recover £400, being the price of an apparatus which the pursuers had supplied to the defenders.

The pursuers averred:—(Cond. 1) "The pursuers are sole licencees and makers of 'Patterson's Smoke-Preventing Suction Draught for Land and Marine Boilers,' which is the well-known trade-name of a specific process designed for adaptation to boilers for the purpose of effecting increased power with a saving of fuel and the prevention of smoke. The apparatus is one in which, by the use of a fan in the main flue leading from the boiler to the chimney, the intensity of the draught and steam production are regulated according to the speed of the fan." (Cond. 2) "On 9th March 1897 the pursuers wrote to Mr A. B. Macdonald, who acted as engineer in the service of the defenders, recommending to the notice of the defenders the said system of suction draught, and they enclosed a circular describing the nature of the said system and the advantages to be derived from its use. A copy of the said circular is herewith produced.* Inter alia it contained sketches and letterpress describing fully the methods by which the results claimed for the said system are obtained; and the engineer of the defenders was thus put in a position to judge for himself as to the merits of the pursuers' apparatus. Subsequently certain members of the Baths and Washhouses Committee of the defenders' Corporation . . . visited the pursuers' works, where they saw the Patterson apparatus in operation, and formed a judgment as to the uses of the system on the results obtained."

The pursuers further averred (Cond. 3) that on 27th December 1897 Mr Macdonald, as representing the defenders, sent a letter to them requesting a specification and estimates for the application of "Patterson's Induced Draught" to washhouses at Stobcross and Bain Square in the city of Glasgow, and enclosing sketches shewing that at Stobcross two Cornish boilers and at Bain Square a Babcock and Wilcox boiler were to be built. "In response to inquiries made by the pursuers Mr Macdonald, in letters dated 30th December 1897 and 4th January 1898 respectively, informed the pursuers, inter alia, that the Cornish boilers would burn '45 tons breeze' per month of 248 working hours, and the Babcock boiler '70 tons breeze' per month. This information, as was explained to Mr Macdonald, was necessary to enable the pursuers to determine the capacity of the fans, which formed the essential part of their apparatus."

*The circular stated, under the head "Advantages," that one of these was "Absolute prevention of smoke," and, in the general description of the apparatus, that, "The smoke prevention is absolute, and is attained by a proper arrangement of air admission, which in no way complicates the furnace fittings, together with the washing of the gases by the water spray as they pass through the fan."

In the letter accompanying the circular the pursuers stated,—"We understand that the Glasgow Corporation have at present under way a number of new boiler installations for city institutions, and we enclose herewith a descriptive circular of Patterson's Suction Draught arrangement, which you may find of interest at the present time.

"We would direct your attention specially to the combinations under this system, of a means both for greatly increasing the boiler capacity, and for largely reducing, or entirely preventing smoke, which, so far as we are aware, is not done jointly in any other system. . . .

"On hearing from you we shall be glad to submit a proposal for any of the installations you have at present in progress."

Paul & Co. v. Corporation of Glasgow.

(Cond. 4) "On the information so obtained the pursuers proceeded to make estimates, and by letter of 14th January 1898 addressed to Mr Macdonald, they offered to supply with their apparatus the said two stations at a cost of £330 per station." A single Lancashire boiler having been on 18th January 1898 substituted for the two Cornish boilers at the Stobcross washhouse, "the pursuers, by letter dated 25th January 1898, addressed to Mr Macdonald, made a new offer for the fitting up of their apparatus at the price of £370 for each installation. No further action, however, was taken by Mr Macdonald towards the fitting up of the pursuers' system at the Stobcross and Bain Square washhouses, but on 3d February 1898 the pursuers received from him a letter enclosing a tracing of a washhouse in Kennedy Street, Glasgow, and requesting them to submit to him sketches for a proposed installation of their apparatus there. No particulars were given, but the tracing sent by Mr Macdonald to the pursuers shewed a boiler of the same type and of like dimensions as the Lancashire boiler previously proposed to be erected at Stobcross, and the pursuers accordingly proceeded upon the footing that the conditions as to coal consumpt were identical with those for which they estimated in connection with Stobcross. On 8th February 1898 the pursuers accordingly made an offer by letter for the said installation, in which, inter alia, they said,—'Our price for this installation will be the same as for the others, viz., £370; and an iron chimney 30 feet high and 2 feet 6 inches in diameter will cost about £30 additional.'"

(Cond. 5) On 1st March 1898 the treasurer of the Corporation sent an acceptance. "Said acceptance is in the following terms:—'Having regard to your letters addressed to Mr A. B. Macdonald, City Engineer, of date 14th January, 25th January, and 8th February, with relative tracings, I beg on behalf of the Corporation Police Department to intimate their acceptance of your offer contained in these letters to supply and erect at the Kennedy Street washhouse an installation of Patterson's Suction Draught with 60″ fan, engine, iron chimney, &c., all as specified, for the sum of £400 sterling.' The said acceptance was confirmed by the pursuers on 3d March 1898. No warranty as to the results to be obtained by the apparatus was either asked or given. The defenders relied on the reputation of the apparatus, on the technical skill of their engineer, Mr Macdonald, and on the knowledge of the said members of committee who had seen the pursuers' apparatus in operation." (Cond. 6) "The pursuers thereafter proceeded with the fitting up of their apparatus at the said Kennedy Street washhouse, and they completed it on 9th February 1899. When erected it was in every respect conform to contract, and in all material respects similar to the apparatus which the defenders' said committee saw in operation before the said contract was made," but the defenders refused payment of the price.

The defenders referred to the correspondence for its terms, and made, inter alia, the following answers:—In Ans. 2. "Admitted that certain members and officials of the Baths and Washhouses Committee of the defenders' corporation visited the pursuers' works and saw the Patterson apparatus in operation. Quoad ultra denied." (Ans. 6) "Admitted that the pursuers thereafter proceeded with the fitting up of their apparatus at the said Kennedy Street washhouse. Admitted that the defenders refuse to make payment of the price. Quoad ultra denied. Reference is made to the defenders' statement of facts."

Paul & Co. v. Corporation of Glasgow.

The defenders' statement of facts contained the following averments, with the answers thereto by the pursuers:—(Stat. 1) "The pursuers in their said circular claimed as one of the advantages to be derived from the application of their apparatus to land boilers, and warranted, the 'absolute prevention of smoke' coupled with a 'large reduction in cost of chimney.' The said circular contains the following warranty:—'The smoke prevention is absolute, and is obtained by a proper arrangement of air admission, which in no way complicates the furnace fittings, together with the washing of the gases by the water spray as they pass through the fan.'" (Ans. 1) "The circular mentioned is referred to. Quoad ultra denied. The said circular contains no warranty." (Stat. 2) "Relying on the statements and warranty contained in the said circular, and in order to obviate the erection of a large brick chimney stalk, the defenders ordered an installation of the Patterson apparatus for the Kennedy Street washhouse." The defenders then made certain statements as to delay in erecting the installation, and as to the erection of a temporary fan. The pursuers made answers, which the defenders denied, in so far as inconsistent with their own statements. (Stat. 3) "When the apparatus came to be tried it was found that it did not prevent smoke. On the contrary, black smoke issued on all occasions in great quantities through the chimney from the boiler, alike when the apparatus was worked (as it frequently was) by or in presence of the pursuers' men and by the defenders' men." (Ans. 3) "Denied." (Stat. 4) "On this coming to the knowledge of the pursuers they on 1st April 1899 wrote to Mr Macdonald" suggesting certain changes in order to increase the air supply. "The pursuers by said letter undertook 'that with a sufficient air supply over the bars the smoke will be absolutely prevented.'" (Ans. 4) "The letter mentioned is referred to." The defenders then made averments, and the pursuers made answers thereto, as to attempts by the pursuers to prevent smoke by altering the apparatus. (Stat. 8) "On 2d December 1899, on the failure of the attempts by the pursuers, the defenders wrote to the pursuers, giving them an opportunity of putting the apparatus to their satisfaction within ten days. The pursuers did not avail themselves of this opportunity, and after some correspondence, and after the pursuers' workmen had vainly attempted to work the engine successfully themselves, the defenders, on or about 30th December 1899, rejected the said apparatus as not being conform to warranty, and thereafter caused it to be removed. The letters mentioned by the pursuers in their answer are referred to for their terms. Their explanations are denied, and it is explained that no estimate was given by the defenders of the probable coal consumpt at the Kennedy Street washhouse. The consumpt varied, and the pursuers' complaint on the point had to do with a deficiency in steam, not with production of smoke. Quoad ultra the statements in answer, so far as not coinciding with the defenders' statements, are denied." (Ans. 8) "The defenders' letter of 2d December 1899 is referred to. Admitted that the defenders rejected the apparatus and caused it to be removed. Quoad ultra denied. . . . On receiving the said letter from the defenders the pursuers sent a man to investigate the apparatus, when it was discovered that throughout all the previous trials the conditions of the contract with regard to the consumpt of coal, as stated in articles 3 and 4 of the Condescendence, had been violated," in certain particulars specified. "Under the conditions provided for, the pursuers aver, it would give satisfactory results, and the defenders have illegitimately rejected it."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuers having supplied to the defenders the apparatus as contracted for, are entitled to payment of the price. (4) Separatim, the apparatus in question having been sold to the defenders without any warranty, the defenders took the risk of its fitness for the purposes to which it was put. (5) The apparatus in question being a specified article, sold under its patent or other trade-name, there was no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose. (7) The defences are irrelevant.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The pursuers' averments, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defenders ought to be assoilzied, with expenses. (3) The apparatus supplied by the pursuers to the defenders being disconform to warranty, and having been rejected by the defenders, the defenders ought to be assoilzied, with expenses.

On 10th July 1900 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), before answer, allowed parties a proof of their averments.

The pursuers reclaimed, and at the hearing renounced probation.

Argued for the pursuers;—The pursuers were entitled to decree de plano. The only possible defences to this action would have been fraud, or that the article had been badly fitted up, or that the article delivered was not the article which had been ordered, but none of these was averred. The only defence averred was breach of warranty. This was a sale of a specific article by its patent or trade-name, and accordingly the warranty could not be implied.* The Sale of Goods Act of 1893, sec. 14 (1) was declaratory of the common law that no warranty is to be implied from the general description in the name of the apparatus.[1] The warranty, if any, must, therefore, be express, and as there was certainly no express warranty in the correspondence, it must be found, if anywhere, in the circular. But the circular was merely a puff or advertisement, and not a guarantee. It was sent with drawings to a skilled engineer, who could form his own judgment. It was merely a representation, on which the defenders were not entitled to rely in making the contract. They were asked to apply their own judgment. But whether the circular contained a warranty or not, it formed no part of the contract. The contract was completed by the letters of offer and acceptance of 8th February and 1st March 1898, and neither these letters nor the whole correspondence between the parties contained any reference to the circular, which had been sent out nine months before the correspondence began. There was, therefore, no express warranty.[1] Even if the circular did contain a warranty, it could not be said to be with reference to this contract. The warranty must be a material part of the contract, and it was not sufficient to make it so that one of the parties had it in mind when the contract was made. There was no averment which would entitle the defenders to plead that they relied on the seller's skill or judgment, or on anything but the patentee's circular. The contract was contained in the letters of offer and acceptance, and nothing was averred entitling the defenders to prove anything to modify the contract. The fact that the apparatus had failed to entirely prevent smoke in the circumstances was admitted, and, therefore, there was no room for proof.

*The Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), enacts—Section 14,—"Subject to the provisions of this Act, and of any statute in that behalf, there is no implied warranty or condition as to the quality or fitness for any particular purpose of goods supplied under a contract of sale except as follows:—(1) Where the buyer, expressly or by implication, makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to shew that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose, provided that in the case of a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade-name, there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose."

Argued for the defenders;—The Lord Ordinary was right in allowing proof. The contract was not confined to the letters of offer and acceptance. The defenders did not contend that the warranty was implied. The circular, which contained an express warranty, and not a mere representation, was the beginning of the correspondence and part of the contract. It was a question of circumstances when representation hardened into warranty.[2] The question as to whether there was warranty was a question of fact, and the question whether the interval between the circular and the letters of offer and acceptance prevented the circular from being imported into the contract was one of fact to be ascertained by proof, and parole evidence was competent.[3] This was a mercantile bargain, and it was necessary and competent to look to the whole correspondence and communings between the parties, which would shew that the pursuers had warranted the apparatus, and that the defenders had relied on the warranty.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The pursuers sue the defenders for the price of a smoke-prevention apparatus supplied on the defenders' order. It is not contended that the apparatus supplied was not the apparatus which was ordered by the defenders. Their own statement is that they ordered the apparatus to be installed at the defenders' premises, "relying on the statements and warranty" contained in a circular which had been sent to them by the pursuers. They nowhere state that the apparatus supplied was not the apparatus described in the circular, nor do they deny the pursuers' statement that it was. Practically the defence is that the pursuers gave a warranty that by the apparatus "the smoke prevention is absolute." The order and the supply of the article ordered not being denied, the question is narrowed down to this point, whether the defenders have upon record any statements relevant to be remitted to probation for the purpose of proving that the pursuers gave a warranty which they have failed to make good. Now, the only warranty alleged is that already referred to, namely, the trade circular containing the statement above quoted. But the fact is stated, and not denied, that that circular was sent to the defenders, not at the time of the bargain of sale, but many months before any negotiations for a sale took place between the parties. It was sent on 9th March 1897, and no communication took place between the parties until 27th of December of the same year. It is thus plain that the circular was sent as an advertising circular only, stating that the pursuers had an article to sell of which they expressed a high opinion as to its efficiency for the purpose for which it was intended. I am unable to see how the sending of that circular in the spring of 1897 can be held to be a warranty in regard to a sale of a specific article which did not take place till January 1898 by offer and acceptance, and in which no allusion is made to any statements regarding the efficiency of the apparatus contained in the trade circular. It was frankly admitted by Mr Lees in his argument that if the letters of contract did not embody the circular, there was no warranty upon which he could support his case. Being of opinion, as I have already said, that the circular cannot be connected with the letters so as to make it part of the contract, even assuming that what was contained in the circular might constitute a warranty, I must hold that the defenders have no relevant defence to the demand that, having purchased a specified article, they should pay the price. I see no ground for allowing the defenders a proof. I do not see any averment by them, which, if they could prove it, would be an answer to the pursuers' case, and, therefore, I move your Lordships to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and to grant decree.

LORD YOUNG.—I differ from the opinion which your Lordship has expressed, and agree with the Lord Ordinary, that we cannot decide this case without evidence. I am not of opinion that the pursuers' case, as stated on record, is admitted by the defenders. On the contrary, I think it is distinctly denied. I do not think the contract here was akin to the purchase of a specific article in a shop, or buying an article which you see, a horse, or anything else, where you must look at the thing for yourself, and take it or not as you please. I think the contract here was, or at least may be shewn by evidence to have been, that the apparatus should be constructed and so modified and so put up as to answer the purpose which the pursuers here were informed the purchasers had in view, and which they quite understood. Now, it is averred that what was done was not according to contract. A long correspondence has been produced here, all of which I do not doubt may be referred to as evidence, but we cannot decide the case upon the evidence thereby afforded, unless the parties renounce further probation, which they do not. My present impression is, that if both parties were to renounce probation we should have to decide the case against the pursuers, for I think there is not admission on record or written evidence which would entitle them to judgment upon the footing that their case was admitted or proved by writings produced. But probation is not renounced, and the defenders desire to have evidence of what they state upon the record, that what the pursuers supplied was not according to contract. No doubt the word warranty is used in the plea in law :—"The apparatus supplied by the pursuers to the defenders being disconform to warranty, and having been rejected by the defenders, the defenders ought to be assoilzied, with expenses." In the ordinary case, indeed in every case, the seller warrants that the article furnished shall be according to contract. I take the whole evidence at present before us to amount to this,—that the contract between the parties was that the apparatus should be constructed for the defenders with such modifications as were necessary, and be put in their premises so as to accomplish the end which it is stated they had in view, and which was well known to the pursuers. But it is impossible to look to the record here without seeing that the parties are very much at variance upon matters of fact. Take Cond. 3. The pursuers there say,—"In response to inquiries made by the pursuers, Mr Macdonald, in letters dated 30th December 1897 and 4th January 1898 respectively, informed the pursuers, inter alia, that the Cornish boilers would burn 45 tons breeze per month of 248 working hours, and the Babcock Boiler 70 tons breeze per month. This information, as was explained to Mr Macdonald, was necessary to enable the pursuers to determine the capacity of the fans, which formed the essential part of their apparatus." Then take Cond. 4: "No particulars were given, but the tracing sent by Mr Macdonald to the pursuers shewed a boiler of the same type and of like dimensions as the Lancashire boiler previously proposed to be erected at Stobcross, and the pursuers accordingly proceeded upon the footing that the conditions as to coal consumpt were identical with those for which they estimated in connection with Stobcross." Well, there is no admission, and the defenders, in their statement of facts, Statement 2, say: "After frequent trials the fan was found to be a failure" (the fan that was constructed so as to suit the apparatus), "but the pursuers informed the defenders in September 1899 that it was only a temporary one, and that they had now put a copper fan in hands." That is, put it in hands to be made. Then the statement in answer is denied, and in Statement 4, at the end of the statement, they say: "The pursuers," by letter which is founded upon, "undertook that with a sufficient air supply over the bars, the smoke will be absolutely prevented." And again the pursuers say in their answer to the defenders' statement 8: "On receiving the said letter" (that is the letter complaining that it was not answering the purpose) "from the defenders, the pursuers sent a man to investigate the apparatus, when it was discovered that throughout all the previous trials the conditions of the contract with regard to the consumpt of coal, as stated in articles 3 and 4 of the Condescendence, had been violated." That is distinctly denied by the defenders, and then at the end of this answer the pursuers say: "Under the conditions provided for, the pursuers aver it would give satisfactory results, and the defenders have illegitimately rejected it." I should therefore have been surprised if the Lord Ordinary had seen his way to decide the case without allowing evidence; but he having come to the conclusion that he could not, and having allowed evidence accordingly, but before answer, so as not to prejudice any plea of the pursuers, I see no ground for altering his judgment.

LORD TRAYNER.—I should not have interfered with the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor allowing a proof, had I been able to find in this record any point, probation in regard to which could have assisted us in deciding the question submitted to us. The case appears to me to be a very simple and clear one. The pursuers offered to supply and erect for the defenders an installation of Patterson's Suction Draught Apparatus for £400, and this offer the defenders accepted. The apparatus known by that patent or trade-name was supplied, but it did not produce the results which the defenders expected, and they decline to pay the contract price, not on the ground that what was supplied was other than the apparatus contracted for, but because it did not produce results which they say the pursuers warranted that it would produce. No doubt in the answer to article 6 of the Condescendence, the defenders deny that the apparatus was conform to contract, but they do so under reference to their own statement of facts. In that statement there is no objection stated to the apparatus supplied on any ground except that it did not prevent smoke, as the defenders allege the pursuers warranted it would do, and the defenders' pleas in law shew that their only defence is disconformity "to warranty." The only question therefore is, did the pursuers warrant the apparatus as the defenders allege? There is here no case for implied warranty, for according to the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (sec. 14, subsec. 1), when an article is sold by its patent or trade-name (as this apparatus was), there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose. The warranty therefore, must be express; and as the contract was in writing, it is to the contract we must look for the warranty, if it exists.

The apparatus in question was brought under the notice of the defenders by a letter from the pursuers, dated 9th March 1897, in which they enclosed "a descriptive circular of Patterson's Suction Draught arrangement." That circular described as one of the advantages of the arrangement absolute prevention of smoke, but in the letter I have referred to, in which this circular was enclosed, the pursuers told the defenders that the arrangement was one "for largely reducing, or entirely preventing smoke," so that even, when first brought before them, the defenders were informed that the absolute prevention of smoke might not be attained. But we are not called on to consider whether the terms of the circular amounted to warranty, or merely to the laudation of his goods by a seller, which the buyer must check for himself, because neither the circular nor the letter of 9th March 1897 are made part of or even referred to in the contract, which was not made until March 1898. The contract then made contains no allusion to the results which the apparatus is calculated or expected to produce. Its smoke-preventing capacity or quality is not mentioned. The only defence to this action, however, is that the pursuers warranted that the apparatus would prevent smoke, and that this warranty had not been fulfilled. I think it plain, on the terms of the contract, that there was no warranty, and that therefore there could not be the breach of warranty on which the defenders alone rely. The defence accordingly, in my opinion, fails, and the pursuers are entitled to decree.

LORD MONCREIFF.—This is an action brought to recover the price of an apparatus called "Patterson's Smoke-Preventing Suction Draught for Land and Marine Boilers," of which the pursuers are the sole licencees and makers, which was sold by them to the defenders in March 1898.

The only defence is that the pursuers warranted that the apparatus would secure the absolute prevention of smoke, coupled with a large reduction in the cost of chimney, that the apparatus was purchased on the faith of that warranty, but totally failed to satisfy the representations made by the pursuers. The warranty is said to be contained in a circular issued to the public by the pursuers, in which, among the advantages of the apparatus, absolute prevention of smoke appears.

The Lord Ordinary has allowed a proof before answer. The first question we have to decide is whether this proof is necessary and should be allowed. The second is whether the statements in the circular constitute a warranty.

On the first question,—viz., the admissibility of proof,—I should be slow to exclude any inquiry which would bear upon the question of law which we have to decide. But the matter is brought to a very sharp point by the pursuers renouncing probation; that is to say, we must take the case on the footing that the defenders' statements as to the inability of this apparatus absolutely to prevent smoke are true. Now, if this is conceded, nothing remains except the question of law which arises upon the circular and correspondence.

The question of implied warranty depends on the 14th section of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, which begins by enacting that, subject to the provisions of this Act, there is no implied warranty or condition as to the quality or fitness for any particular purpose of goods supplied under a contract of sale except as follows. The first exception is where the buyer makes known the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to shew that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment. Pausing there, on the statements of parties I think there might be a serious question whether the defenders did rely on the seller's skill and judgment, because the defenders' engineer made a most careful examination of the apparatus before it was taken over.

But there is an exception from this exception in these terms: "Provided that in the case of a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade-name, there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose." Now, this was a contract for the sale of an article, the patent or trade-name of which was "Patterson's Smoke-Preventing Suction Draught for Land and Marine Boilers." Therefore under the statute there was no implied warranty.

The question remains whether there was an express warranty. The letters which constitute the contract do not contain one. The circular, which was sent a year before, is not imported. But if we can look at the circular it does not contain a warranty. What is contained in the circular is, at most, an undue laudation of the pursuers' patent.

If I am correct in holding that the real question between the parties would not derive any aid from parole proof, and that, on a fair construction, the circular and the pursuers' letters do not amount to a warranty, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and decree given as concluded for.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and gave decree as concluded for.

The Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Society had no share capital and no shareholders. Its membership consisted exclusively of the holders of policies of life insurance effected with the Society, and of the purchasers of annuities from it. The bulk of the members were the holders of "participating" policies, i.e. members who were entitled to share in the surplus assets of the Society as brought out at each septennial investigation of its affairs; but a small proportion of the policy-holders and all the annuity-holders (who also were proportionally few in number) had no such right of participating in the surplus assets. The Society did not directly insure, or grant annuities to, persons who were not members of the Society, but it reinsured the risks of other life insurance companies. Its accumulated funds, which were of very large amount, and from which it derived a large income, were invested in stocks, shares, and other securities, and it also, to a small extent, purchased reversions.

The Society having claimed exemption from inhabited house duty under the above enactment in respect of premises which it occupied solely for the purposes of its business, the Surveyor of Taxes maintained that the exemption founded on did not apply, in respect that the Society, being a mutual insurance society, could make no trade or business profits, or at all events, if it did to some extent make trade or business profits, that it did not occupy the premises for the sole purpose of making such profits.

Held that the premises in question fell within the exemption, in respect that they were solely occupied by the Society for the purposes of its business by which it sought to make a profit.

Observed that the word "solely" in the statute qualified the word "occupied" and not the words "any trade or business," &c.

Exchequer Cause. 2D DIVISION.

AT a meeting of the Commissioners for General Purposes acting under the Property and Income-Tax Acts, and for executing the Acts relating to Inhabited House Duty, for the county of Edinburgh, held at Edinburgh on 26th July 1899, the Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Society appealed against an assessment for the year 1898-99 of £45, being inhabited house duty, at the rate of 9d per £, on £1200, the annual value of the premises at 9 St Andrew Square, Edinburgh, owned and occupied by the Society.

The question raised was whether the Society's premises at 9 St Andrew Square, Edinburgh, fell within the exemption provided in section 13, subsection (2), of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878.*

Sec. 13. "With respect to the duties on inhabited houses . . . the Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Society v. Inland Revenue.

The following facts were stated as proved or admitted in the case for appeal after mentioned:—

The premises at 9 St Andrew Square, Edinburgh, were, with the exception of a portion used by a caretaker as his residence, "occupied by the Society exclusively for the purposes of its business."

The Society, which was formed in 1814, was incorporated by the Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Society's Incorporation Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. lxxxv.), and at the date of the case it was regulated by that Act and the Acts 45 and 46 Vict. cap. lxxv.; 46 Vict. cap. xxii.; and 54 Vict. cap. vii.

"The Society has no share capital, and there are no shareholders. Its membership consists of the holders of policies of life insurance effected with the Society, whether these carry a right of participation in the surplus assets of the Society or not, and of the purchasers of annuities. The purchasers of annuities have no right of participation in the surplus assets of the Society. The Society does not insure or grant annuities in favour of persons other than its members, except in the case of re-assurances of other companies. . . . Policy-holders may surrender their policies for a money payment, or they may assign or transfer their interest in the said Society."

The Society's statutes empowered the directors to lay out such part of the funds of the Society as they should think proper in certain specified classes of investments, and it was in these classes of investments that the directors invested the funds of the Society in so far as not required to meet its current liabilities. In investing its funds the Society purchased stock, shares, and other securities. It was also admitted at the hearing before the Court of Exchequer that the Society had power to purchase reversions, and that it had from time to time exercised this power, although not in the year for which the assessment in question was claimed.

"At the end of each period of seven years there is an investigation into the affairs of the Society, and if the total sum of the assets exceed the total sum of the liabilities, an amount not more than the excess of the assets is allocated among the holders of participating policies by way of additions to the sums assured, but with the option of accepting the present cash value of these additions, or of having them applied in reduction of future premiums. In the case of policies which become claims during any of the septennial periods, additions may be and actually are made in anticipation of the surplus to be ascertained at the end of the period.

"The holders of participating policies constitute approximately 95 per cent of the whole membership of the Society. The non-participating policy-holders constitute rather less than five per cent, and the annuitants rather less than one per cent.

"At the end of 1898 the funds of the Society amounted to £14,544,766.

(2) "Every house or tenement which is occupied solely for the purpose of any trade or business, or of any profession or calling by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit, shall be exempted from the duties by the said Commissioners upon proof of the facts to their satisfaction, and this exemption shall take effect although a servant or other person may dwell in such house or tenement for the protection thereof."

Nov. 24, 1900.
Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Society v. Inland Revenue.

"During the year 1898 the Society received:—
"(1) Income from investments, £558,814.
"(2) Premiums in respect of policies of assurance, £998,702.
"(3) Sums paid for the purchase of annuities granted by the Society, £12,811.

"Income-tax is paid upon the whole of the income received in the United Kingdom from the Society's invested funds. This income, so far as received in the United Kingdom without deduction of income-tax, is the subject of direct assessment. There is no other income-tax assessment made upon the Society."

The Society contended that the premises in question were within the exemption provided in section 13, subsection (2), of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, on the grounds—"(1) That they are occupied solely for the purposes of the business of life insurance; (2) That the business is to a very considerable extent one by which the occupier seeks a profit in the restricted sense of the Income-Tax Acts; and (3) that the whole business is carried on for profit in the ordinary sense of the word. . . . It was pointed out that the interests, dividends, and other income derived from the Society's large invested funds are assessed for income-tax as profits, that these interests extend to upwards of one-third of the Society's annual receipts, that the main object of the Society's business is the profitable investment of its 14½ millions of funds, and that the labour involved in dealing with these funds is much greater in proportion to the annual receipts therefrom than that involved in receiving the contributions of members."

The Surveyor of Taxes, "while admitting that the premises charged to duty are occupied solely for the purposes of the Society's business, contended that the business is not of such a character as to answer to the definition of a 'business by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit.' The main objects for which the Society exists are:—(1) The securing of provisions payable or arising upon the termination of lives or upon survivorships, and (2) the granting of annuities, both upon the principle of mutual assurance. The profitable investment of its funds, however important it may be, is strictly subsidiary to the main purposes for which the business is carried on. In the case of a proprietary company, the company may make a profit or a loss on its contracts with policy-holders, and such profit is a trade or business profit; but in the case of a mutual company like the Scottish Widows' Fund the very idea of profit in this sense is excluded. The Surveyor maintained that in reading section 13 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, profit is to be understood as meaning a trade or business profit."

The Commissioners were of opinion that the premises did not come within the exemption granted by the statute, and accordingly they dismissed the appeal and confirmed the assessment.

The Society obtained a case, from which the foregoing narrative is taken.

The Lord Ordinary in Exchequer (Stormonth-Darling), on the motion of the parties, appointed the case to be heard by the First Division, in terms of the A. S. 9th December 1880; and the case was subsequently transferred to the Second Division.

The nature of the arguments at the hearing sufficiently appears from the contentions of the parties as stated in the case, and from the opinions of Lord Trayner and Lord Moncreiff. The undernoted authorities were cited at the hearing.[1]

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The appellants have been assessed for inhabited house duty in respect of the premises occupied by them for the purpose of their business, and they claim to be exempted from that tax in respect of the provisions of section 13 (2) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878. That section is quoted in the case, and need not be repeated here, but generally, so far as we need consider it, it provides that the exemption from inhabited house duty shall be given in the case of every house or tenement occupied solely for the purpose of any business by which the occupier seeks a profit. From what has already been said in more than one decided case, I suppose it cannot now be doubted that an insurance company carries on a business within the meaning of that word as used in the exempting provision. The respondent, however, maintains that in the case of the appellants their business is not one by which a profit is sought in the sense of the Act, and that is the question which we have to decide.

The exemption must, I think, be liberally construed, but without pressing that view unduly, it appears to me that the appellants are entitled to the benefit of the exemption. That they carry on a business is clear. Is it not a business from which they seek to make profit? I can hardly suppose the business is carried on with any other view. The business of life insurance is not purely philanthropic nor charitable; if not, I can see no other reason for its existence than the seeking of profit. It certainly results in profits being made, and that to a very large extent, for the profit made by the Widows' Fund (for example) from the investment of its capital alone amounts to considerably over half a million sterling per annum. It is said that that profit does not arise from life insurance, and that is true. But the profitable investment of the Society's funds, so as to yield profit to its members, is an integral part of the insurance company's business. Its members would be, and would have reason to be, dissatisfied if their capital was left uninvested, and, therefore, unproductive, and would be entitled to complain that the officials of the Society were neglecting the business which, inter alia, they were appointed for the purpose of transacting. Apart from this, the company before us as appellants insure strangers to their Society, because they reinsure risks which other offices have undertaken, and purchase reversionary rights. To what end do they transact this business if not for the purpose of gaining profit?

I do not regard the case of Styles,[2] relied on by the Surveyor of Taxes, as deciding anything adverse to the contentions maintained by the appellants. In that case, it was held that the bonus additions added in participating policies were not profits on which income-tax was payable; that such bonuses were, in fact, a return of capital to the members of the society, which had been contributed beyond the amount necessary for the society's operations. There was nothing else in question there, and nothing else decided. Lord Watson said, in the course of his opinion, that with the profits derived from the sale of annuities, &c., "and with the income derived by the company from its investments, we have no concern."[1] The appeal in his view was limited to the question whether bonus additions on participating policies were profits within the meaning of the Income-Tax Act of 1853. Accepting that decision as conclusive of the matter there decided, it does not determine the question before us. It may very well be that certain returns are not profits in the sense of the Income-Tax Acts and yet may be profits in another sense. If a man sells property or stock (that not being his trade or business) for a larger sum than he paid for it, he makes a profit to the extent by which the sale price exceeds the purchase price. But such advantage as is thus gained is not "profit" in the sense of the Income-Tax Acts.

But I take it as settled that the bonuses which from time to time are paid to policy-holders, or added to the amount insured, are not profits on which income-tax can be demanded. It is not so clear, however, that a society which exists, inter alia, for the purpose or with the intention of procuring such an advantage for its members, is not carrying on a business which seeks to make profit within the meaning of the exempting clause with which we have here to deal.

It was argued for the Surveyor that the appellant company is not a proprietary but a mutual insurance society, but I fear I did not quite comprehend what this distinction pointed to. That distinction was certainly recognised in Styles' case[2] for the purpose of shewing that any sums paid to the shareholders of a proprietary company were profits liable to income-tax, whereas payments to members of a mutual insurance society were or might be different, as not being profits but returned capital. But as regards inhabited house duty, I cannot see the importance of the distinction. A mutual insurance society is a company consisting of partners just as is a proprietary company. The members are associated on different conditions no doubt, but in each case they form a company preserving (according to our law) a separate and independent persona from the members who constitute it. The members in each may ultimately be called on to liquidate the company's obligations—but not in the first instance—and the company alone can vindicate its rights, which an individual member cannot. The profits gained by each may be different, proceeding from different sources, and differently distributed. But that is immaterial. If profits are gained by one or other, it is immaterial to the question we are dealing with whence these profits proceed, who gets them, or in what proportion. The question here is, does the society (whether proprietary or mutual) carry on a business by which it seeks to make profit? It may make none or make much—the test is, Does it seek to make profit? and that, I think, the appellants do. For I have shewn that the appellants (apart altogether from the premiums they receive and the bonuses which they give) by reinsurances, purchase of reversions, and investment of capital, all legitimate and proper parts of an insurance business, seek profit and make it.

The only point remaining to be noticed is an argument based on the construction of the exemption clause. The exemption is granted only in respect of premises "occupied solely" for the purpose of any business by which the occupier seeks profit. This, it is now contended for the surveyor, means premises in which no business is transacted or anything done except in the pursuit of profit; that if any business whatever is done or transacted within the premises, gratuitously or otherwise than in pursuit of profit, the exemption clause does not apply. I think this reading of the clause inadmissible. The word "solely," in my opinion, only qualifies the occupation, and does not refer to or qualify the business. That is, I think, the natural and reasonable conclusion, having regard to the fact that the exemption has reference to "inhabited house duty," and from the further fact that the sole occupation is declared to be unaffected by the circumstance that a servant dwells on the premises for the protection thereof—a circumstance which would at one time have rendered the premises liable to this tax as being otherwise occupied than for trade or business purposes. The view of the Surveyor now maintained (which does not appear to have been maintained before the Commissioners) would lead, if sustained, to curious results. A firm of chartered accountants who annually gratuitously audited the accounts of, say, the Royal Infirmary, or any other charitable institution, would be liable in inhabited house duty for their offices, because they did business there which was not done for profit. A bank in like manner would be liable for the tax if it set aside a strong room in which it deposited gratuitously the silver chests of some of its customers, thus not using their whole premises solely in the pursuit of gain or profit. I think this cannot seriously be maintained to be the meaning of the exemption clause—at all events, I think that it is not its meaning.

On the whole matter, I have come to the conclusion that the determination of the Commissioners is wrong.

LORD MONCREIFF.—The question which we have to decide is, whether the appellant society occupies its premises at 9 St Andrew Square, Edinburgh, solely for the purposes of a business by which it seeks a profit in the sense of the statute which at present regulates the incidence of inhabited house duties, viz., the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, section 13, subsection (2). It is a hard saying that this society, consisting of so many thousand policy-holders and partners, with its large staff of officials and clerks, its capital of upwards of fourteen millions, and its enormous yearly income, does not carry on business for profit. But by piecing together various decisions which have been pronounced by this Court and by the House of Lords, the Surveyor presents a case which is not free from difficulty.

I am not sure that it was seriously maintained that this is not a "business," whether carried on for profit or not. But if that argument, which I presume is founded on the case of The Edinburgh Life Assurance Company,[1] is insisted on, I am not prepared to give effect to it. That case was decided upon the terms of the Statute 32 and 33 Vict. cap. 14, section 11, in which the word "business" does not occur; the words being "any tenement or part of a tenement occupied as a house for purposes of trade only," &c. The 13th section, subsection (2), of the Act of 1878 is differently expressed, the words being, "Where any of such tenements are occupied solely for the purpose of any trade or business, or of any profession or calling by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit." Now, I think we are entitled and bound to give a meaning to the word "business," and besides, it seems to me absurd to say that premises occupied for the purposes of trade on the one hand, and premises occupied for the purposes of a profession on the other, are to get the benefit of this exemption, while large undertakings like that of this society, which perhaps, strictly speaking, fall neither under the category of trade nor profession, but which to a much larger extent than most trades or professions carry on business for profit, are to be excluded.

No. 26.

Nov. 24, 1900. Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Society v. Inland Revenue.

The Surveyor's main argument, however, was directed to shewing that this is not a business carried on for profit in the sense of the Act; and this is sought to be established as follows:—(1) As regards the surplus premium income, it is said that it has been decided in the House of Lords, in the case of Styles v. The New York Life Assurance Company,[2] that the surplus premium income of a mutual insurance company which is returned to the policy-holders is not profit; (2) as regards the interest from the invested funds of the Society, it is maintained that it also is something different from profits and gains; and (3) that as regards the purchase of reversions and re-insurances, these form a very small part of the Society's business, and must therefore be disregarded.

Thus, if the Surveyor's argument is sound, the whole fabric of the Society's business, as a business carried on for profit, disappears.

In my opinion, however, for the purposes of the present question, these considerations are one and all insufficient. The case of Styles[2] decided, and we must assume rightly, that for the purpose of the Income-Tax Statutes, premium income as such is to be regarded only as so much capital subscribed by the members of the society; and that the surplus which is returned to them simply represents part of their own money which is not required for the purposes of the business, and does not constitute profit in the sense of the Income-Tax Acts.

Assuming that the reasoning of the decision applies to inhabited house duties, surplus premium income forms only a part of the income of this and other mutual insurance societies. In regard to other sources of profit that decision has certainly no application adverse to the Society in this case. As Lord Watson says in the case of Styles[3]—"Besides issuing life policies, the appellant company issues without participation sums payable at fixed periods, sells annuities, and has funds invested which bear annual interest. It is not disputed that, in so far as its transactions relate to non-participating policies, whether for life or for periods certain, and to annuities, the company carries on a trade in the same sense as any proprietary office does; or that surplus moneys arising upon these transactions are business profits, and as such are liable to income-tax. With these profits, and with the income derived by the company from its investments, we have no concern."

Then as to the question whether income from investments does or does not constitute profit in the sense of the enactment which we have to construe, the Surveyor's argument rests on this, that in the Income-Tax Acts interest on money is separately mentioned as a subject of taxation. The later Income-Tax Acts no doubt are so worded as to reach interest upon money lent or invested, even although the person who receives the interest may make no ultimate profit in his business—Clerical, &c. Insurance Society v. Carter.[1] But it does not follow that interest from investments does not constitute profit for the purposes of this enactment. The members of a mutual society have more than one object in view in joining it. One is to obtain policies upon as good terms as possible; another is to derive gain from the profitable investment of the large accumulated funds of the Society. In this sense, therefore, I feel no doubt that interest on investments constitutes profit in the sense of the Act.

Lastly, the Society has power to deal in reversions and re-insurances, both of which involve transactions with third parties and may be expected to yield profit.

The business must be judged of as a whole, and so judged, I have no hesitation in saying that it is a business carried on for profit.

I should add that the surveyor also relied on the case of Muat v. Shaw Stewart.[2] That was a decision of seven Judges, and of course we are bound by it so far as in point. While some of the dicta certainly support the Surveyor's argument, I do not think that I misrepresent the judgment, taken as a whole, when I say that it proceeded on this view—that the premises which were occupied in Ardgowan Square, Greenock, as an estate office were not truly occupied for the purpose of any trade, business, or professional avocation, but simply to enable Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, a private gentleman of large means and estates, to transact the business connected with the management of his funds and estates more conveniently than he could do in his own house or in that of his factor. The position of a private individual, however wealthy, dealing simply with the management of his own means and estate is surely widely different from that of a large public body like this Society, which conducts its business for purposes of profit with the aid of a board of directors and a large resident staff.

In regard to the interpretation of the word "solely," I agree with Lord Trayner, with this qualification, that there may be cases in which a substantial part of a tenement may be devoted by the same occupier to purposes in which profit is not sought, so completely unconnected with the business carried on in the remainder as to forfeit the exemption. On such a case I reserve my opinion.

I am therefore of opinion with your Lordships that the Society's premises Contract—Construction—Lease or Service—Occupancy of house as part remuneration for services.—The proprietors of an estate entered into an agreement with B, a gardener, whereby B agreed to keep in order the policy grounds, garden, and avenue of the mansion-house, for which services he was to receive £15 in money, the occupancy of a cottage in the kitchen garden, and the occupancy and use for his own profit of that garden, and a cow's keep. The proprietors having thereafter dismissed B from their service brought an action to have him summarily removed from the cottage. They did not ask for his removal from the garden.

Evidence on a consideration of which it was held (diss. Lord Moncreiff) that B occupied the cottage as tenant, and that the pursuers were not entitled to have him removed except after due notice to him as tenant to remove.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Caithness, Orkney, and Shetland.

ON 25th August 1899 W. Paterson Smith, solicitor, Wick, factor to the trustees of the late Garden Duff Dunbar of Hempriggs, wrote to Donald Bruce, gardener, Ackergill (part of the Hempriggs estate), as follows:—

"As factor for the trustees of the late Garden Duff Dunbar, Esquire, of Hempriggs, I now give you notice that your services as gardener at Ackergill gardens and policy grounds will not be required by them after Martinmas next (28th November), 1899, and will then be dispensed with. You will, therefore, require to remove at that term, without further notice, from the gardener's cottage at Ackergill presently occupied by you."

Bruce not having removed from the gardener's cottage at Ackergill at Martinmas 1899, Dunbar's trustees, in December 1899, brought an action against him in the Sheriff Court at Wick for summary removing from the cottage, and from the stables and other offices occupied by him in connection therewith.

The pursuers did not pray for the defender's removal from the upper garden after mentioned.

The pursuers averred that from March 1889 the defender had been their gardener at Ackergill under an agreement by which he was to maintain in good order all the ornamental and policy grounds in and around the garden at Ackergill Tower and the avenue leading to the tower, in return for which services he was to receive and did receive £20 in cash (reduced in 1890 to £15), the use of the upper garden, a cow's keep, the occupancy of the gardener's cottage and offices, and the grass of the policy grounds; that no money rent was ever stipulated for, or received in respect of those subjects; that in April 1898 he agreed to leave at a week's notice*; and that, in consequence of the receipt of the letter of 25th August 1899, the defender's possession of the cottage had since Martinmas 1899 been vitious, precarious, and without any right or title whatever. In answer to the defender's averments, the pursuers further averred that, if the defender was tenant of the gardener's cottage, his right of occupation was only for such time as he continued in the service of the pursuers, and that consequently his holding was excluded from the operation of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, and the Market Gardeners Compensation (Scotland) Act, 1897, by section 35 of the former Act.†

The defender averred that the contract under which he was in possession of the gardener's cottage was a contract whereby he became tenant of the upper garden, gardener's cottage, and offices at Ackergill at a yearly rent of £20, and undertook to look after the avenue, policy grounds, and lower garden at Ackergill at £15 yearly of money wages and the rent of the said subjects, together £35, with a cow's keep and the grass of the policy grounds; that he was in possession of the said subjects as a market gardener; that the tenancy had been continued annually by tacit relocation; and that the factor's letter of 25th August 1899 was not a written notice of termination of tenancy within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, sec. 28.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The service of the defender to the pursuers having terminated at Martinmas 1899 (28th November), and his right to occupy the subjects above specified having thereupon ceased, and he now being in vitious and precarious possession, and having refused to remove therefrom, the pursuers are entitled to warrant and decree, as craved.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The defender being tenant of the subjects in question, and having received no legal notice of the termination of his tenancy, his right to occupy same has not ceased, and the pursuers are not entitled to warrant of ejection. (2) The defender's occupancy being that of a market gardener, he is entitled to receive the notice of termination of tenancy provided by the Market Gardeners Compensation (Scotland) Act, 1897, and the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was to the following effect:—

Prior to March 1889 the defender had been employed for a number of years as gardener at Ackergill, on ordinary conditions of service.

Dunbar's Trustees v. Bruce.

In March 1889 a new arrangement was made, in consequence of the family having ceased to reside at Ackergill, the mansion-house being occupied only by shooting tenants. This new arrangement was not committed to writing between the parties, and there was a conflict of evidence as to whether rent was mentioned as the consideration for the defender's occupancy of the gardener's cottage and the upper garden. A letter, dated 23d March 1889, from Mr Thomas Dalgleish (who was then the sole trustee under the Hempriggs trust, and had died before the date of the proof), to Mr Dunnet, the land-steward of the estate, set forth the following as the conditions of the arrangement:—

"I think it will be well to give Bruce the garden for one year upon the terms contained in the second alternative proposal in your letter to me of the 28th ulto., viz.—That he receives the sum of £20 and the proceeds of the garden, with his cow's keep, as now, and a labourer's cottage, in exchange for his keeping the whole place within the walls and the outside ground from the top of the avenue to the tower, all as at present falling under his duties."

The "garden" here mentioned was the upper garden—a kitchen garden—the "labourer's cottage" was the "gardener's cottage" now in question. There was no evidence as to whether this cottage was, properly speaking, the gardener's cottage of the Ackergill establishment, and necessary to the service of the gardener thereof. The cottage was situated in the upper garden. The defender deponed that the cottage and other offices from which it was sought to eject him "are absolutely necessary for my working of the garden." The defender adduced as witnesses two gardeners from the district, who corroborated the defender on this point, and there was no contradictory evidence.

On entering upon the occupancy of the garden and cottage the defender took over at a valuation from Mr Dalgleish, as trustee, a horse and van, which he thereafter used for taking garden produce to market, and also certain garden tools and flower-pots.

In February 1890, in consequence of differences between the parties, Mr Dalgleish inserted in a local newspaper the advertisement quoted below,* but after some negotiations the defender's engagement was continued, the money payment to him being reduced to £15.

In April 1898 the letters quoted below passed between Dunnet, the Hempriggs land-steward, and the defender.†

In the Valuation-rolls for the years 1889 to 1899 the defender was entered as tenant and occupier of the "garden, Ackergill," at the yearly rent or value of £15. The returns to the Assessor were signed by the factor for the Hempriggs estate. During these years the defender was assessed, and paid rates as tenant. In the Valuation-roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1900 the pursuers were entered as tenants and occupiers, and the defender as "Inhabitant occupier, not rated." The defender was not consulted as to the change.

In advertisements as to letting the estates for shooting it was stated that the garden was "let" to a tenant, who would supply what was required at market prices.

The defender deponed that if he had not had the use of the garden his wages ought to have been at least £80 for the services which he rendered to the pursuers; other witnesses adduced by him said at least £50.

The defender received his money wages half-yearly at Whitsunday and Martinmas. The lease claimed by him was a yearly lease beginning March 1st.

On 27th February 1900 the Sheriff-substitute (D. J. Mackenzie) pronounced this interlocutor:—(2) Finds that in March 1889 "the pursuers contracted and agreed with the defender that he was to keep in order the policy grounds, garden, and avenue at Ackergill Tower, for which services he was to receive £20 in money, and also to have the occupancy of the cottage referred to in the prayer of the petition, and was to have the occupancy and use for his own profit of what is known as the upper garden, besides a cow's keep: (3) That the defender entered upon the occupancy of the upper garden and cottage as a market gardener: (4) That the pursuers in February 1890 advertised the garden to let in terms of the advertisement quoted" [above], "but that after some negotiation the defender's occupancy thereof was continued, the money payment to him being reduced to £15, and the other conditions remaining as before: (5) That the defender has since occupied the cottage and garden on these terms: (6) That on 25th August 1899 the law-agent for the pursuers wrote the letter No. 26 of process, by which the defender's services as gardener were dispensed with by the pursuers: (7) Finds that at his entry the defender purchased from the pursuers a horse and van, gardening tools, and flower-pots, for the purpose of working the said garden as a market garden: (8) Finds that the defender has been entered as tenant by the pursuers in the Valuation-roll from the year 1889 to the year 1899, and has paid all assessments levied on him as such: (9) That it is not proved that the said cottage is necessary to the service, but that it is proved to be necessary to the defender's occupation as a market gardener: Finds in law that the defender, besides being a servant of the pursuers, occupies the cottage in question as a tenant, and that the said tenancy of the cottage in question, although forming part of the defender's remuneration, was not held during his continuance in any office, appointment, or employment of the landlord: Finds that said tenancy has not been competently brought to an end, and that the pursuers are not entitled to the warrant craved for in the petition: Therefore sustains the defences; assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the petition; finds" &c.

Dunbar's Trustees v. Bruce.

On appeal the Sheriff (Wilson), on 30th April 1900, recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and found in fact "that the defender obtained and enjoyed the occupation of the premises described in the prayer of the petition on the footing and condition that he was to occupy the same only during his continuance in the pursuers' service as their gardener, and as part of his remuneration in that capacity: Finds in law that the defender, having been discharged from the pursuers' service as at Martinmas 1899, was not, and is not, entitled to retain possession of the said premises, and that the defender having refused to remove from the said premises described in the prayer of the petition, the pursuers are entitled to decree of ejection and removing, as prayed for: Therefore decerns against the defender in terms of the prayer of the petition: Finds the defender liable to the pursuers in expenses," &c.

The defender appealed, and argued;—(1) The defender's occupancy of the cottage had been upon a verbal lease for one year from 1st March 1889, renewed annually (after March 1890) by tacit relocation. The direct evidence of the original constitution of the lease was perhaps insufficient, but the circumstances of the case were all in the defender's favour. There was nothing to support the pursuers' contention except their argument in law, which came to this—that a lease could not be part of a servant's remuneration unless the rent was so fixed that it was payable independently of the service, because otherwise, it was argued, if the service terminated before the lease, there would be a lease without any rent. That was an erroneous view. A servant's occupation of a house as part of his remuneration might be qua tenant under a lease, or it might be qua servant merely, according to circumstances. The general rule was, that if the occupation was necessary to the efficient performance of the service the occupation was qua servant merely; if on the other hand the occupation was not necessary to the efficient performance of the service, the occupation was qua tenant.[1] The defender's remuneration included not merely the occupation and use of the cottage, but also the occupation and use of the upper garden, and it was difficult to see on what ground it could be maintained that the latter occupation and use was on any other title than that of tenant. The pursuers themselves appeared to think so, for they had not attempted to have the defender removed from the garden. It could not seriously be suggested that the occupation and use, for his own benefit, of the kitchen garden was necessary to the efficient performance by the defender of his duties as gardener. Further, it was difficult to believe that the defender would not only give his services as gardener for a money payment which per se was wholly inadequate, but would also expend money and labour on the cultivation of the upper garden, if he was liable to lose the benefit of that money and labour through his services as gardener being abruptly terminated. If then the defender occupied the upper garden qua tenant, the questions came to be, was the occupation of the cottage necessary to the efficient cultivation of the upper garden? or, on the other hand, was the occupation of the cottage necessary to the efficient performance of the services of the gardener at Ackergill? On these questions the evidence was all one way. The pursuers had not attempted to prove anything about the cottage, and the defender had proved conclusively that the possession of the cottage was necessary to the working of the upper garden. The upper garden and the cottage in short were a unum quid, and if the defender was tenant of the garden he was tenant of the cottage also. The pursuers' whole conduct—or that of their factor—was in the defender's favour. They had sold a horse, van, garden tools, &c., to the defender when he entered into occupation in 1889, which was not a natural transaction in the case of a servant, but was a very natural and ordinary transaction in the case of an incoming tenant. They had advertised the subjects as being "to let" in 1889, and, in advertisements for shooting tenants, as being "let"; they had caused the defender to be entered as "tenant" in the Valuation-roll, with the result that he for nine years had paid the tenant's rates in respect of the subjects. It might be that none of these circumstances proved the constitution of a lease, but they were evidence of the pursuers' belief that a lease had been constituted, and barred them from pleading that there was none. (2) If then the defender was in possession of the cottage upon a lease, had he received the six months' notice to which he was entitled under section 28 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883? The letter on which the pursuers founded as being such notice was no doubt dated 25th August 1899, and the lease terminated on 28th February 1900. But the letter did not bear to be a notice under the Act; it was a notice to remove at the term of Martinmas immediately following, and the pursuers had, quite consistently, followed it up by bringing the present action long before the termination of the lease. It was hopeless therefore for them to maintain that the notice was a notice under the Act. Besides it was a notice to remove from the cottage only, and, the cottage and the garden being a unum quid, the pursuers could not at their own hand make a new contract by removing the defender from the cottage while they left him in occupation of the garden. Nothing was concluded by the letters of 8th April 1898, because the pursuers had not accepted the defender's conditions in his letter of that date. (3) In any view summary removing was incompetent.[1]

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) There was here one contract only—a contract of service. Part of the defender's remuneration under that contract was the occupation of the cottage, and when the pursuers terminated the contract of service, the defender's right to occupy the cottage ceased also.[2] He had not an independent lease or tenancy of the cottage entitling him to remain in occupation notwithstanding the termination of his services as gardener. One essential feature of the contract of lease was wanting—there was no rent. So long as the defender performed the services of gardener he had as part remuneration the right to occupy the cottage, but his proposition was that although he had ceased to perform these services he was entitled to remain in occupation of the cottage without paying or doing anything in return. It would have been different if the arrangement between the parties made provision for the rent which the defender would have to pay in the event of his services ceasing. As it was, the defender simply took up the position that he was entitled to continue in occupation qua tenant, but without any obligation to pay rent. No doubt the pursuers had not attempted to have the defender removed from the upper garden, but they had not abandoned their claim to do so, and the fact that they had not pressed to have the defender removed from the garden before he had reaped the full benefit of his labour and expenditure on it could not prevent them from having him removed from the cottage if he had no right to remain in occupation of either subject. Even if he had right to remain in occupation of the garden, that did not give him a right to retain the cottage, which was truly a separate subject from the garden. The cottage was the gardener's cottage of the establishment, and presumably it would not be let in such a way that it might not be available to the gardener for the time being; on the other hand the defender could perfectly well conclude his occupation and use of the garden without having the cottage. As to the entry in the Valuation-roll, that was the act of the factor, who was ignorant of the terms of the arrangement with the defender, and did not bind the pursuers. Even if they were bound by their factor's act, an entry in the Valuation-roll could not control the contract between the parties.[1] The use of the word "let" in the advertisements as to the shootings was of no moment, as accuracy of expression with regard to the garden was immaterial to the purpose of the advertisements. The advertisement of 1889 of the garden as being "to let" proved merely that it was then intended to let the garden. Besides all the advertisements related to the garden, and not, in terms at least, to the cottage. (2) The notice to quit contained in the factor's letter of 25th August 1899 was a sufficient notice. It was at all events a sufficient notice having in view Dunnet's letter of 8th April 1898 and the defender's reply thereto. Further, it was well settled that where the subjects were of small value, forty days' notice, however informal, was sufficient.[2] Neither the Agricultural Holdings Act nor the Market Gardeners Compensation Act applied to cottages.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is certain that the defender in this case held the occupation of the cottage from which the pursuers desire to eject him as part of an arrangement whereby, for a certain sum of money annually paid, and for the right to cultivate for his own profit certain garden ground on the Ackergill estate, he undertook to do gardening work in the gardens and policies of the estate. He was dismissed from the service, and the pursuers desire to eject him from the cottage as at the date of his dismissal, while he still remains in possession of the garden ground cultivated for his own profit. Such a case, where the incidents of service and occupation of lands as part remuneration for service go together, must be considered as to its circumstances and surroundings in order to arrive at the conclusion of the question whether there is tenancy or only an absolutely precarious occupation which ceases to be of right whenever the service is brought to an end. The facts are, that when the defender entered to the duties and took over the occupation of the cottage, the tools, flower-pots, and a pony and van, formerly used for taking produce to the market for the estate, were taken over at a valuation by him—a proceeding not very consistent with the idea of service, and pointing to a contract which, although involving services, had more in it than a relation of master and servant. It is certain here that to some extent the defender's remuneration was precarious, depending upon successful cropping and a good market. It is, I think, established by the evidence that the cottage from which it is sought to eject the defender is a necessary appanage of the upper garden, in which it is situated, and that without it the defender cannot work the garden properly. Yet, strangely enough, although there is no difference between the tenure of the one and of the other, they being held as under the same bargain, the pursuers appear to hold that he was not truly the tenant of the cottage while he was tenant of the garden. Their position in this matter is not easy to understand. To hold that they are separable is not, in my opinion, possible. He held the cottage as part of his holding of a market garden, which, under the agreement, he was certainly carrying on upon his own account. The two must be taken as going together. These, which are the main circumstances of the case, point with considerable directness to the justice of the defence stated. And there is real evidence under the pursuers' own official's hand that tends strongly to support the view that, in entering into the arrangement, tenancy, and not service occupation, was the true nature of the transaction. For the pursuers have themselves regularly returned the defender in the Valuation-roll schedules as "tenant" as well as occupant, and have thus caused him to be assessed as such, with the result that the tenant's taxes have been taken off the pursuers' burdens and have been exacted from the defender. Thus they have by writing in a statutory return, false statement in which is punishable by law, held him out as being the tenant to their own advantage. This continued from the first year of the occupancy down to 1899, and the defender has been no party to any alteration. Indeed, the change was not made till about the very time when the first step was taken to oust him from his possession. Further, the pursuers themselves, in negotiation writings regarding let of shooting, held the defender out as a tenant, and as such under agreement bound to supply vegetables at market prices to the shooting tenant.

The sole question now before this Court is whether upon the evidence decree of ejection from the cottage was the right of the pursuers when the summons was raised. I hold that the pursuers have failed to prove this, and substantially on the ground stated by the Sheriff-substitute, and therefore that the Court should recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff, and sustain the decision of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD TRAYNER.—The decision of the question raised by this appeal is, I think, attended with considerable difficulty, but on consideration I have come to the conclusion that the Sheriff-substitute was right, and that the appeal should be sustained. It does not appear necessary to go into any detail of the facts out of which the question has arisen, but I shall state shortly the considerations which have led me to the conclusion I have arrived at.

The application made by the respondents to the Sheriff was for a warrant summarily to eject the appellant from a cottage situated on the respondents' property. The appellant had been in the respondents' service as gardener for many years prior to March 1889. He ceased then, however, to be the gardener—that is to say, a servant on monthly or yearly wages, because, as I understand, the mansion-house ceased to be occupied by the proprietor, and was only occupied during the shooting season by the sporting tenant; and a new arrangement was made at the date I have mentioned between the appellant and the respondents' man of business. The arrangement was that the appellant should keep the avenue and policies in good order, and in return should get £20 a year in money (subsequently reduced to £15), the use of the garden, and of the gardener's cottage, which is situated in the garden. The respondents have now terminated this arrangement, and they seek to eject the appellant from the gardener's cottage, on the ground that his occupation thereof was part of his remuneration for service, and that as the service has now ceased, the right to occupy the cottage has also ceased.

No. 27.

Dunbar's Trustees v. Bruce.

Now, I observe at the outset that a warrant for summary ejection is not granted unless it is prima facie plain that the occupier is one who has and can pretend no title to the occupation challenged. I think that can scarcely be said to be the case here, for the appellant has at all events stated a case which makes it difficult to pronounce off-hand that he is a mere squatter. He might not be able successfully to resist decree in an action of removing, but it seems to me that the defence he here maintains is sufficiently plausible to prevent decree of summary ejection. But I am disposed to go much further than that, and to hold it made out that the appellant's occupancy of the cottage in question is the occupancy of a tenant as distinguished from the occupancy of a servant, and that for the following reasons—(1) The relation between the parties prior to March 1889 then underwent a change. The appellant was formerly a gardener, who not only took charge of the avenue and policies, but cultivated the garden for his employers' benefit and at his employers' expense; but after March 1889 the service rendered was less, and the cultivation of the garden was for his own benefit and at his own cost. The right to occupy the cottage may reasonably be supposed to have also undergone a change, consequent upon the changed relation between the parties; so that he who had ceased to be gardener (in the ordinary sense), and had become the tenant of the garden, became the tenant of the gardener's cottage—not in respect of his former relation, that is, servant—but in respect of his altered relation, that is, tenant of the garden. (2) When the appellant entered on the new arrangement in 1889, he took over at a valuation and paid for the respondents' horse and van (by which to take the garden produce to market), as well as the garden implements and tools. Now, a servant in the position of a gardener does not supply his own implements and tools—his master supplies them, but a tenant has to supply them for himself. In like manner the gardener does not supply the seeds, &c., each year at his own expense, nor does he receive or take as his own the produce of the garden. A tenant does both. (3) When the respondents thought of terminating their connection with the appellant in 1890 they advertised that the garden in question was "to let"—that is, they advertised for a tenant to take the appellant's place—not for a gardener or servant. And, consistently with this, when advertising for a shooting tenant, they intimated that the garden was let to a tenant who would provide the shooting tenant with garden produce at market rates. (4) From Whitsunday 1890 to Whitsunday 1899 the respondents' local man of business returned the appellant's name as "tenant" of the garden, and he was so entered on the Valuation-roll of the county for these years. This involved liability by the appellant for tenant's rates, which he paid. If he was not tenant, but servant, then these rates were properly the obligation of the respondents. The respondents (or their agents) must have known this. I cannot suppose that they allowed the appellant to pay rates for which they were alone responsible, and I can only account for their conduct by holding that the appellant was, in their knowledge and belief, the tenant of the garden.

By this application, however, the respondents do not seek to eject the appellant from the garden—only from the cottage. I think the occupancy was one, and included both cottage and garden. There is abundant evidence to shew that the cottage was and is necessary for the proper working of the garden as a market garden, and I think the one cannot be severed from the other. In the letter of 22d March 1889, which sets forth the terms of what I have called the new arrangement, the return to be made to the appellant for keeping the avenue and policies in order is, inter alia, "the proceeds of the garden . . . and a labourer's cottage." We were told at the debate that the labourer's cottage referred to is the cottage in question. Now, there is here no distinction drawn between the cottage and the produce of the garden as being remuneration of different kinds, or to be treated on different principles. Was the produce of the garden to cease to be the appellant's on the termination of service at the employers' pleasure? That will hardly be maintained. If not, why should the use of the cottage?

These are the considerations which seem to me to point somewhat conclusively in favour of the appellant's contention, and in my mind more than outweigh any difficulty arising from the fact that (1) no specific rent was fixed for the cottage, and (2) no definite ish or termination assigned to the tenancy. There was no need for the first if the cottage and garden went together; there need be no dubiety about the second. The appellant says he is a yearly tenant, and that his lease began in March. It will therefore terminate in March. This is not the usual term, no doubt, but it is quite a legal term if the parties like to make it so by their agreement. One question only remains, whether, assuming that the appellant was tenant of the cottage, he had been duly warned to quit. I think he was not. The appellant never got notice to quit the garden, and notice to quit the cottage alone would be ineffectual if, as I think, the cottage and garden formed one subject of occupation.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I regret to differ from your Lordships, but I am of opinion (though not without hesitation, for reasons which I shall afterwards mention) that the Sheriff is right in holding that the defender's occupancy of the gardener's cottage at Ackergill terminated along with his contract of service as gardener at 28th November 1899. The pursuers dismissed the defender as at that date, having given him warning on 25th August 1899 that his services would not be required after Martinmas, and having also warned him to remove at that term from the gardener's cottage. This process was brought in December 1899 to have the defender summarily ejected and removed from the cottage in question, on the footing that his occupation of the cottage was merely part of the remuneration for his services as gardener.

No. 27.

Nov. 24, 1900. Dunbar's Trustees v. Bruce.

Now, what is the defence? It is that the defender occupied the cottage and also the upper garden under a separate and independent contract of lease from year to year; that he was therefore entitled to six months' formal notice of removal under section 28 (b) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883; and that, as he did not receive such notice six months before 1st March 1900 (the end of the current year), he was entitled by tacit relocation to continue in occupation of the cottage and the garden until 1st March 1901.

If the defender were right in maintaining that he occupied the house and garden under an independent contract of lease, the result would be this—that while he was dismissed—I assume properly—from his position as gardener, he would still be entitled to remain in occupation of the garden and gardener's house of the estate for another year and a half. And if he had died instead of being dismissed, his heir or legatee would, on the same hypothesis, have had the same right.

He would also be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, and the Market Gardeners Act, 1897.

Is it to be held that such consequences were in view of the parties when the agreement was first entered into in 1889? I think not. In the first place, I may point out that it is by no means clear that even if the defender had a lease of the upper garden the cottage was let along with it. The cottage was the gardener's cottage of the estate—at least it had been occupied by the defender for many years before 1889 in his capacity of gardener. After the new arrangement was made, by which the defender agreed, as part of his remuneration, to accept the produce of the upper garden, he still continued (also as part of his remuneration) to occupy the cottage as gardener of the estate, although no doubt the cottage was convenient for the purpose of working the upper garden to advantage. And therefore I am not satisfied that the cottage, which is the only subject we have to deal with here, stands in the same position as the upper garden.

But apart from this, the occupation both of the cottage and the garden was given and accepted simply as part of the defender's remuneration. Mr Dalgleish thus states the terms in his letter of 23d March 1889:—"That he (the defender) receives the sum of £20 and the proceeds of the garden, with his cow's keep, as now, and a labourer's cottage, in exchange for his keeping the whole place within the walls and the outside ground from the top of the avenue to the tower, all as at present falling under his duties." It will be observed that the cottage and garden are not here named together. He was to have the garden for a year, he being a yearly servant. It clearly appears from the passage which I have quoted that the use of the garden and the occupation of the cottage and the cow's keep were all simply part of his remuneration.

And this was plainly so understood by him. On two occasions the agreement nearly came to an end. In February 1890, the defender having been verbally given notice to quit, Mr Dalgleish actually advertised the garden to let. According to the defender's present contention he was entitled as of right to remain in occupation of the garden for another year, but he did not then suggest that he was entitled to formal notice to remove, although the absence of it would have entitled him to remain for another year. On the contrary, he submitted, as a condition of his being allowed to remain, to accept £15 money wages instead of £20, and on that footing to continue from year to year to act as gardener and occupy the cottage and garden till 1899.

Again, in April 1898 he was willing, on certain terms, to remove from the house and garden at Ackergill on one week's notice; and here again he did not draw any distinction between his tenure of those subjects and the duration of his service.

Lastly, if his tenure of the cottage and garden did not terminate at Martinmas 1899, on what terms did he thereafter continue in occupation? Previously the return to his employer for his tenancy, if such it was, consisted of his services as gardener. These ceased at Martinmas 1899. What rent, if any, was thereafter payable? If the defender's estimate of the value of his services is correct, his occupation of the garden was equivalent to at least £35 in money—that is taking the most moderate figure spoken to in the proof, viz., £50 (the defender, I think, says £80), as the value of his services. In the few cases in which a dismissed servant has been held entitled to continue in occupation of a house belonging to his employer after dismissal, there has been not merely a fixed term of occupation but a fixed rent which could at once be ascertained notwithstanding the termination of the contract of service. The lease with all its essentials could stand alone. Here that is not the case.

All these considerations satisfy me that there was no independent lease of the cottage. There are considerations on the other side which deserve notice, although they are not in my opinion sufficient to counterbalance those which I have mentioned. By far the most formidable are the entries in the Valuation-roll. It seems that for ten years—from 1889 to 1898—the witness Mr William Smith, who collected Hempriggs rents for the pursuers, signed the returns for the Valuation-roll; and he returned the defender as tenant of the garden at Ackergill at a uniform rent of £15, and in respect of that entry the defender has paid county rates and poor rates. This is certainly a strong point against the pursuers, and I have been in some doubt whether it was not sufficient to bar them personally from disputing that the defender was an ordinary tenant. If the pursuers are right the defender should have been entered as "inhabitant occupier," and the pursuers must suffer for the carelessness of their official. But when the return is examined, it is far from conclusive. In the first place, it does not refer to the cottage, which in all arrangements with the defender was dealt with as a separate subject. The smallness of the rent inserted indicates this. Secondly, the rent entered, £15, was not, in any view which can be taken, the value which the use of the garden represented in calculating the remuneration to the defender. According to the evidence it was at least £35. And thirdly, although it is true that the defender paid taxes, these in ten years only amounted to £12, 11s. 1d.

No. 27.

Dunbar's Trustees v. Bruce.

The only other matters of importance are that when the agreement was entered into the defender purchased certain garden tools and a horse and van; and that he claims compensation for manures and plants put by him into the garden. As against this it must be considered that he got the full benefit of the fruit trees and plants which were in the garden when he got the use of it, and also, during a certain time, of the manure. It may or may not be that he has a claim for compensation against the pursuers, although in the view I take of his rights I think this more than doubtful. But from all that I can see of the case I do not think that the defender is much to be pitied. The garden has evidently proved to be a good speculation; and although the pursuers sought to remove him from the cottage summarily they have allowed him to occupy the garden for a full year after he ceased to be in their service. On the whole matter, although I am very much dissatisfied with the way in which the proof has been taken (many matters which could easily have been made clear being left uncertain) and with the carelessness of the returns for the Valuation-roll, I am satisfied that the good faith of the agreement was that the defender's occupation of the cottage and garden was to terminate with the defender's service as gardener.

MRS JANE MONAGHAN, Appellant.—Glegg—W. Thomson.
UNITED COLLIERIES, LIMITED, Respondents.—Campbell, Q.C.—Crabb Watt.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), secs. 1 (1) and 7—Mine—Siding adjacent to and belonging to mine—"On or in or about"—Work extraneous to proper business of employer—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 58), sec. 75.—The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, incorporates the definition of "mine" in the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, under which the term "mine" includes any siding "adjacent to and belonging to the mine."

A colliery company, owners of a coal-mine and siding connecting the mine with a main line of railway, entered into a contract with the owner of a sand-pit situated on the main line to carry sand from the sand-pit in railway waggons to the colliery siding, preparatory to removal by the railway company. The haulage was to be done by an engine belonging to the colliery company, and used in connection with their mine and siding. The siding was about 80 yards in length, and served only the one mine. The sand-pit was 300 or 400 yards from the siding.

In the course of executing this contract the brakesman of the engine, who was in the employment of the colliery company, was killed while uncoupling waggons on the main line at or near the extremity of the siding.

Held (1) that the employment of the deceased was locally "about" a mine in the sense of sec. 7, subsec. (1), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897; and (2) (diss. Lord Adam) that a claim for compensation arose although the work upon which the deceased was employed at the time of the accident was not part of the proper business of the colliery.

Nov. 27, 1900. Monaghan v. United Collieries, Limited.

1st Division. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

Mrs Jane Bevis or Slamin, afterwards Monaghan, widow, Craigneuk, Motherwell, brought a claim before one of the Sheriffs-substitute of Lanarkshire at Glasgow (Guthrie), as arbitrator, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in respect of the death of her son, James Slamin, against his employers, the United Collieries, Limited.

The arbitrator having disallowed the claim, stated a case at the instance of the claimant to the First Division.

The case set forth:—"1. That the appellant's son, James Slamin, was employed by the respondents as brakesman of a pug-engine used in connection with their collieries at Victoria Pit, near Motherwell.

"2. That the said James Slamin, on 5th March 1900, proceeded with said engine along the siding belonging to the colliery, and was directed by the engine-driver to detach two empty waggons from a train on the line of the Caledonian Railway in order that the respondents' said engine might take them to a sand-hole 300 or 400 yards distant on the said Caledonian line towards Motherwell.

"3. That while the said James Slamin was engaged uncoupling said waggons he was caught between the buffers of these waggons and of the waggons still remaining on the line, and so injured that he died within a few minutes thereafter.

"4. That the respondents had contracted with the tenant of the sand-hole, a Mr Fleck, to remove the sand for him from said sand-hole by their said engine in the railway company's waggons.

"5. That the two waggons in question were to be taken to the sand-hole by said pug-engine, loaded there, brought back to the defenders' siding, weighed there, and thereafter removed by the railway company. The sand-hole traffic had to do with the collieries only in so far as the colliery engine was used by agreement to carry the sand to Caledonian Railway trains, which were made up at or near the colliery siding.

"On these facts I found in law that the work which the said James Slamin was doing at the time of his death was not employment on, in, or about a mine.

"I therefore assoilzied the respondents, and found them entitled to expenses.

"The question submitted for the opinion of the Court is—Whether, in the circumstances, the death of James Slamin, the appellant's son, was caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment as a workman with the respondents on or in or about a mine?"

At the hearing counsel for the parties stated that they were agreed that the length of the siding was about 80 or 100 yards, that it served only the respondents' colliery, and that Slamin was injured on the main line of the Caledonian Railway at or near the extremity of the colliery siding.

Argued for the appellant;—Two questions were raised—first, whether the place where the deceased was injured was locally "about" a mine; and secondly, whether, looking to the nature of the work on which he was engaged, he was "in the course of employment" about a mine. It was plain that the first of these questions must be answered in the affirmative. Section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act defined "mines" by reference to the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, which, by section 75, declared "mine" to include, inter alia, "tramways and sidings, both below ground and above ground, and adjacent to and belonging to the mine."* The case of Turnbull v. Lambton Collieries, Limited,[1] cited by the respondents, was distinguishable. There the siding was twelve miles in length, and connected several collieries with the main line of the North-Eastern Railway. The whole siding here was "adjacent to" the mine, and was thus part of the mine. The accident took place at or near the extremity of the siding, and its locus was thus "about" the mine.[2] The cases of Francis v. Turner Brothers[3] and Fenn v. Miller,[4] relied on by the respondents, had no bearing. As regarded the second question, it was to be observed that throughout the Act the word "employment" was used to denote various trades with reference to the places where such trades were carried on. Thus in section 7 the employments to which the Act applied were defined as employment "on or in or about" a railway, factory, mine, &c., shewing that what was contemplated was "locality," and not the specific nature of the employer's business. It was not legitimate to add to the words of the section "and engaged on the main work carried on there," as the respondents, for the success of their argument, were compelled to do. What the Act looked at was the class of work usually carried on in such places, and here the man was engaged in just such work as he was usually employed upon, uncoupling waggons "about" the mine.

Argued for the respondents;—In dealing with the first question the proper test was to assume that the deceased was employed on colliery business, and that the accident occurred about 80 or 100 yards from the mine, using the word in its natural sense. In this view the accident could not be said to have occurred "about" the mine.[5] Under the definition of mine the siding was only included so far as "adjacent" to the mine—Turnbull v. Lambton Collieries.[1] As soon, therefore, as trucks were moved from the pithead in the course of carrying away coal from the mine they ceased to be "adjacent." The class of risks then changed from risks incidental to work about a mine, and became risks incidental to transit. Such transit was not employment about the mine. The second question depended upon the construction of section 1 (1) of the Act, and particularly of the words "arising out of and in the course of his employment" by the undertakers "on or in or about a mine." Here the plant was used for purposes different from mining purposes, and the accident occurred outside the physical limits of the mine. "Employment," as used in the Act, meant "class of work" and not "contract of service." There was nothing illegal in an employer carrying on several different classes of employment, for which he employed the same workmen, but it did not follow that a workman was entitled to compensation when injured in employment to which the Act did not apply merely because he was also employed, under the same contract of service, at other times in the class of work to which the Act did apply. The case of Milner v. Great Northern Railway Co.[1] supported this view.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After stating the facts)—By section 7 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it is declared that the Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers as therein defined on or in or about (inter alia) a mine, and by subsection (2) it is declared that "mine" means a mine to which the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, or the Metalliferous Mines Act, 1872, applies.

By section 75 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, it is declared that "'mine' includes every shaft in the course of being sunk, and every level and inclined plane in the course of being driven, and all the shafts, levels, planes, works, tramways, and sidings, both below ground and above ground, in and adjacent to and belonging to the mine." The last "and" in this definition appears to be used as equivalent to "or."

From the statements made at the bar, I understood the parties to be agreed that the length of the siding from the Victoria Pit to the Caledonian Railway line is about 80 yards, and that the siding has no connection with and serves no other pit.

If such an accident had happened to Slamin at the place where it did happen when waggons used in the ordinary colliery business of the respondents were being uncoupled or moved into or out of the siding in pursuance of that business, I should not have thought it doubtful that the accident arose out of and in the course of Slamin's employment by the respondents on, in, or about a mine, within the meaning of section 7 of the Act of 1897, and what actually did happen was different only in respect that the waggons were not at the time being used in the proper business of the colliery. Slamin was however working in the employment of the respondents, with their pug-engine, under the orders of their servant, the driver, in a matter outside of the proper business of the colliery, but incidental to that business in the sense that the sand-haulage provided employment for the pug-engine when it was not fully employed with proper colliery work. The proximity of the locus to the siding was such that I think it was "about" the colliery in the sense of the statute in so far as local situation is concerned, and I cannot say that the character of the work which was being done could not be reasonably described as incidental to the colliery business, and in that sense also "about" a mine. I suppose the profits of the sand-haulage would be treated as profits of the colliery, though we are not informed as to this.

For these reasons, I consider that the question put in the case should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD ADAM.—(After stating the facts)—It is in these circumstances that we are asked whether Slamin's death was caused by accident arising out of, and in the course of, his employment as a workman with the respondents on, in, or about a mine?

Monaghan v. United Collieries, Limited.

I think that it is clear that, at the time of the accident Slamin was on the line of the Caledonian Railway, and was not on the respondents' siding, or in any part of their collieries; but I think that it is equally clear that he was in the immediate vicinity of the siding, which admittedly is a part of their pit or mine.

I think it also clear that he was not, at the time, employed in any work in connection with the mine. The work that he was employed on was Mr Fleck's work, the removal of sand from the sand-pit.

I think, therefore, that the question in this case comes to be whether because Slamin was injured in the immediate vicinity of the mine, and in that sense "about" the mine, a claim for compensation arises, although he was not at the time engaged in work connected with the mine.

The clauses of the Workmen's Compensation Act which deal with this matter are sections 1 (1) and 7 (1).

Sec. 1 (1) declares that "if in any employment to which this Act applies, personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman" his employer shall be liable to pay compensation. Sec. 7 (1) defines the employments to which the Act applies. It enacts that the Act shall apply only to employments by the undertakers on, in, or about a railway, factory, mine, and so on.

Now, it appears to me that the word "employment," as used in the Act, refers to the nature and character of the work at which the workman is actually employed at the time of the accident, and that the accident must have arisen out of and in the course of that employment. The Act, it appears to me, does not concern itself with the contract between the employer and the workman. Nor do I think it material that the respondents were in this case both owners of the mine and contractors for the removal of the sand. The material fact is that, on the occasion in question, Slamin was being employed by them in their character of contractors.

The question, therefore, appears to me to be whether or not the employment, at which Slamin was engaged at the time, and in the course of which he was injured, was one to which the Act applies. Now, the employment at which Slamin was engaged at the time was that of removing sand from Mr Fleck's sand-pit, an employment to which it is not said that the Act applies, and with regard to which it is found in fact that it "had to do with the collieries only in so far as the colliery engine was used by agreement to carry the sand to Caledonian Railway trains, which were made up at or near the colliery siding."

Does then an employment to which per se the Act does not apply become an employment to which the Act does apply because the place where the accident occurs happens to be "about" the mine, in the sense only that it occurred near or in the immediate vicinity of it? I cannot accept that construction of the Act, which seems to me to lead to the conclusion that any accident to a workman, in the course of his employment, no matter what the nature of that employment may be, will give rise to a claim for compensation under the Act, provided only the accident occurs near, or in the vicinity of, a railway, factory, or mine.

When the Act declares that it shall apply to employment on, in, or about a railway, factory, or mine, I think it has reference to the nature and character of the work carried on at such undertakings, and that by the introduction of the word "about" a railway, factory, or mine, no more is intended than that a workman who is employed in or on a railway, factory, or mine, shall not be excluded from the benefit of the Act, which otherwise he would have had, merely because the accident has occurred outside the area of the railway, factory, or mine.

For these reasons I think the question should be answered in the negative.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur with the Lord President.

LORD KINNEAR.—The question is one of some difficulty. But I have come to the same conclusion as the Lord President and Lord M'Laren, and for the same reasons.

By the first section of the statute, an employer is liable in compensation to his workmen, only in cases where the workman has been personally injured by accident arising out of and in the course of employment to which the Act applies; and the employments to which the Act applies are enumerated in the seventh section. Reading these two sections together, it seems to be clear that to establish the claim for compensation three conditions must be satisfied:—(1) The injured workman must have been in the employment of persons who answer the statutory description of undertakers. (2) The employment must have been on, in, or about a railway, mine, factory, or engineering work, or on, in, or about buildings in the course of construction under certain conditions. (3) The accident must have arisen out of and in the course of the employment.

(1) The first point creates no difficulty. The deceased was employed by the respondents as a brakesman on a colliery siding belonging to them; the word mine, as used in the statute by the definition includes the siding; and the respondents as owners are beyond question undertakers within the meaning of the statute, in respect of the mine and its siding.

(2) The second point also is, I think, satisfactorily established. In all the cases, so far as I know, in which we have had occasion to construe the words "on, in, or about," they have been held to define the locality at which the injured man must be employed, in order to found his claim for compensation. It may be, as the respondents maintained, that the mere presence of a servant of the undertakers in a mine or factory when an accident happens will not bring him within the scope of the Act, if he is not employed to work in such mine or factory. But in applying that doctrine to the present case, it must be kept in view that it is not necessary that the deceased should have been employed in the mine proper. It is enough that he was employed on the siding, which for the purpose of the statute is just as much part of the mine as the underground workings. Accordingly it is not disputed that if the accident by which the deceased man was injured had happened to him while he was at work on the siding, this condition would have been satisfied, because what the Act calls a mine includes, according to the definition, a siding. On the other hand, it is clear enough that the Caledonian Railway is not on or in either the mine proper or the siding. The question then is whether the particular part of the line where the accident happened is or is not "about" the siding. I think it is. In Powell v. Brown[1] it was held that "about" was an enlarging word, and that as the Legislature had not confined the Act to employment on or in a factory, or on or in the other places specified, the language of the section would be satisfied if the employment were in close proximity to one or other of such places. Was the injury then sustained at a place near enough to the siding to come within the scope of the Act? The Sheriff's statement as to this is not perhaps so distinct and specific as it might have been. But he says enough to make it plain to my mind that the uncoupling of waggons which is the operation out of which the accident arose, took place at a point on the line so close to the siding as to come within the words "in or about" if any force is to be given to these words. The case seems to me in this respect to be very similar to Powell v. Brown,[1] where a man loading timber into a cart on the street outside the entrance to his master's factory was held to have received an injury "in or about" the factory. On the other hand, it is plainly distinguishable from such cases as the case cited[2] in which a carter was hurt by an accident on the high road more than a mile from his employer's factory, or as Francis v. Turner,[3] where a workman employed in a factory was sent on his employer's business to another factory belonging to a different person, and was injured there by the fall of an engine shed. In each of these cases the locality of the accident was remote from the place at which the employer carried on his business, and persons frequenting it were exposed to other risks than those for which the statute makes the employer responsible.

(3) The remaining question is whether the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment of the injured man. This is perhaps more troublesome than either of the others; but in my opinion the reasons for the appellant must prevail. There would have been no difficulty if the waggons which the deceased was ordered to uncouple had been intended to carry coals from the pit mouth to the Caledonian Railway, or materials for the use of the colliery from the railway to the pit. But they were intended to be taken to a sand-hole 300 or 400 yards off and there to be loaded with sand, brought back to the respondents' siding and weighed, and thereafter removed by the Caledonian Railway Company; and it is stated that the said "traffic had to do with the collieries only in so far as the colliery engine was used by agreement to carry the sand to Caledonian trains which were made up at or near the siding." This makes it clear enough that the carrying of sand for hire was not part of the proper business of the respondents as a colliery company. But that seems to me to be nothing to the purpose. They are not undertakers in respect of their mercantile business, but in respect of their ownership of the mine and siding, and their employment of workmen in these dangerous places. The question therefore is not what load the waggons were to carry, but whether the making up of a train of waggons in the manner described was work which the injured man was employed by the respondents to do on the siding in respect of which they are undertakers in the sense of the statute? I think that on the statement before us, the answer must be in the affirmative. The injured man's employment was not to carry any particular load. What we are told is that he was employed as brakesman of a pug-engine. It must be assumed, for there is no suggestion to the contrary, that the order to detach waggons from a train on the Caledonian line and to attach them to his own engine was a lawful order, which the man was bound to obey. In other words, when the accident happened he was acting in obedience to orders, in the discharge of his duty, and in the course of the work he was employed to do. It appears to me irrelevant to inquire what was the contract under which the respondents engaged to carry sand to their siding, or what their reason was for using their engine in that way. They were still undertakers in respect of the siding, they employed the injured man to work upon it, and while he was working on or about it in the ordinary course of his employment he met with the injury which caused his death.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the affirmative.

Water Supply—Right of Support for Pipes laid under Statutory Authority—Compensation—Minerals under and adjacent to Aqueduct—Presumption—Edinburgh Water Act, 1819 (59 Geo. III., cap. cxvi.)—Edinburgh Water Company Act, 1843 (6 and 7 Vict. cap. lxxxix.).—By an Act passed in 1819 (59 Geo. III. cap. cxvi.), the Edinburgh Water Company was empowered to lay a pipe for bringing water from the Crawley Spring into the city, and in 1821 a track was opened and a pipe laid, a portion of which passed through the lands of Pentland and Straiton, and water was thereafter brought in continuously by the pipe to Edinburgh.

In 1898 the Edinburgh and District Water Trustees, who were vested in the rights and property of the original water company, raised an action against the Clippens Oil Company, who had come to be the owners of Straiton, and were tenants of the minerals in Pentland, and also against the owner of Pentland, for declarator that the pursuers were entitled to have their pipe or aqueduct in Straiton and Pentland supported so as to serve uninterruptedly as a conduit for the water, and that the defenders were not entitled so to work the minerals as to injure or bring down the pipe, and for interdict.

The defenders pleaded that the pursuers had no right of support for their pipe either under the Act of 1819 or at common law.

A proof was led. It was not established that any compensation had been paid to the owners of Pentland and Straiton in respect of the pipe being laid through their lands, but it was proved that they were cognisant of the pipe being so laid.

Held (1) that the Act of 1819 on a sound construction of it contained clauses under which the owners of lands in whose ground the pipe was laid were entitled to claim compensation for any injury thereby occasioned to them; (2) that after the lapse of seventy years from the date when the pipe was laid, it must be assumed either that compensation had been paid or that the right thereto had been waived; and (3)—following London and North-Western Railway Company v. Evans, L. R. [1893], 1 Ch. 16—that the statutory right to lay the pipe carried with it a right of support for the pipe, and interdict granted.

Held further, that the Edinburgh Water Company's Act, 1843 (6 and 7 Vict. cap. lxxxix.), did not apply to "works" which had already been executed under the powers conferred by the Act of 1819.

Property—Right to lateral support—Minerals—Right to work minerals to prejudice of adjacent ground—Interdict.—A water company in 1821 under statutory authority constructed an aqueduct through certain lands. In 1825 the owner granted the company a feu-disposition of a strip of ground 25 yards wide (including the minerals) "in which the aqueduct pipe is laid." Held that the feu-disponees were entitled to lateral support sufficient not only for the ground acquired by them, but also for the pipe running through it, and to interdict against the disponers so working the minerals adjacent to the feu as to interfere with this right of support.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Pearson.

On 27th April 1898 the Edinburgh and District Water Trustees, incorporated under the Edinburgh and District Water-Works Act, 1869, raised an action against the Clippens Oil Company, Limited, and against Major John Gibsone of Pentland, concluding for declarator (first) that the pursuers were vested by virtue of their Act of 1869 in all the powers, privileges, and property of the Edinburgh Joint Stock Water Company, incorporated by the Act 53 Geo. III. cap. cxvi. (1819), entitled "an Act for more effectually supplying the city of Edinburgh and places adjacent with water," and of the successors of that company, incorporated by the Water Company's Acts of 1843 and 1856, and that the pursuers as so vested, and more particularly as vested in the Castlehill Reservoir in the city of Edinburgh, "have good and undoubted right to receive in the said reservoir from the Crawley Spring a continuous and uninterrupted supply of water by means of a pipe or aqueduct laid, inter alia, in a strip of ground about 1083 yards long and about 25 yards wide," in the parish of Lasswade, belonging to the pursuers, and in the lands of Pentland, from where the pipe emerges from the strip of ground belonging to the pursuers to the boundary of Major Gibsone's property, and thence through the lands of Straiton, belonging to the defenders, the Clippens Oil Company, for 815 yards or thereby, "and that the pursuers have good and undoubted right to have the said strip of ground and the said pipe or aqueduct, in so far as it is laid in the said strip of ground and in the said lands of Pentland and Straiton, supported so that the said pipe or aqueduct may serve continuously and uninterruptedly as a conduit for the water passing from the said Crawley Spring to the said Castlehill Reservoir; and (second) that the defenders, the Clippens Oil Company, Limited, as lessees of the minerals in the said lands of Pentland, on both sides of the said strip of ground belonging to the pursuers, and where the said pipe is laid, and as the owners of the lands and minerals of Straiton, are not entitled to work the shale, limestone, and other minerals adjacent to the said strip of ground, and adjacent to or under the said pipe or aqueduct belonging to the pursuers, in such manner as to injure the said strip of ground or bring down the surface thereof, or to injure the said pipe or aqueduct, or to bring it down or affect or interfere with the continuous flow of water through the said pipe or aqueduct from the Crawley Spring to the Castlehill Reservoir in any way."

There were also conclusions that the Court should, "by remit to a person or persons of skill or otherwise," fix and determine the limits within which the defenders shall be bound to abstain from working, or otherwise the manner and conditions in and under which the workings may go on adjacent to the feu, and under and adjacent to the pipe, and for interdict against the company working the minerals adjacent to and under the strip of ground and the pipe or aqueduct so as to injure or bring them down, and from working within the limits to be fixed by the Court.

The pursuers averred that their predecessors, the Edinburgh Joint Stock Water Company, were empowered by an Act passed in 1819 (59 Geo. III. cap. cxvi.) to take and use the Crawley Spring, and by section 38 thereof to make the necessary works for conducting the water therefrom to the city, that the company acquired the reservoir on the Castlehill at Edinburgh and also the Crawley Spring, and in 1821 constructed a pipe or aqueduct for conducting the water from the spring to the reservoir. "The said pipe or aqueduct has remained in the same position ever since it was laid in 1821."

The pursuers also averred that the strip of ground mentioned in the summons was acquired by their predecessors from the proprietor of Pentland under feu-disposition dated 3d March 1825;* that the defenders were proprietors of Straiton, and also tenants of the minerals in Pentland; that the defenders and their predecessors had worked the minerals in Straiton and Pentland adjacent to the place where the pipe or aqueduct passed through them; that the operations of the company threatened to deprive the strip of ground and the pipe or aqueduct of support; that the result of such deprivation would be to interrupt the flow of the water to Edinburgh; and that, notwithstanding remonstrances, the company continued to work the minerals near and under the strip and aqueduct.

The pursuers stated further that it was estimated that in order to give adequate support to the strip of ground and aqueduct it was necessary that the minerals should not be further worked for 45 yards on the south or east side of the pipe and 145 yards on the north or west side.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The pursuers, under the statutes in virtue of which the said pipe or aqueduct was laid, and at common law, being entitled to have adequate support therefor where it passes

* The feu-disposition proceeded on the narrative that, "considering that by an Act of Parliament passed in the fifty-ninth year of the reign of his late Majesty George the Third, entitled, 'An Act for more effectually supplying the city of Edinburgh and places adjacent with water,' the Edinburgh Joint Stock Water Company constituted by the said Act are, inter alia, authorised to make . . . the necessary cuts, trenches, conduits, mounds, or other works for conducting the water thereof to the said city in the line or lines pointed out in the map or plan attached to the said Act of Parliament; and to construct the necessary aqueduct or aqueducts and lay the necessary pipe or pipes for that purpose; and that I agreed to sell to the said company the piece of ground after disponed for the sum of three hundred and fifty pounds fifteen shillings sterling; . . . therefore I have sold and disponed, as I hereby sell, alienate, and in feu-farm dispone from me, my heirs and successors, to and in favour of . . . the present directors or committee of management of the said Edinburgh Joint Stock Water Company, . . . through the said strip of ground and the lands of Pentland and Straiton, so as to receive through it a continuous and uninterrupted flow of water from the Crawley Spring to the Castlehill Reservoir, decree should be granted in terms of the first declaratory conclusion. (3) The defenders, the Clippens Oil Company, Limited, having no right or title to take away the support from the said strip of ground and pipe or aqueduct where it is laid in the said strip of ground and lands of Pentland and Straiton, or to cause any interruption to or interference with the flow of water through the said pipe or aqueduct from the Crawley Spring to the Castlehill Reservoir, decree should be granted in terms of the second declaratory conclusion.

The Clippens Oil Company lodged defences, in which they pleaded, inter alia;—(1) Res judicata. (5) The pursuers' averments so far as material being unfounded in fact, the defenders should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons. (7) The pursuers having no right of support either under statute or at common law, the defenders should be assoilzied.

After sundry procedure the defenders' plea of res judicata was repelled.[1]

Thereafter, on 28th July 1899, the Lord Ordinary allowed parties a proof.

The evidence entered largely into the question of the nature of the operations being conducted by the defenders, and the effect of these operations on the pipe or aqueduct, and also of the kind and efficiency of the support which the defenders—if they were liable to give support to the pipe—maintained could be substituted for the natural strata of the ground in the event of the minerals in the vicinity of the aqueduct being worked out. There was no proof of actual payment of compensation to the defenders' authors at the time the pipe was laid, but it appeared that the latter were well aware that the pipe was being laid in and through their lands.* For the purposes of this report, the effect of the evidence otherwise sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Lord President.

The statutes referred to are sufficiently quoted in the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and of the Lord President.

On 28th June 1900 the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds and declares in terms of the first and second declaratory conclusions of the summons: Finds that within the limit after mentioned the shale, limestone, and other minerals adjacent to the pursuers' strip of ground, and adjacent to or under the pursuers' pipe or aqueduct, described in the summons, cannot be wrought out without imminent risk of bringing down the surface of the said strip of ground and the said pipe—that is to say, the limit formed by lines drawn from the points to be supported perpendicular to the plane of the strata on the rise side, and at an inclination of one in five towards the dip: And finds that within said limit the defenders the Clippens Oil Company, Limited, are bound to abstain from working the said shale, limestone, and other minerals: Interdicts, prohibits, and discharges the said defenders from working the said shale, limestone, and other minerals within the said limit, and decerns: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c. *

* "OPINION.—The pursuers of this action, the Edinburgh and District Water Trustees, have two main water pipes, which, on their way to Edinburgh, traverse the lands of Pentland and Straiton. In this part of their course these two pipes lie side by side, a few feet apart, in what is practically the same pipe-track. The one pipe carries the Crawley springs, and was laid in and shortly after the year 1820. The other, which was laid in or about 1876, carries the Moorfoot water.

"Pentland and Straiton are mineral estates, the most valuable seams being shale and limestone. After entering Pentland, the pipes are laid for a little over a thousand yards in a narrow strip of ground, which is held in feu by the pursuers, inclusive of the minerals, and which their predecessors acquired in 1825. With that exception, the defenders, the Clippens Oil Company, are lessees of the minerals in Pentland; and they are proprietors of Straiton, including the minerals.

"The main purpose of the present action is to have the Crawley pipe protected from being brought down or injured by the defenders' mineral workings. . . .

"The pursuers' first contention is that their Crawley pipe was laid, under a statute of 1819, by their predecessors the Edinburgh Water Company, to whose rights they have succeeded; and that these rights include the absolute right of support for this pipe. This depends on the terms of that statute, and what followed upon it.

"The Act is entitled 'An Act for more effectually supplying the city of Edinburgh and places adjacent with water.' It appears that there were two previous Acts having the same object, which apparently vested the management in the Town-Council. For this the Act of 1819 substituted a company, named the Edinburgh Joint Stock Water Company, the members of which were in large part leading citizens of Edinburgh, and included as a member the corporation itself, under the style of the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of the city. It was also provided that the Town-Council should have a substantial representation on the board of directors, as set forth in sec. 15.

"The company were empowered to make and divide profits; but these profits were not to exceed a certain percentage on the amount actually expended by the company.

"The Act was an enabling Act, and a period of ten years was allowed for the completion of the works. I was not referred to any clause of the Act which renders the maintenance of the supply obligatory on the company. Nor does it appear whether any such provision had a place in the previous Acts; although by sec. 34, which transfers the existing waterworks from the corporation, and vests them in the new company, the company are taken bound to free and relieve the corporation 'of all obligations incumbent on them for or in respect of supplying water either to the inhabitants or to any of the public institutions in the city.' A certain limited right to complain of the supply is conferred by sec. 101, which provides that any person thinking himself 'aggrieved by a partial distribution of the supply of water by the said company' may apply to the Sheriff, who shall make such order therein, binding on the company 'for the period of time during which such company shall have contracted and agreed to supply with water the person making such complaint,' as to him shall seem just.

"By sec. 36 the company were empowered to take certain springs, including the Crawley Spring, and the necessary ground adjoining for reservoirs and the like.

"Sec. 38 is one of the more important sections. It deals with two dif-

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The right claimed by the pursuers was one of absolute support for their Crawley pipe. It was admitted that, except for that part of the track which passed through the feu, they had no formal title to the ground. It was further admitted, or if not admitted it had been proved and was the fact, that, apart from the sum paid by them in respect of the feu, they had paid no compensation for the ground occupied by the pipe-track. There was nothing in the Act of 1819 which directly or expressly gave the pursuers a right of support for their pipe. "Support" and "minerals" were not mentioned in the Act at all, nor was there anything which impliedly conferred such a right. The undertaking was not of a public nature. The Water Company might have dissolved at any time without the proposed work ever being completed. There was nothing to suggest a compulsory supply of water to the city, and there was no obligation to maintain the works. In fact, the whole affair was a commercial speculation; the public had no right to the Crawley works. All that the 1819 Act empowered the company to do with regard to property was to contract for the acquisition of land, and there was nothing which put on any private proprietor the obligation ferent matters. It empowers the company (1) to 'take and use grounds and premises' for reservoirs at places described in a deposited plan; and (2) to make the necessary cuts, trenches, conduits, mounds, or other works for conducting the water of the springs to the city, in the line or lines pointed out in the said plan, 'and to construct the necessary aqueduct or aqueducts, and lay the necessary pipe or pipes for that purpose, first giving one month's notice of such their intention to the owner or owners, and occupier or occupiers, of such grounds and premises, and making satisfaction to such owner or owners, and occupier or occupiers, in manner hereinafter directed.' And then follows a provision for access to the grounds through which the water may be conducted, for inspection and repair of the 'line or track of the aqueduct,' the company indemnifying the owner or occupier for all damages thereby done.

"Now, in ascertaining the legal position of the pipes so laid, it is of course important for the defenders, if they can shew that the statute draws a distinction between ground taken as for reservoirs and ground used as for a pipe-track; and that the clause as to making satisfaction to owners and occupiers—namely sec. 73—applies to the former case, and not the latter. The language of both clauses certainly lends itself to the defenders' criticism; but I am unable to adopt the construction which they suggest. It is true that by sec. 38 it is the owners and occupiers of 'such grounds and premises' to whom satisfaction is to be made, and that in the preceding part of the clause the expression 'grounds and premises' is used with reference to making reservoirs, and not to laying pipes; and further, that while the power conferred as to reservoirs is 'to take and use grounds,' the expression used as to the aqueducts is simply power 'to make the necessary cuts . . . to construct the necessary aqueduct . . . and lay the necessary pipe or pipes.' It is further pointed out that in the clause as to making satisfaction (sec. 73), the claim to be made by the owners or occupiers is described as 'the sum which they demand as damage or recompense for the ground or other subjects taken, or to be taken, for the purposes of this Act.' Giving all due weight to these considerations, my opinion is that these sections, read as a whole, clearly import the right of anyone through whose lands the pipe passes to make a claim in respect thereof. The case dealt with in sec. 73 as opening a claim for 'satisfaction' is the case of an owner of any grounds or other property required for the purposes of the Act, specified in the schedule thereto, refusing to treat, contract, or of claiming compensation when his land was being occupied under the penalty of losing absolutely all right to do so in the future. Section 73 was the only section about making satisfaction, and that section applied only to ground taken for reservoirs. It did not apply to ground taken for the pipe-track. Evans' case[1] was distinguishable. Here it was a commercial speculation; there it was a public undertaking. There compensation, however inadequate it had proved, was paid; here no compensation had been paid. Besides the statutes under construction were different, and it was not competent to infer a right from one statute by analogy to another.[2] The company's right was not one of property, but only a statutory licence to open out the ground and put a pipe in, and such a bare right as that could not infer a right of support. At common law the pursuers had no right of aqueduct; there was no express grant of such a servitude, and no prescriptive acquisition of such. Mere occupation of the ground would not found such a right, for that would be attributed to tolerance.[3] Implied grant was out of the question, for the origin of the thing was known. The actings of parties shewed the meaning which they had put on the 1819 Act, which was very much in the position of a contract. The company agree to sell the same, 'or to allow the company to enter upon, use, or take the same for the purposes of this Act.' I cannot doubt that this includes the case of ground entered upon and used for a pipe-track; and a reference to the schedule shews that the very ground now in question is therein specified under the general heading of 'Aqueduct from Crawley Spring to the city of Edinburgh.' Then, recurring to sec. 38, the direction as to giving one month's notice to the owner and occupier, and making satisfaction to him, is grammatically connected in the most direct manner with what goes immediately before as to making aqueducts and laying pipes.

"Then it is said that by sec. 75 it is provided that payment is to be a condition precedent to lawful possession by the company; and that there is no proof of payments by the company to the defenders' predecessors in respect of the pipe-track. They take a piece of ground in feu, where the pipe required to be in deep cutting; and they have an express title to that. But as regards the parts where the pipe is simply laid in the ground and covered over, no title is shewn, and no payment proved; and the suggestion is, that this was so trivial an interference with the proprietary right that the statute may well be supposed to have taken no account of it in the matter of compensation. But if the statute uses language which covers the case, as I think it does, it is more natural either (1) to suppose that the proprietors of Pentland and Straiton were ready to waive their claim to compensation for the pipe-track; or (2) to presume after so long a time as eighty years that all claims were settled and paid. Certainly the documents produced, dated in and shortly after 1820, shew both as regards Pentland and Straiton that parties were in active negotiation as to matters arising out of the pipe laying,—such as, the sums to be awarded to the had consistently treated the Crawley pipe as if it were, in the matter of support, in precisely the same position as the Moorfoot pipe, i.e., liable to have the minerals under it worked out unless notice to take them was given by the Water Trustees. Passing on to the 1843 Act, there was found there a perfectly different code. Compulsory powers were introduced applicable alike to new works and to existing works—those authorised by the 1819 Act. Minerals were for the first time dealt with. The later Act, differing from the earlier, introduced permanency and a working code accordingly. Under that Act the trustees were bound to pay compensation before acquiring any right to the land under their pipe. If, however, a right of support was to be implied, or if the pursuers were held to have a right of aqueduct, the right in neither case was such as to warrant an interdict against working out the minerals unless it were shewn that to do so would annihilate the aqueduct. Now, the evidence shewed that the minerals could be worked out without interfering with the run of the water through the pipe. In any view, the order of the Lord Ordinary went too far. There were many ways of working out the minerals, or at anyrate portions of the minerals, without interfering with the support. In tenants for surface damage, the amount to be arranged for with Mrs Gibsone of Pentland, and the quarrying of stone in Straiton for use in the works. It cannot therefore be suggested that the thing was done behind the backs of the proprietors. They must have been quite well aware of what was going on; and the inference I draw is, that payment or 'satisfaction' in respect of the laying of the pipe was either adjusted and settled, or was deliberately waived.

"Now, it is true that the Act of 1819 makes no reference to minerals; and it may be that no one then had sufficient foresight to claim, or at all events to claim adequately, for the loss of available minerals which is involved in the right of absolute support to the pipe. But if such claim was open under the statute, and was either waived or assessed and paid, I do not see how the singular successors of the then owners can take the objection that the claim might have been for a larger amount.

"As shewing the result in law of the view of the statute which I have adopted, the pursuers rely on a series of English cases—Normanton Gas Company, 52 L. J., Q. B. 629; Benfieldside Local Board, L. R., 3 Ex. Div. 54; Dudley Corporation, L. R., 8 Q. B. Div. 86; and (the latest and most applicable to the present) London and North-Western Railway v. Evans, L. R. [1893], 1 Ch. 16. In the last mentioned case the railway company were owners of a canal, and Evans was owner of minerals under the canal, which he had worked so as to cause a subsidence. The value of the minerals to be left unworked if the right to support was absolute was estimated at £144,000; and the outside cost of repairing the canal, if all the coal were worked out, at £5500. The canal had been made by private undertakers under an old statute which contained no reference to minerals, and under which no conveyances had been granted. The principle on which the Appeal Court proceeded is thus expressed by Lord Justice Bowen:—'Where an express statutory right is given to make and maintain a thing necessarily requiring support, the statute, in the absence of a context implying the contrary, must be taken to mean that the right to necessary support of the thing constructed shall accompany the right to make and to maintain it. More especially would this seem reasonable when the thing to be constructed is one of public advantage and utility, in which the public are to have rights.' Then the learned Judge deals with the presence or absence of a compensation clause as of first-rate importance in construing such a statute; and holding that the statute contained apt words of com-regard to the claim for lateral support of the ground held in feu, there was no warrant for imposing on the respondents the burden of supporting more than the land in its natural state, without the addition of a delicate opus manufactum which the feuars had themselves introduced into the subjects.[1] In any view, an interdict was not an appropriate remedy where the injury was merely contingent and might never arise.[2] There was no cause of action until the injury arose.

Argued for the Water Trustees;—The Water Trustees had an absolute and unqualified right of support for their Crawley pipe. The right to lay that pipe was conferred by the Act of 1819, and the same Act gave a right to claim compensation to those proprietors whose lands were taken. The enterprise here was not a private commercial speculation; it was a public undertaking; and looking to the nature of the powers given by, and the operations conducted under, the Act, it was obvious that it was intended that for the pipe duly laid in terms of the Act a right of support was conferred. The case was not in any way distinguishable from the case of Evans.[3] The Scots law on the subject was the same as the English.[4] The pursuers adopted the conpensation for the right of support, in the expression 'first making satisfaction to the owners of such lands as shall be made use of,' he goes on to say, —'It is true that at the date of the Act the minerals were not thought to be of value, and were not taken into account in assessing the actual compensation exacted. But if the right of support was not substantially measured in the price given for the lands taken and used, it might have been demanded and estimated in the price had the owners been sufficiently prescient; and after this lapse of time, it must be assumed that all was paid for which was capable of calculation or measurement, and which was thought worth claiming by the owners; and that all conditions precedent have been fulfilled which were requisite to give the canal proprietors the right to the necessary support for the maintenance and making of their canal.' I need not stay to point out how closely all this applies to the case in hand.

"One difference there is, namely, that a canal occupies the surface of the ground, while in this case the pipes are beneath the surface. This, however, seems to me to make no difference in the application of the principle which establishes the right of support (see the cases of Normanton Gas Company, where the subject was a gas-pipe, and Dudley Corporation, where it was a sewer); though it may make some difference in the precise nature of the right which the undertakers have to the ground occupied by their works. I do not think the obligation of support is affected according as that right to the ground is truly property in the highest sense, or is a perpetual and irrevocable right to the exclusive use of the strip or stratum of soil occupied by the pipe. Such a right has nearly all, if not all, the characteristics of property, and is obviously capable of sustaining the consequential right of having the pipe supported at its original level.

"But then, it is said, all this has been changed by subsequent legislation.

struction put upon the Act of 1819 by the Lord Ordinary and his Lordship's reasoning generally. Even if it were held that there was not proof of compensation having been paid, it must—the Act giving the right to claim it—be assumed, after so long a lapse of time, either that it had been paid or that the proprietors had waived their right to claim it. The Act of 1843 in no way derogated from the pursuers' rights under the Act of 1819. The Lord Ordinary was right in his construction of it. Apart from statute, the pursuers had at common law a right to support for their pipe. They had a right of aqueduct, and an incident of such a servitude was a right of support. Having a right to support therefore—whatever its legal quality might be—they were undoubtedly entitled to have the pipe maintained in its present position. Even if the respondents were entitled to substitute artificial support for the natural support of the land and minerals, they had entirely failed to prove that they could do so. As regarded the feu, the pipe was in before the title was granted, and the very purpose of acquiring the feu was, as appeared on the face of the title, to lay the pipe through it. The defenders were bound therefore to support the pipe as well as the feu itself. It was idle to say that the

The Act of 1819 was referred to and continued by later statutes before it was repealed with saving clauses in 1847. In particular, the Edinburgh Water Company's Act of 1843 (6 and 7 Vict. cap. 89) contains in sections 111-116 a set of mineral clauses which, the defenders contend, must be taken along with the Act of 1819 as furnishing a code applicable to the subjects now in question. It seems to me, however, extremely difficult to adopt that conclusion if the view I have expressed as to the rights of parties under the earlier statute be sound. If, indeed, minerals could be regarded as having been excluded hinc inde under the earlier statute, it would be quite reasonable to introduce later a code to regulate the respective rights and obligations in that particular, and to apply it to the existing works as well as to new works. But then I do not regard the earlier statute as having excluded mineral rights from consideration; and I think that so serious an alteration in the rights of parties as to the existing works is not to be imposed unless the construction contended for is a necessary one. As I read the Act of 1843, its mineral clauses do not apply except to the new works thereby authorised, which, it is to be observed, are almost entirely situated in the parishes of Penicuik, Colinton, and Currie, and not at all in the parish of Lasswade, in which Straiton and Pentland lie. It is quite true that the previously existing works are not altogether unaffected by the Act of 1843. Thus, by section 124, the company are taken bound within five years to complete the necessary works for introducing the whole of the water which they were authorised to take 'by the said recited Acts and this Act.' By section 125, it imposes on them the duty of providing and maintaining a meter upon the main Crawley pipe; and by section 141 they are bound to erect and maintain an additional gauge on the Glencorse Burn, below the works at Crawley. These and other enactments shew that the Act of 1843 had the existing works distinctly in view; but I cannot hold that the expression 'the works of the company,' contained in the mineral clauses, applies to the works then in existence, the rights in which had been acquired more than twenty years before.

"The pursuers present an alternative case on this head. They allege a right of servitude, founded on the ownership of the reservoir on the Castlehill, which has been vested in them and their predecessors since before the middle of the last century, and which ever since the Crawley pipe was opened in 1823 has been receiving by it a continuous supply of Crawley water. The proof clearly establishes these facts. In the view I take, how-pursuers must wait until damage was done before taking action. Their right was to have interdict against a threatened wrong.[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first question is, whether the pursuers have a right of support for their pipe which conveys water from the Crawley springs to Edinburgh, where it passes through the part of the lands of Pentland in which the pursuers have acquired no right of property, and the lands of Straiton; and the second question is, whether the pursuers have a right of lateral support for a narrow strip of the lands of Pentland, about 1083 yards long and about 25 yards broad, which they hold in feu, and for the pipe which conveys water to Edinburgh from the Crawley springs, where it is laid in that strip of ground. The pursuers, as I understand, base their claim to the support mentioned in the first question upon two grounds—(1) upon the Act of 1819, and (2) alternatively upon their having, as they allege, acquired a servitude of support for their pipe at common law. I shall deal with these two grounds of claim in their order ever, of the pursuers' rights, it is unnecessary to follow out this topic. The plea rests, as I understand the pursuers' case, upon implied grant, importing an obligation not to derogate from that grant by letting down the pipe. It seems to me it would be difficult to affirm an implied grant in a case where the origin of the right of aqueduct is perfectly well known, seeing it rests on the statute of 1819. I could understand the contention that the Act of Parliament itself imports a statutory grant of servitude; but there seems to be no room for grafting a common-law servitude upon the statutory enactments.

"The next question is, whether, assuming the right of support to exist, the defenders' operations, if continued, will substantially interfere with that right. By the right of support, I mean the right to have the pipe supported as it lies, and at its present level, whether by the natural strata being left undisturbed, or by means of some substituted structure which will ensure the same result ab ante. I put the question thus, because I think that must necessarily be the extent of the right of support, if it exists, and because the parties are not really so far apart on the questions of fact as they appear to be on the proof. The conclusions of the summons do not expressly put the pursuers' case so high as to demand support by the natural strata, and to exclude substituted support. On the other hand, it is, I think, clearly established that a continuance of the defenders' threatened operations will result in substantial lowering of the pipe and imminent risk to the water supply. Further, the pursuers' criticism of the position taken up by the defenders as to substituted support seems to me perfectly sound, namely, that it contemplates not the prevention of subsidences, but their cure. The sits or draws which are assumed by all the witnesses to be practically inevitable as the result of the defenders' operations are to be watched for, and a massive structure of beams or girders is to be applied, from which the pipe is to be slung with chains, with appliances for screwing up the pipe from time to time as the level alters. It appears to me that, even apart from the pursuers' evidence, which is weighty, the defenders' own witnesses (Mr Rankine, Mr Dixon, Mr Scoular, and Mr Armour) shew that the pipe would from time to time over a considerable part of its course be in a condition of peril, would need careful watching, and would be liable at least to 'drawn joints' and consequent —taking first that which depends upon the construction and effect of certain sections of the Act of 1819, especially section 38, and what followed upon it.

The Act of 1819 is entitled "An Act for more effectually supplying the city of Edinburgh and places adjacent with water," and it provided for the establishment of a company to carry out that object. By section 38 of the Act the company—in whose right the pursuers now stand—were empowered to take and use grounds and premises for the purpose of forming a reservoir or reservoirs at the places therein particularly described, provided that the consent in writing of the owners and occupiers of the lands whereon the same were to be formed should be previously obtained, "to compensate" (which, I understand, the parties are agreed means "for the purpose of compensating") owners and occupiers of mills and landowners for the water taken for the purposes of the Act as thereinafter directed. Then follows a power "to make the necessary cuts, trenches, mounds, or other works for connecting the springs and water hereinbefore mentioned leakage, if not also to breaks and stoppage of the supply. Add to this, that the pipe in place of being underground, as it is now, would be exposed in considerable sections to atmospheric influences, and might be damaged by frost if the flow were sluggish; and it becomes plain, in my opinion, that the defenders' proposed substituted support is not support at all in the sense in which the pursuers are entitled to it. What they are entitled to have, in the lowest view, is efficient substituted support for the pipe at its present level and in its present situation; and in my view this requirement is not met by any of the proposed alternatives.

"The result is, that in my view recourse must be had to the only possible alternative, namely, to leave a certain area of the minerals unworked for the support of the pipe. The question is, how is that area to be defined? In their summons, the pursuers conclude that the Court should, 'by remit to a person or persons of skill or otherwise,' fix and determine the limits within which the defenders shall be bound to abstain from working, or otherwise the manner and conditions in and under which the workings may go on adjacent to the feu, and under and adjacent to the pipe. The defenders maintain that the words 'or otherwise' are not sufficient to include the determination of the area by a decree following on a parole proof, but this, I think, would be too critical a construction. It might be inexpedient and possibly unfair so to fix it, if the proof shewed serious divergence in point of principle between witnesses of equal skill. But the weight of the evidence seems to me to be all in one direction, possibly because the defenders' purpose on this head is not so much to minimise the area to be left unworked, but rather to shew that none (except a little at the outcrop) need be left unworked if their proposal for mechanical substituted support is adopted. All agree that some of the mineral near the outcrop should remain as it is, the limit being variously stated at from 100 to 200 yards. As to the area traversed by the pipe between that limit and the east end of the feu, the defenders' witnesses, Mr Rankine, Mr Miller, and Mr Armour, practically concede that this could not be worked out without affecting the level and stability of the pipe to the extent at least of causing drawn joints, and their suggestions go to remedy rather than prevention. But on the assumption that these suggestions are inadequate to satisfy their obligation of support, the defenders' witnesses do not really suggest any practical alternative to the rule formulated by the witnesses for the pursuers. All agree that to the rise of the strata the line of safety is to be found by dropping a 'normal' or perpendicular line to the strata from the surface point to be to be taken, and also the necessary cuts, trenches, conduits, mounds, or other works for conducting the water thereof to the said city in the line or lines pointed out in the said map or plan, and to construct the necessary aqueduct or aqueducts, and to lay the necessary pipe or pipes for that purpose, giving one month's notice of such their intention to the owner or owners, or occupier or occupiers, of such grounds and premises, and making satisfaction to such owner or owners, and occupier or occupiers, in manner hereinafter directed." There is in this section a sharp distinction between the power to take and use land for the purpose of forming reservoirs, and the power to construct the necessary aqueducts and lay the necessary pipes for the purpose of conveying water to Edinburgh. For the first, the land must be taken or acquired, but it does not appear to me that it was necessary that any land should be taken or acquired for the second, the power conferred by the part of the section quoted being to construct the aqueducts and lay the pipes in land, the property in which was not required to be taken or acquired, but which might remain in the ownership of the persons protected. But to the dip, the defenders' witnesses have really no practical suggestion to make as to how the limit of safety is to be ascertained; and their theory, such as it is, does not appear to have ever been adopted in practice—certainly not by the defenders in their plans—and it is contradicted by the evidence of how far actual subsidences extended as noted on the defenders' working plans from time to time. The pursuers' witnesses indeed are not at one either upon this point, but they are substantially so. The evidence discloses a variance between the practice in England and in Scotland. In Scotland the slope or batter left to the dip in the ordinary case is one in four; in England it appears to be a little less, namely, one in five. I see no reason to doubt that the English rule will furnish a sufficient margin of safety; and there being no special circumstances here to suggest that the situation is specially risky, I am prepared to apply that rule in this case.

"Then as to the feu, it is not disputed that the defenders cannot work any further minerals under it, as these belong in property to the pursuers. The controversy therefore turns upon whether the pursuers are entitled in present circumstances to have the limits of safety applied to the boundaries of the feu itself, irrespective of the pipe lying in it; in other words, whether the right to lateral support of land to land entitles them to interdict adjacent workings ab ante on proof of danger reasonably apprehended. That there is such reasonable apprehension of subsidence in the surface of the feu if the defenders work out the adjacent minerals in their own ground, is, I think, clearly proved, not merely by the subsidence which occurred there some years ago (for that followed on an encroachment made by the defenders' workings within the feu), but by applying the 'limit of safety' to the feu boundary all round. There is practically the same reason for apprehending subsidence of the feu when that limit is overpast, as for apprehending subsidence of the pipe. But the difficulty I have felt on this part of the case is caused by certain English authorities, of which Smith v. Thackerah (1866, Law Rep. 1 C. P. 564) is one, and perhaps the strongest. They appear to lay down that the owner must wait until actual damage arises, and that even when the surface has in fact been lowered by the withdrawal of lateral support, no action will lie unless substantial damage has accrued. There may be a distinction between the case where the two adjoining subjects have never been united in one ownership, and the case where (as here) the complainer derives his grant from his neighbour, or his neighbours' predecessor. Smith v. Thackerah has been doubted in more recent cases, on the ground that if the right of support of land to land has been actually to whom it previously belonged. There is no provision in this part of the section for payment of a price, as upon purchase, for the land in which the aqueducts were to be constructed and the pipes laid, but only for "making satisfaction" to their owners or occupiers, which might be materially different from a price paid as upon purchase. It would, of course, materially strengthen the position of the defenders if they could shew that the provisions for making "satisfaction" apply only to cases in which land is "taken," not to cases to which an aqueduct is made or a pipe laid through lands not "taken," but which remains the property of their previous owners, and this they attempted to do by referring to section 73 of the Act. It appears to me, however, that that section applies not only to lands which the company may desire to "take" in the sense of acquiring the property of them, but also to lands which the company only desire to "use," as they did by laying their pipes in the lands in question, while the property in these lands remained in their previous owners. One of the schedules appended to the Act, under the head "Aqueduct from Crawley springs to the city of Edinburgh," contains the names of the owners and occupiers of the lands through which the aqueduct was to pass, including the lands of Pentland and Straiton, to which the present action relates. In the schedule Mrs A. Gibsone is stated to be the owner, and John Allan the occupier, of the lands of Pentland, and James Johnstone is stated to be owner, and John Jamieson the occupier, of the lands of Straiton.

The work was begun in the autumn of 1819, and water was brought to Edinburgh in August 1823 by the pipes laid under the authority of the Act. It is not proved that any payment or other satisfaction was made by the water company to the owners of the lands of Pentland or Straiton through which the pipe was laid in respect of its being laid, though it does appear that the company was in communication with the proprietors of these lands, or their law-agents, at the time, and made considerable payments to them, in respect of matters arising out of the execution of the works. Thus, on 14th February 1820, the company intimated to the law-agent for Straiton that they proposed, by virtue of the powers conferred by the Act of 1819, to quarry stones from Straiton quarry "for the use of the works now carried on by the company for the purpose of conveying Crawley springs and other water to Edinburgh," as they were entitled to do under the Act, and it appears that stones were taken for this purpose from Straiton infringed, an action ought to lie at least for nominal damages, even if the damage is not substantial. But if that point is reached, I do not see how in Scotland the remedy of interdict is not appropriate and competent to safeguard the right, on proof of reasonable apprehension of imminent risk of subsidence if the workings are continued past the limit of safety; and, in my opinion, that is established here by the proof.

"It remains to consider the defenders' third plea in law, that the pursuers are barred by their actings from insisting in this action. . . . I see nothing to suggest that the pursuers were aware of the defenders being in course of incurring expenditure for a specific purpose, and wrongfully failed to let them know that the purpose was regarded by the trustees as contrary to their rights.

"In the result, my opinion is that the pursuers are entitled to decree substantially as concluded for."

quarry, and duly paid for by the company. Again, on 14th July 1820 the company intimated to Mrs Gibsone of Pentland that "they intend soon to take steps with a view to conduct the water-pipe from the Crawley Spring, &c., through your estate to Edinburgh, and mentioned that the company's engineer would be ready to point out the track, "most of which is already on the ground"; that the damage done by the operation and the value of the ground occupied were to be settled by a jury in terms of the Act, if not adjusted privately; and that the directors would be well pleased to agree to a reference, and ready to consider any proposal which Mrs Gibsone might think fit to make with a view to a settlement. There was also correspondence between the company and Mrs Gibsone's agent regarding the acquisition from her of the strip of the lands of Pentland which she afterwards disponed in feu to the company, and to which the second question above mentioned relates. A minute of the committee of management of the company dated 3d August 1820 bears that "the meeting having been informed of the communications from Mrs Gibsone of Pentland respecting the value of her property through which the aqueduct is to run, are quite satisfied with her proposal to have a report of the value of the damages to her property from Mr George Brown, and that she should not be bound by the report unless she thinks fit to accept of his valuation." Another minute of the committee, dated 18th May 1821, bears that "Mr Jardine having laid before the meeting Mrs Gibsone of Pentland's letter specifying the terms on which the stone from the quarry lately discovered on her ground may be had, the meeting authorised Mr Jardine to accept of it, taking care to make the terms of the agreement more precise." Another minute, dated 7th June 1821, directs that in answer to a letter from Mr Train he should be informed that they were ready to have the damage done to his farm of New Pentland ascertained by Mr George Brown, as already agreed upon by "Mrs Gibsone of Pentland and her tenants." There is also contemporaneous documentary evidence that surface damages were paid to the agricultural tenants on the estates of Pentland and Straiton, while certain payments were made to the proprietors, as to the precise nature of which the parties are not agreed. Thus the defenders maintain that a payment of £166, 1s. 11d. made to the proprietor of Pentland "for ground occupied by aqueduct" was in respect of the feu, and it is quite possible that this may be so. The probability seems to me to be that none of the parties were aware that any minerals workable to profit existed in the lands, and that the payments made by the company to the proprietors and their tenants were made and accepted as being in full of all the claims which the proprietors had under the Act against the company. But, however this may be, it is clear that the proprietors of Pentland and Straiton were well aware that the company was making an aqueduct and laying a pipe in their lands as authorised by the Act of 1819, and they made such claims as they considered appropriate to the circumstances. I therefore think that, after the lapse of nearly eighty years, these proprietors must be taken to have received such "satisfaction" by way of money payments or otherwise as they considered themselves entitled to demand from the company.

But it appears to me, separatim, that if the company would have acquired an effective and permanent right to support for their pipe upon

No. 29.

"making satisfaction" by way of payment or otherwise to the proprietors of the lands, it must be held to have acquired a not less effective or less permanent right if, with the assent of these proprietors, it cut its aqueduct and laid its pipe without payment. It must have been manifest to the proprietors that the right which the company acquired was intended to be permanent, and if the proprietors elected (with or without consideration) to abstain from making a separate claim for "satisfaction" in respect of it, I am unable to see that the rights of the company—or the pursuers as now standing in its place—can be less than if "satisfaction," in the statutory sense, had been made.

The defenders maintained that as section 22 of the Act of 1819 requires the committee of management of the company to enter in a book all contracts which they might enter into, and all payments which they might make, and as no contract relative to the acquisition of a wayleave for the pipe, and no payment in respect of it, is entered in any book kept by the company, it cannot now be assumed that the pipe was laid under the authority of the Act, or that "satisfaction" in the sense of the Act was made. It appears to me, however, that even if the requirements of section 22 were not literally complied with, this would not have the effect of preventing the company from acquiring a permanent right, in the nature of a wayleave, for their pipe, or of precluding the proper inferences from being drawn from the proved facts, as to whether "satisfaction" in the statutory sense had or had not been made. I therefore think that, for the purposes of the present question, it must now be taken that the company acquired a permanent right to maintain their pipe in the part of the lands of Pentland which they did not acquire in feu, and also in the lands of Straiton, and further, that it must now be assumed that the claim of the proprietors for "satisfaction" was either met or waived.

With reference to the alternative claim of the pursuers to a common law servitude aquæductus with respect to which the pursuers' reservoir on the Castlehill was the dominant tenement, it is sufficient to say that as the foundation of their right to lay the pipe was clearly the Act of 1819, any inference of a common law servitude aquæductus is, in my judgment, excluded.

The next question is, Did the exercise of the statutory power to lay and maintain a pipe through the lands infer any, and if any what, right to support for that pipe? It is plain that if no such right of support was acquired, the grant by Parliament of the power to lay and maintain it would have been nugatory, and there is every presumption against this having been intended. I think, however, that, both upon principle and authority, the effect of the grant of such a power is to confer upon the grantees a right to such support as may be necessary for making the purpose of the grant effectual. The case of the London and North-Western Railway Company v. Evans,[1] is one of the most recent and most apposite authorities to this effect. It was maintained by the defenders that the doctrine of that case does not apply to the present, because the Water Company, which was established under the Act of 1819, was not a public company—inasmuch as it was not directed to accomplish a public object in the sense of the decisions, and there was no security that it would be permanent. It is true that the company was not strictly a municipal undertaking, although it was promoted by leading citizens, and the municipality as then constituted had an important interest in it. The Act of 1819 also came in place of two prior statutes, under which the management of the water supply appears to have been vested in the Town-Council, and an important restriction was imposed by the Act in the public interest upon the amount of profits which the company might make and divide. It is also true that the company was not bound by the statute to give a full supply of water to all the citizens, nor were there under it limits of compulsory supply as that expression is now understood, but important obligations relative to the supply of water were imposed upon the company in the public interest. Thus by section 34 it was, inter alia, provided that the company should supply water to the then existing public wells of the city, and perform all lawful contracts previously entered into by the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council under the recited Acts, and by section 85 it was declared that all persons who at the time of the passing of the Act had water conveyed to their houses, or other premises, in pipes already laid, should continue to possess and enjoy the same privilege upon making payment to the company of the then present rates and duties until Whitsunday 1821, and of such rates and duties as might after that term be fixed in the manner thereinafter specified. Section 86 conferred upon the inhabitants power, after notice, and with the consent of the company, to lay service pipes to their houses from the company's pipes; and by sections 96, 97, 98, and 99 powers of rating were conferred upon the company. I am of opinion that under these circumstances the statutory power to lay and maintain a pipe in specified lands for conveying such a supply of water, must be held to have carried with it a right to have the pipe supported, whether the claim of the proprietors of the lands for "satisfaction" was met or waived.

The pursuers' claim of lateral support for the strip of land feued by the company from the estate of Pentland and the pipe in it, depends upon somewhat different considerations. If the feu had been taken by private persons before any pipe was laid in it, without any mention of the purpose for which it was to be used, the feuars being proprietors a cœlo ad centrum, would have been entitled to lateral support for the feu in its natural state, but not to support for artificial buildings or works erected upon it, whereby the burden on the adjacent lands would be increased (Dalton v. Angus),[1] but in the feu-disposition of the strip in question by Mrs Gibsone of Pentland to the company, dated 3d March 1825, the Act of 1819 and the powers conferred by the portion of section 38 of that Act above quoted are recited, including the power to make the necessary cuts, trenches, conduits, mounds, or other works for taking the water to the city of Edinburgh in the line or lines pointed out in the map or plan attached to the Act, to construct the necessary aqueduct or aqueducts, and to lay the necessary pipe or pipes for that purpose. The feu-disposition also bears that Mrs Gibsone had agreed to sell to the company the piece of ground described for £350, 15s. sterling, and that she therefore sold and in feu-farm disponed to the company "all and whole that piece of ground of my lands and estate of Pentland through which the aqueduct pipe for conveying water from Crawley springs to the city of Edinburgh is laid, consisting of 4 acres 1 rood 21½ falls," as shewn on a plan therein mentioned. It thus appears that the pipe had actually been laid before the feu-right was granted, and it also appears ex facie of the disposition that it was obtained for the purpose of accommodating and, of course, of supporting the pipe. Under these circumstances, I think that the feu-grant must be taken to have implied a right to such lateral support as might be requisite for maintaining the pipe in situ, if or in so far as that support was greater than what would have been sufficient for maintaining the strip of ground feued in its natural condition. In this connection I may refer to the case of the Caledonian Railway Company v. Sprot,[1] which related to a conveyance of land expressed to be granted for the purpose of making a railway upon it. The disponer, however, reserved to himself all mines under the land conveyed, with full liberty to win and work the minerals, and the Lord Chancellor said that "independently of any Parliamentary enactment, the effect of that conveyance was to convey the land to be covered by the railway to the company, together with a right to all reasonable subjacent and adjacent support, a right to such support being a right necessarily connected with the subject-matter of the grant."

[1] 6 App. Cas. 740.

What I have now said proceeds upon the assumption that the question as to the right of support claimed by the pursuers depends upon the Act of 1819 and what was done under it, but the defenders maintained that this is not so, and that the rights and obligations of the parties hinc inde with respect to minerals, even in the case of lands acquired, or powers originally exercised, under the Act of 1819, must now be governed, not by that Act, but by the Act of 1843, 6 and 7 Vict. c. 89, entitled "An Act to enable the Edinburgh Water Company to bring in an additional supply of water, and to alter and amend the Acts relating to the said company." They contended that, inasmuch as no contract or payment is recorded with reference to the laying of the pipe, it must be presumed that when the Act of 1843 passed, the matter was still open for settlement, and that it must now be settled under the provisions of that Act. They submitted that in so far as that Act relates to works, it applies to all works both past and future, and that as the question relative to mines was not settled under the Act of 1819, it must now be settled under the Act of 1843. They referred especially to sections 17, 70, 73, 111 to 116, 122, and 148 of the latter Act, maintaining that section 17 applies to any claim still remaining unsettled in respect of powers already exercised under the Act of 1819. I think, however, that that section, if, or in so far as it relates to claims arising out of the exercise of powers conferred by the Act of 1819, can apply only to powers still unexercised in 1843, and all the powers to which this action relates were exercised at least twenty years before that Act passed. The defenders further argued that this is a case of an omitted interest under section 70, and that section 73 applies to works or property acquired at any time—whether prior or subsequent to the passing of the Act. It appears to me, however, that there is in this action no question of an omitted interest under section 70—that section 73 has no application (1) because it relates to land purchased by the company, not to the case where they had acquired a right to lay a pipe in lands not purchased, and (2) that even if, or in so far as, it applies to lands purchased, it does not alter any rights already acquired to this date. The defenders also maintained that sections 111 to 116 effected a reservation of mines under the pipe-track previously acquired, but I consider that this contention is not well founded, and that the Act of 1843 cannot be held to have taken away or impaired a right of support, which, if the views above expressed are sound, had already been acquired by the exercise of the powers conferred by the Act of 1819. In respect of similar considerations, I am unable to accept the arguments maintained by the defenders as to sections 124 and 125 of the Act of 1843.

For the reasons now given, I think that the pursuers are entitled to have declarator substantially in the terms concluded for in the summons, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to in so far as it finds to that effect. But in the remainder of the interlocutor his Lordship finds that within the limit therein mentioned, the shale, limestone, and other minerals adjacent to the pursuers' strip of ground, and adjacent to or under their pipe or aqueduct described in the summons, cannot be "wrought out" without imminent risk of bringing down the surface of the strip of ground, and the pipe, that is to say, the limit formed by lines drawn from the points to be supported perpendicular to the plane of the strata on the rise side, and at the inclination of one in five towards the dip, and that within that limit the defenders are bound to abstain from working the shale, limestone, and other minerals, and he accordingly interdicts them from working the shale, limestone, and other minerals within that limit. From the expression "wrought out" used by the Lord Ordinary it might have been inferred that his finding merely implied that the minerals could not be fully excavated without imminent risk of bringing down the surface, but this would, or might, be consistent with the possibility of part of them being worked without that result. His Lordship's subsequent finding, however, that the defenders are bound to "abstain from working the shale," &c., seems to imply that they are bound to abstain from any working within the specified limit, although it may be possible that within it some, though not all, or much, mineral could be taken out with safety. It appears to me, however, that it would be inexpedient for the Court to take upon itself the duty of deciding antecedently what part of the minerals can, and what part cannot, be wrought with safety to the strip of ground or the pipe. It might turn out that the mineral which the Lord Ordinary requires to be left for support was either more or less than was necessary for that object. If it was more, some of it might be wrought without injury to the pipe, and if it was less, his Lordship's interlocutor might be held to import a licence to work up to the specified limit, whatever the consequences to the strip of ground or the pipe might be. Again, it is possible that part at least of the minerals which the Lord Ordinary has found must be left unwrought might be worked without injury to the strip or the pipe, if adequate substituted support by way of under-building or otherwise in or upon the property belonging to, or held in lease by, the defenders was provided. I am therefore of opinion that it would be better that we should not, while finding substantially in terms of the leading declaratory conclusions of the summons, attempt to define the limits of safe working, but that we should merely grant an interdict prohibiting the defenders from working so as to injure the pursuers' strip or pipe. This appears to have been the course followed in the case of the London and North-Western Railway Company v. Evans,[1] and in other cases.

LORD ADAM.—I have had an opportunity of reading the opinion of the Lord President, and entirely concur in it.

LORD M'LAREN.—I have also had an opportunity of reading the opinion of the Lord President, and concur in it unreservedly. If I add anything, it is only to make an observation regarding the kind of support which, according to my understanding of the law, the Water Trustees are entitled to have for their pipe. One difficulty in considering cases of this kind is the necessity of giving weight to certain very unqualified judicial opinions regarding the right which the proprietor of the surface has to claim support from the owner of the strata of minerals beneath. In one of the cases cited to us it was even asserted that in the case of land in its natural condition it might be that the owner of the surface was entitled to have the surface maintained in the same plane, or, as it was put by counsel, at the same distance from the centre of the earth, as it was in its natural formation. As I have always considered that in such matters the common law is nothing but the generalised common-sense of mankind, and as no owner of hill or moorland ever supposed that he had such a right or ever made such a claim against a mine-owner, I think we might fairly put the weight and authority due to universal custom against the somewhat unqualified opinions of individual Judges, however eminent, on a matter of that kind. But we are not now considering the right of support which belongs to the owner of the surface as distinguished from the owner of the minerals. The support claimed is the consequence of a statutory privilege to lay a pipe in the land of another person upon making adequate compensation. I agree with the Lord President that under the statute the Water Trustees are entitled to such support for their pipe as is necessary to make the statutory privilege effective, and it is quite possible that such support might be given consistently with some slight variation of the level of the surface. The nature of the support that would be given, for example, to an open aqueduct carried on arches across a valley is very different from the support which is given to a closed pipe where the water by hydrostatic pressure always rises to the same level, notwithstanding deflections in the pipe. Of course I am keeping in view what was strongly argued to us, that even moderate deflections of the surface might be injurious to the pipe by causing it to open at the joints, but I think it is not impossible that the resources of engineering science might be able to cope with that either by making allowance for deflection or by giving artificial support. It is perfectly possible that the Water Trustees might obtain the full measure of their right under the statute without subjecting the owners of the mines to the enormous loss which they would undoubtedly incur if the law as laid down in the Lord Ordinary's judgment were to receive unqualified effect.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have had an opportunity of reading and considering the opinion of the Lord President, and entirely agree with it.

THE COURT "having considered the reclaiming note for the defenders . . . against the interlocutor of Lord Pearson dated 28th June 1900 . . . recall the said interlocutor; find and declare in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons; further find and declare that the defenders the said Clippens Oil Company, Limited, as lessees of the minerals in the lands of Pentland, on both sides of the strip of ground belonging to the pursuers described in the first conclusion of the summons, and where the pipe, also described in the first conclusion of the summons, is laid, and as the owners of the lands and minerals of Straiton, are not entitled to work the shale, limestone, and other minerals adjacent to the said strip of ground, and adjacent to or under the pipe or aqueduct belonging to the pursuers described in the first conclusion of the summons, in such manner as to injure the said strip of ground, or the said pipe or aqueduct, or to interfere with the continuous flow of water through the said pipe or aqueduct from the Crawley Spring to the Castlehill reservoir described in the summons; interdict, prohibit, and discharge the defenders, the Clippens Oil Company, Limited, from working the said shale, limestone, and other minerals adjacent to the said strip, and adjacent to and under the pursuers' said pipe or aqueduct where it is laid in the said lands of Pentland or in the said lands of Straiton, so as to injure the said strip of ground, or the said pipe or aqueduct, or to interfere with the continuous flow of the water through the said pipe from the Crawley Spring to the Castlehill reservoir, and decern; find the pursuers entitled to two-thirds of the taxed amount of the expenses from the beginning of the action," &c.

Sale—Sale of Heritage—"Fixtures and Fittings"—Disposition in part implement of Missives.—The sale of a house "with the fixtures and fittings therein so far as belonging to the proprietor" was completed by missives. A disposition of the house which followed contained no mention of "fixtures and fittings," and no express reference to the missives.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Low) that the missives were not superseded by the disposition in so far as the subjects sold were moveable, and accordingly that the acceptance of the disposition by the purchaser did not discharge his right to delivery with the house of such moveables as fell within the terms "fixtures and fittings."

Opinion by Lord Low that the term "fixtures" meant such articles as would, in the absence of special stipulation, pass to the purchaser of the house, although capable of being removed, while the term "fittings" applied to such articles as built-in grates, door-plates, and gas-brackets, which, in the absence of a special agreement, the seller would be entitled to remove.

Jamieson v. Welsh.

1st Division. Lord Low.

On 29th March 1899 Alexander Campbell, S.S.C., acting on behalf of James Jamieson, contractor, Musselburgh, wrote to Messrs Welsh & Forbes, S.S.C., offering the sum of £1475 for "the subjects known as Greenhall, Musselburgh, as advertised, with entry at Whitsunday, when the price will be paid, with the fixtures and fittings therein so far as belonging to the proprietor." To this offer Messrs Welsh & Forbes appended a written acceptance of the same date.

By disposition dated 16th May 1899 Mr John Welsh, therein designed "as heritable proprietor of the subjects and others hereinafter disponed," in consideration of the sum of £475 instantly paid to him by James Jamieson, and also in consideration of Mr Jamieson freeing and relieving him of the sum of £1000 in the bond and disposition therein mentioned, disponed to and in favour of Mr Jamieson and his heirs and assignees, heritably and irredeemably, "All and Whole that house of two storeys, or floors, and garrets, called Greenhall, and two smaller houses at the west end thereof, with 23 falls, 4 ells of ground or thereby, belonging thereto," together with "the teinds, parsonage and vicarage, and whole parts, pendicles, privileges, and pertinents of the subjects above disponed." The disposition did not bear to be in implement of any previous contract, and contained no mention of "fixtures and fittings," nor did it purport to convey any corporeal or other moveables.

On 30th October 1899, Jamieson raised an action against John Welsh and against Thomas White, Moredun, Liberton, for the value of certain articles which he alleged passed to him along with the house in virtue of the missives, and which he averred had been removed by the defenders. The pursuer averred that while the heritable subjects were feudally vested in Welsh at the time of the sale, the feudal title was qualified by a back-letter under which the beneficial interest as owner remained in White, who had conveyed the subjects to Welsh in security merely. Defences were lodged for Welsh, but no appearance was entered for the defender White.

The articles, the value of which was claimed by the pursuer (as set forth in Cond. 3), consisted (a) of ordinary built-in grates, gas-brackets, finger-plates, &c., and (b) of a kitchen range and boiler, and window opening rods and handles in the greenhouse. He averred,—(Cond. 3) "The fitting and fixtures mentioned in this article were the property of the defenders or of the defender John Welsh, and they were fixtures and fittings belonging to the proprietor of the subjects sold in the sense of the missives." The value placed upon these articles was £50.

The compearing defender denied that the articles above specified were ever his property or had been removed by him. He pleaded;—(3) The defender, not having removed any of the articles condescended on from the said subjects sold to the pursuer, ought to be assoilzied, with expenses. (4) The disposition granted to the pursuer being the sole measure of his right, he is not entitled to any of the articles claimed, and this defender is entitled to absolvitor. (5) In any event the said articles not being of the nature of fixtures, the defender should be assoilzied.

On 14th July 1900, the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that the pursuer having accepted a disposition of the subjects at Greenhall, Musselburgh, purchased by him from the defenders, the said disposition is the sole measure of the rights and liabilities of the parties; (2) that under and in terms of the said disposition the pursuer has right to all articles in the said house and cottage, and in the grounds annexed thereto, which are in law fixtures in a question between seller and purchaser, but that he has no right to articles which, in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, a seller is in law entitled to remove; and (3) that the articles enumerated in article 3 of the condescendence (with the exception of the kitchen range with high-pressure boiler, and the opening rods and handles of the greenhouse) are not fixtures, and that the pursuer has no right thereto: Before further answer allows the pursuer a proof as to the nature and construction of the said kitchen range and boiler and the said opening rods and handles, and as to the manner in which the same are attached to the dwelling-house and greenhouse respectively, and to the compearing defender a conjunct probation," &c. *

* "OPINION.—In the missives of sale the pursuer's offer is to purchase Greenhall House and Greenhall Cottage 'with the fixtures and fittings therein so far as belonging to the proprietor.'

"I do not think that the mention of 'fixtures' adds anything to the offer, because the ordinary meaning of the word, when used in reference to such a transaction, is such articles as, in the absence of special stipulation, pass to the purchaser of the house, although capable of being removed.

"The word 'fittings,' however, is in a different position, and presumably means such things as ordinary grates or gas-brackets, which in the absence of a special agreement the seller would be entitled to remove.

"If, therefore, the question raised in this case depended upon the construction of the missives, I should be disposed to hold that the articles enumerated in the condescendence (Article 3) were included in the sale.

"The pursuer, however, has accepted a disposition in which there is no mention of fixtures and fittings. That disposition will carry all those things which the law regards as part of the building in a question between seller and purchaser, but will not carry anything more, and I think that it is settled that articles which are so slenderly affixed to the building, as grates and gas-brackets, and which can be removed without injury to themselves or to the building, are not part of the building, and do not pass to a purchaser under a disposition of the building.

"The question therefore is, whether it is competent for the pursuer to go behind the disposition and to found upon the missives of sale? I am of opinion that that question must be answered in the negative. There were not here two contracts, one in regard to the heritable subjects and the other in regard to the fittings. There was only one contract, and the disposition was intended to give effect, and was accepted as giving effect, to that contract. It is the disposition alone, therefore, which regulates the rights of parties, and it is not said that the disposition is in any way ambiguous. The pursuer accordingly is entitled to everything which is embraced within the dispositive clause, and to nothing more.

"Now, most of the articles enumerated in the condescendence appear to me not to be fixtures. Grates which are built in in the ordinary way, and which can be removed without injury to themselves or to the walls, are not fixtures, and it is not said that there is anything peculiar in the way in which the grates in the house in question are built in. Again, gas-brackets and finger-plates, which are merely affixed by screw-nails, are not fixtures.

No. 30.

Nov. 30, 1900. Jamieson v. Welsh.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary regarded "fixtures" as heritable, and "fittings" as moveable; he was therefore wrong in treating the missives as containing one and the same contract with the disposition. The missives constituted a contract for the sale of the heritage, and also a contract for the sale of moveables, while the disposition only dealt with heritage. A conveyance was appropriate only as a mode of carrying out the contract to sell heritage. So far as the sale was a sale of moveables, the missives alone were sufficient to make it effectual, or if anything further was needed, it was delivery. The acceptance of the disposition could not therefore be held to operate as a discharge of the seller's obligation in regard to the moveable subjects transferred by the missives. The cases of Lee v. Alexander[1] and Orr v. Mitchell[2] had no application where a disposition did not cover the same subject-matter as the missives.

Argued for the respondent;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong in treating "fixtures" and "fittings" as different things. They were co-extensive terms, and referred to things so attached to the heritage as to pass without special stipulation under a disposition as part of the heritage. The disposition therefore exhausted the subject-matter of the contract in the missives and superseded the missives. But the principle of Lee v. Alexander[1] and Orr v. Mitchell[2] went further than this, and precluded any reference to the missives after a disposition had been tendered and accepted. Such acceptance implied a discharge of the obligations in the missives in consideration of the disposition. Here this view was confirmed by the fact that the price stipulated in both was the same.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I fully accept the doctrine laid down in the House of Lords in the case of Lee v. Alexander[1] that "the execution of a formal conveyance, even when it expressly bears to be in implement of a previous contract, supersedes the contract in toto, and that the conveyance thenceforth becomes the sole measure of the rights and liabilities of the contracting parties," and in the dictum of Lord Watson in the case of Orr v. Mitchell[2] that "when a disposition in implement of sale has been delivered to and accepted by the purchaser, it becomes the sole measure of the contracting parties' rights, and supersedes all previous communings and contracts, however formal"; but it appears to me that that doctrine does not apply to the present case. The contract in this case related

There are, however, two of the articles enumerated in regard to which I am doubtful. There is a kitchen range with high-pressure boiler, and I think that very probably that may be a fixture. Then in the principal greenhouse opening rods and handles are said to have been taken away. I assume that it is admitted that the greenhouse is a fixture, and if the opening rods and handles were attached to a moveable part of the framework of the greenhouse whereby it could be opened or shut, I am inclined to think that they would form part of the structure, although they might be removeable merely by unscrewing a nut.

"I therefore think that as regards the kitchen range and the greenhouse fittings I must ascertain the precise facts."

to two separate and distinct classes of things—(1) the proper heritable subjects, which I shall for the present assume with the Lord Ordinary would include such "fixtures" as would pass with a conveyance of the house; and (2) the "fittings," which would not pass under such a conveyance, and which, for the purposes of the present question, are to be treated as moveables. The subjects of the contract were thus (1) the heritage, and (2) certain corporeal moveables, viz., the "fittings." It is quite in accordance with principle that where a disposition bears to be in implement of a contract mentioned in it, or where the kind of property to which a contract related has been made the subject of a disposition, this should conclude all question as to the meaning of the contract in so far as it relates to that property, as, for example, the extent or incidents of it, but I am unable to see any ground upon which it could be held to conclude all question in regard to property which it does not purport to convey, e.g., corporeal moveables, merely because the two kinds of property were dealt with in one contract, especially as such corporeal moveables would not be made the subject of a conveyance, but would pass by delivery as the appropriate mode of transferring them. If, for example, a contract was entered into for the sale of a house, and of all the furniture and plenishing, including pictures, silver-plate, china, and the like, in it at the date of the contract, these articles would not be made the subject of any conveyance or assignation, but would be transferred by delivery and by possession of them being taken, while the house would be conveyed by a disposition which would make no mention of the moveable articles. I am unable to see any principle upon which it could be held that an acceptance of a conveyance of the heritable estate, for the transfer of which conveyance is the appropriate mode, should be held to imply a surrender of the right of the purchaser to corporeal moveables, of perhaps as great or greater value, purchased under the same contract, but for the transfer of which no written title was either required or appropriate. The parts of the contract relating to the heritage and the moveables respectively were as separate as if they had been expressed in different instruments. In this connection it is to be kept in view that, as already pointed out, the disposition does not bear to be granted or accepted as in implement of any contract, so that its terms do not import that the contract is discharged in so far as it related to anything not conveyed by the disposition.

It was, however, maintained by the defender that, even assuming that this would have been so if separate prices had been stipulated to be paid for the heritage and the moveables respectively, the result should be different where, as in the present case, a cumulo price was stipulated to be paid for the heritage (including the fixtures) and the fittings. But I am unable to see how this can make any difference if the views above expressed are correct. The obligation would still remain to deliver the corporeal moveables unless the claim to them had been discharged by accepting delivery of the conveyance of the separate heritable estate, which, for the reasons already given, I think it could not be.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and that a proof should be allowed to the parties of their respective averments.

LORD ADAM concurred. No. 30.

Nov. 30, 1900. Jamieson v. Welsh.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur, and will confine myself to an illustration of the difficulty of applying the Lord Ordinary's principle without considerable reserve.

Take, for example, a contract of sale for an interest in heritable estate and an interest in ships. This might take place in the sale of the business of a commercial company carrying on trade on the sea, or in the case of the sale of a landed estate with a yacht. It would be impossible to carry out the Lord Ordinary's principle in such a case. Gas-brackets, or a horse and cart, might perhaps be included in a deed of conveyance of land, though this would be a clumsy way of giving delivery. But it would not be possible to make an effective transfer of a ship in a conveyance of land, because by Act of Parliament ships have to be transferred in a special manner, viz., by bill of sale registered in a special register.

The Lord Ordinary's proposition would be sound if qualified to this extent, that it is not competent to go behind a deed of conveyance which exhausts the subject-matter of the contract, but in the case of a deed which either bears to be in part performance, or can be shewn by comparison to be only a part performance, the contract subsists until performance is complete.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship. It is, perhaps, to be regretted that in a case of this kind we should be compelled to allow a proof which may involve the parties in expenses out of all proportion to the value of the matter in dispute. But that is for them to consider. We must determine the legal rights of litigants, and must leave it to themselves to consider whether it is wise to carry on a costly litigation about matters of little importance.

I am unable to assent to the Lord Ordinary's view of the question at issue. He says the question is whether it is competent for the pursuer to go behind the disposition and to found on the missives of sale. He answers this question in the negative, but it seems to be very doubtful whether he has carried out that answer to its logical conclusion, because after having decided that he cannot go behind the disposition he proceeds to decide the case upon a construction of the missives of sale. He says there is one contract, not two, and on that ground he holds that the disposition was merely intended to carry into effect the previous contract. I do not advert to this as mere criticism of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, because I think it enters into the essence of the whole question between the parties. If a disponee tables a disposition, and says it is in itself conclusive of the contract between him and the disponer, he is in a very strong position; but when he says, compare the disposition with an independent contract, and you will find that the contract contains nothing which is not dealt with in the disposition, and, therefore, that the contract is superseded, his position is totally different. That cannot be determined without interpreting both instruments. I, therefore, cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary's statement that the rights of parties depend entirely on the disposition. There is no doubt as to the soundness of the proposition, that when a disposition has been delivered and accepted in performance of a contract for the sale and purchase of land, it is final and conclusive as the expression of intention of the parties in regard to all rights which it is intended and adapted to carry. But a disposition is not a habile mode of transferring corporeal moveables, except such as have been so attached to the soil as to be made part of it, and, accordingly, where there is a sale of land and of separate moveables together, the proper method of completing the purchaser's right, according to our former practice, was to execute a conveyance of the land and to deliver the moveables, and if in any such case the property of the moveables must now be held to pass without delivery, still, where anything beyond the contract itself is required to transfer the right, it is quite certain that it cannot be transferred and the moveables cannot be delivered by conveyance and infeftment. Accordingly, a sound conveyancer in framing a disposition for carrying out such a sale will not think it necessary to insert a futile conveyance of the moveables which would carry nothing. It seems to follow that the mere omission to mention moveables in this disposition affords no indication of a departure by the purchaser from his right to obtain delivery of any moveables he was entitled to under the missives. But then it was said that there is more than mere omission, and the argument is deserving of consideration. It is said that the disposition conveys the land and fixtures for a price of £475 which has been paid; and when the previous contract is looked at, we find that exactly the same price in a lump sum is agreed to be paid for the subjects included in the missives, and that, accordingly, it would seem to follow that the subjects conveyed by disposition are all that the purchaser was entitled to under the missives. I am not prepared to say that this argument is sound on other grounds, but the true answer to it is, that it is a mere inference of fact, which must yield to the actual fact as ascertained by the contract which, ex hypothesi of this argument, is the proper record of the transaction. Nor will it do to say that this contract cannot be looked at because of the subsequent disposition, because it is only by looking at it that the argument arises at all; and secondly, because, for the reasons stated by your Lordship, the disposition does not supersede the contract in this matter. The disposition is a written instrument for its own purposes, and has nothing to do with the sale of corporeal moveables, as to which the rights of parties must depend on the terms of the original missives which constitute the contract, and which are the only writings having any bearing on this part of the subject-matter.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and allowed both parties a proof of their respective averments.

Bennett's in 1894. Under the feu-dispositions Stevenson had a servitude of way over a portion of a private road on Bennett's feu. Shortly after Bennett had obtained his feu-disposition Stevenson brought an action in the Sheriff Court against Bennett for interdict against certain encroachments by Bennett, alleged to interfere with Stevenson's exercise of the servitude. Stevenson obtained interdict in the Sheriff Court, with expenses, and on appeal this judgment was affirmed, with additional expenses. Bennett having become bankrupt without payment of these expenses, Stevenson brought an action for the expenses against the common superior, alleging that the superior had been the true dominus litis in relation to the defence in the action for interdict.

It was proved that the dispute out of which the action for interdict arose originated between Stevenson and the superior before Bennett had obtained his feu; that Bennett did not wish to make the encroachments complained of or to defend the action, and that he made the encroachments and defended the action only because he was urged to do so by the superior, and because he understood that the superior undertook responsibility for all expenses; that the defences were entered in Bennett's name by the superior's agents and on the superior's instructions; that while the action was in the Sheriff Court the superior was consulted as to the various steps of procedure; that the superior gave instructions for the appeal to the Court of Session (in Bennett's name) without the authority or knowledge of Bennett; that when Bennett was informed that an appeal had been taken, he intimated that he did not wish to appeal, and he allowed his name to be used only on receiving a written guarantee from the superior undertaking responsibility for the whole expenses of the action; and that thereafter the action was conducted entirely on the instructions of the superior (who ultimately paid the whole expenses of the defence), without any interference on the part of Bennett.

Held (1) that the superior was acting in his own interest in taking the appeal to the Court of Session, and had the entire control of the proceedings in connection with the appeal, Bennett having neither interest therein nor control thereof, and that the superior was the true dominus litis of the appeal, and was liable to Stevenson for his expenses in opposing the appeal; but (2) (dub. Lord Moncreiff) that the superior was not liable to Stevenson for his expenses incurred in the Sheriff Court:—diss. Lord Young, who held that the superior was not the true dominus litis, and was not liable for any part of Stevenson's expenses, in respect that the superior had not a direct interest in the subject-matter of the litigation, and, through such an interest, a right to control the conduct of the litigation as he pleased without regard to the wishes of the nominal litigant.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

BY feu-disposition, dated 9th July 1887, William Jardine and Alexander Weir, as proprietors of the lands of Dykehead, in the parish of Shotts, Lanarkshire, feued out a piece of ground, one rood in extent, part of these lands, to William Stevenson junior, ironmonger, Dykehead. The ground feued was described as "lying in the south side of the public road leading from Stane to Shotts Kirk, and immediately to the east of the road or entrance into Dykehead farm-steading"; and as bounded, inter alia, "on the north by the south side of the said public road . . . on the west by the present fence dividing the ground hereby disponed from the said entrance into Dykehead farm-steading . . . together with the right to use the said road or entrance into Dykehead farm-steading to the extent of 11 feet in breadth and 65 feet backwards from off said public road and of forming a gate or access in said west boundary for carts and carriage traffic only within the limits of said 65 feet back from the said north boundary, . . . and we . . . grant warrandice, excepting always the current tacks or leases and the rights of the proprietors of the minerals in terms of their titles thereto."

After obtaining this feu-disposition Stevenson erected a building on the ground feued, and he also made a gate in the fence forming the west boundary, which gate became the access from the public road, over the Dykehead farm road, to the back part of Stevenson's building.

In January 1894 Robert Sneddon, who had come to be proprietor of the lands of Dykehead, including the superiority of Stevenson's feu, entered into negotiations with Alexander Bennett, miner, Dykehead, for a feu to Bennett of a piece of ground immediately to the west of Stevenson's feu.

On 18th January 1894 Messrs Motherwell & M'Murdo, Stevenson's law-agents, wrote to Sneddon that they had been informed by Stevenson "that you have feued, or are about to feu, the road between Dykehead Farm and Mr Stevenson's feu, which road Mr Stevenson is entitled to use, in terms of his title. We have to intimate that if any attempt is made to build on or otherwise block up this road, an action of interdict will be raised."

On 19th January Messrs Brown, Mair, Gemmill, & Hislop, Sneddon's law-agents, replied that their client "has no intention of building by himself or feuars on the 11 feet road running along the side of Mr Stevenson's feu. Mr Sneddon, however, informs us that the strip of ground on which Mr Stevenson under his title has right of way, is 11 feet broad and 65 feet long. Instead of putting his gate, as he was bound to do, within 65 feet from the northern boundary, it appears that Mr Stevenson has gone 12 feet farther back, thus making the road 77 feet long. Our client cannot permit this encroachment to continue, and unless you can assure us by Wednesday first that he will remove his gate from its present position, and bring it northward within the 65 feet limit, our client will immediately take steps that will effectually prevent further encroachment."

A correspondence then ensued, in which the agents respectively maintained the positions taken up in the foregoing letters.

The question in dispute depended on the breadth of the public road at the point where the Dykehead farm road branched off. Stevenson maintained that the public road at this point was about 12 feet broader, and consequently that the entrance to the farm road was 12 feet further south, than according to Sneddon's contention was the true state of the facts.

By feu-disposition, dated 21st March 1894, Sneddon disponed to Bennett a piece of ground specified immediately to the west of Stevenson's feu. This ground included the solum of the Dykehead farm road, in so far as ex adverso of Stevenson's west boundary. With reference to this road Bennett's feu-disposition contained the following clause:—"And reserving further to me and my successors and the said William Stevenson and me and my foresaids, other feuars and tenants and any other party on whom I or my foresaids may confer the same, a servitude of free ish and access over the strip of ground on the south-east of the ground hereby feued and included in the foresaid measurement of 11 feet in breadth at the narrowest point, and extending along the said south-east side from the said public road for a distance of 65 feet backwards, which strip of ground . . . shall remain unbuilt on in all time coming." The warrandice clause was in these terms:—"And I grant warrandice."

Before he had obtained the feu-disposition Bennett had commenced building operations on the ground, and in doing so he had treated the solum of 12 feet of roadway, which was the subject of dispute in the foregoing correspondence, as if it were under no restriction in favour of Stevenson. He deposited soil and other material on that part of the roadway, thereby hindering the traffic to Stevenson's feu, and he erected his building so as to encroach somewhat on the ground in dispute. This he did on the authority and at the suggestion of Sneddon.

In October 1894, after Bennett had completed the building of his house on his feu, and when he proposed to erect a fence on the disputed 12 feet, which would completely obstruct the entrance from the Dykehead farm road to Stevenson's feu, Stevenson brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Airdrie against Bennett praying to have him interdicted "from erecting a fence upon the entrance 11 feet in breadth and 65 feet in length backwards from the public road along the western boundary of the pursuer's property at Dykehead . . . which entrance is common property to the pursuer and the defender, and from laying down soil or other material thereon," and for decree ordaining the defender "instantly to remove all soil and other material laid down by him, and also to take down and remove the building already erected upon the said common entrance, and . . . to restore the said common entrance to the same conditions as it was before the same was interfered with by the defender."

In this action defences were lodged. The pursuer Stevenson did not insist in the prayer to have the building removed, and quoad that the action was ultimately dismissed. Quoad ultra the Sheriff-substitute (Mair) being of opinion that the 12 feet in question formed part of the 65 feet from the public roadway, pronounced an interlocutor on 31st July 1896, granting interdict, and ordaining Bennett to remove the soil from the 12 feet of roadway, with expenses. On 19th March 1897 the Sheriff (Berry) adhered, with additional expenses. On appeal the Second Division, on 2d July 1897, affirmed the judgment, with the expenses of the appeal.

Stevenson's expenses, as taxed, amounted to £82, 9s. 1d., of which £42, 13s. 4d. were the expenses of the appeal to the Court of Session.

Bennett having been sequestrated without having paid Stevenson any part of his expenses, Stevenson brought the present action in the Sheriff Court at Airdrie against Sneddon for payment of £82, 9s. 1d.

The pursuer, after describing his own and the defender's titles, and also that of Bennett, and giving a narrative of the proceedings in the former action, averred,—(Cond. 5) "In that action the said Alexander Bennett was not the real defender. The real dominus litis was the said Robert Sneddon. He acted as principal, and the said Alexander Bennett acted as his agent. Although directed only against the said Alexander Bennett, the said action seriously affected the said Robert Sneddon. It decided whether or not it was ultra vires of him to grant a disposition such as he did to the said Alexander Bennett. Accordingly when said action was raised, the said Alexander Bennett requested the defender to free and relieve him of all expenses connected therewith. This the defender did by granting to the said Alexander Bennett a letter of guarantee. In so doing he authorised the said Alexander Bennett to defend said action, and during the whole period of its dependence defender's real attitude to it was that of dominus litis. Through his interest in it he had the full control and direction of said action, and therefore power to retard or push it on or put an end to it altogether. Never during its dependence did he abandon the attitude of dominus litis which he had taken up or quit himself of the responsibility he had incurred in granting said letter of guarantee. Had he done so, his agent, the said Alexander Bennett, would have ceased to defend said action."

The defender denied the averment quoted, and stated (Stat. 1) that shortly after the action for interdict was raised, he, "being desirous of protecting his feuars as far as possible," agreed to relieve Bennett "to the extent of one-half of any expense which he might incur in opposing the said action of interdict"; that he ultimately became responsible for the whole expenses of the defence, but that he had no personal or pecuniary interest in the result of that action, and no control over the proceedings therein.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defender being the real dominus litis in said action, and, as such, liable to pursuer in the sum sued for, decree therefor should be granted against him, with expenses, as craved.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to warrant the conclusions of the action. (2) The pursuer's statements, so far as material, being unfounded in fact and law, the defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

On 10th June 1898 the Sheriff-substitute (Mair) allowed a proof before answer.

The facts already narrated were established by the evidence led at the proof. The rest of the evidence was to the following general effect, certain further details, including quotations from the evidence, written and parole, being given in the opinions of the Court, particularly in the opinion of Lord Moncreiff:—

Bennett personally had no wish to interfere with Stevenson's use of the 12 feet in question of the Dykehead farm road. He deponed that he interfered with that part of the road only because Sneddon urged him to do so, telling him that it was within his right. The correspondence between Motherwell & M'Murdo and Brown, Mair, Gemmill, & Hislop regarding Bennett's operations, which was initiated by the letters, above quoted, of 18th and 19th January 1894, was continued down to the raising of the action for interdict in October 1894, but there was nothing in that correspondence to suggest that, after the granting of the feu-disposition to Bennett on 21st March 1894, Brown, Mair, Gemmill, & Hislop had ceased to act for Sneddon, or that they were acting for Bennett. When the action for interdict was served on Bennett, he took the service copy of the petition to Sneddon. Bennett deponed that he did not wish to defend the action, and that he did so only because Sneddon told him that his (Bennett's) name was necessary, and because Sneddon agreed to be responsible for the whole expenses—according to Sneddon's evidence he undertook, in the first instance, to pay one-half only of the expenses. Sneddon took the service copy of the petition to his agents, Brown, Mair, Gemmill, & Hislop (who had also done some work for Bennett), and instructed them to enter appearance,* which they did. During the progress of the action in the Sheriff Court, Sneddon was consulted as to the various steps of procedure, and as to the witnesses to be examined, but he did not attend the proof; Bennett was examined as a witness. On 19th March 1897, the day on which the Sheriff affirmed the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, Brown, Mair, Gemmill, & Hislop wrote to Sneddon advising an appeal. On 31st March Sneddon instructed Brown, Mair, Gemmill, & Hislop to lodge an appeal, which they did on the following day. Bennett did not authorise, and knew nothing about, the taking of the appeal before it was taken. He was on 7th April informed by Brown, Mair, Gemmill, & Hislop that the case had been appealed in his name.† He said that he did not wish to appeal, and he agreed to allow his name to be used only on condition of receiving a written guarantee from Sneddon undertaking all liability for expenses. On 9th April, Brown, Mair, Gemmill, & Hislop sent Bennett the letter of guarantee which is quoted below.‡ This letter Bennett gave back to Sneddon in June following, prior to the hearing in the Court of Session. The appeal in the Court of Session was conducted throughout on the instructions of Sneddon, and without any interference on the part of Bennett. Sneddon paid the whole expenses of the defence, both in the Sheriff Court and in the Court of Session.

On 17th January 1900, the Sheriff-substitute (Mair) pronounced this interlocutor in the present action:—"Finds that the defender was the dominus litis (of the defence) in the action mentioned in the petition, and is liable in the expenses to which the pursuer was therein found entitled: Finds that these expenses, as taxed, amounted to £82, 9s. 1d., for which sum, with interest thereon, decerns against the defender in terms of the prayer of the petition: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

On appeal the Sheriff (Berry), on 24th May 1900, adhered.

The defender appealed.

The nature of the arguments sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Court.[1]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The defender in this case is alleged by the pursuer to have been the true dominus litis in a litigation between the pursuer and one Bennett, which related to certain rights of the owners of feus given off by the present defender to the pursuer and to Bennett. The pursuer in this action was successful in the litigation in the Sheriff Court, and the case was carried by appeal to this Court. While the case was in the Sheriff Court the defender gave Bennett assistance in carrying on the case, and it is clear upon the evidence that he took a great interest in the litigation, and undertook to assist Bennett with funds to enable him to carry it on. Up to this point I do not think that he had taken up such a position as that it could be said of him that he was the dominus litis in the proceedings. Anyone is entitled to aid a litigant with funds to carry on his case, and as long as he confines himself to thus supporting with funds a litigant who is in truth carrying on the case himself, he incurs no responsibility to the opposite party. And, therefore, up to the date of the case being concluded in the Sheriff Court, I am of opinion that the defender in this case cannot be made liable for the pursuer's expenses.

But a distinct change took place from that day forward. It appears from the evidence that Bennett, the party to the litigation, had never instructed any appeal to be taken, and declined to take it, being satisfied that there was no case which he could successfully maintain. But the defender took up the case himself. He instructed an appeal to be taken out in Bennett's name, and took up and conducted the case, Bennett having nothing further to do with it, and indeed advising the present defender to give up the appeal, being satisfied that it was untenable. The defender took the whole proceedings into his own hands. Although Bennett asked him to withdraw the appeal, he was resolved to go on, and did go on, and the only action taken by Bennett was the negative action of not interfering, and so allowing the case still to go on in his name. On the other hand, the defender instructed the appeal, being advised by his own agent that he had an interest in the case. He took the whole charge of the case without regard to Bennett, the party to the suit. But for his orders the appeal would neither have been taken nor carried on. In these circumstances I think that the defender was the actual litigant in the appeal, and that accordingly he is liable in the expenses of the respondent in the appeal, he having been unsuccessful in maintaining the appeal in this Court. In the language used in the judgment in the case of Kerr,[1] he was the person who caused the expense to be incurred in this Court. I would therefore propose that the interlocutors in the Court below should be altered, and the defender found liable to the pursuer in the expenses of the appeal to the Court of Session in the case at the present pursuer's instance against Bennett.

LORD YOUNG.—I have from the first regarded this as an important case raising questions of law of considerable interest.

The defender's first plea in law is a plea to relevancy. The Sheriff-substitute, disregarding that plea, allowed a proof before answer, and his judgment proceeds on the proof thus allowed. The Sheriff has simply affirmed the Sheriff-substitute's judgment. At the commencement of the debate I called attention to the fact that both the learned Sheriffs have disregarded the Act of Sederunt, which requires every Sheriff, in giving judgment on a proof, to pronounce distinct and separate findings in fact and in law, and I indicated my view that we ought to follow the course which we have taken in some cases, and remit to the Sheriff-substitute to find the facts as he was prepared to find them on the evidence, and on which his findings in law were based. Your Lordships did not take that view, and I did not see any necessity to press it. So that we have here a judgment proceeding on a proof, but without any findings in fact.

I take the law on the subject from the decision in Mathieson v. Thomson,[2] and from the judgment of Lord Rutherfurd in that case, where he says at p. 23 of the report,—"There may be some difficulty in defining exactly what is a dominus litis; but I confess that I very much agree with what has been laid down by your Lordship, and with the definition quoted from the civil law by Lord Ivory, that he is a party who has an interest in the subject-matter of the suit, and through that interest a proper control over the proceedings in the action. Now, it will not make a person liable in the expenses of an action that he instigated the suit, or told a man that he had a good cause of action, and that he would be a fool if he did not prosecute it, or though he promoted it by more substantial assistance. It will not make him liable in the expenses of the suit, that while he does both of these things he shall have some ultimate consequent benefit in the issue of that suit. But when you go a step further and find a party with a direct interest in the subject-matter of the litigation, and through that interest master of the litigation itself, having the control and direction of the suit, with power to retard it or push it on, or put an end to it altogether, then you have a proper character of dominus litis, and though another name may be substituted, the party behind is answerable for the expenses." I take that as a good definition of the facts which will constitute dominus litis, and I do so all the more readily because it was taken as a good definition in the last case in this Court on this subject, which occurred in the other Division—I mean the case of Kerr v. Employers' Assurance Corporation.[1] Lord Adam says this,[3]—"I have always understood the definition given by Lord Rutherfurd in the case of Mathieson v. Thomson[1] to be the sound definition of what a dominus litis was, and I understood Mr Campbell to approve of that definition. In that case it is laid down that a dominus litis is 'a party who has an interest in the subject-matter of the suit, and through that interest a proper control over the proceedings in the action.'" In both these cases direct interest in the subject-matter of the suit was taken as the sound definition of dominus litis. I take Lord Rutherfurd as giving a definition of dominus litis—as stating those facts without which you cannot have a dominus litis—and not as stating a case in which liability as dominus litis had been established, for on the evidence which was before the Court in the case of Mathieson[2] it was held that liability as dominus litis had not been established. That being so, we have to consider whether a relevant case of liability as dominus litis has been stated here, and if we have a relevant case, we have then to consider whether that case has been established by the evidence.

Stevenson v. Sneddon.

The suit, for the expenses of which the pursuer seeks in this action to have the defender found liable as dominus litis, was an action by the present pursuer against a man named Bennett. In that action the pursuer prayed the Court to interdict Bennett from erecting a fence upon the entrance 11 feet in breadth and 65 feet in length backwards from the public road along the western boundary of the pursuer's property at Dykehead, "which entrance is common property to the pursuer and the defender," and from laying down soil or other material thereon, and for decree ordaining the defender to remove all soil or other material laid down, and also to take down a building already erected by him upon the said common entrance, and to restore the said common entrance to the same condition as it was in before it was interfered with by the defender. In that action the pursuer succeeded but only partially, for he did not get a decree to have the house removed, but he was found entitled to expenses, and it is for these expenses that he sues the present defender Sneddon in this action on the ground that Sneddon was truly the dominus litis as regards the defence in the former action. Now, what are the grounds on which the pursuer says that Sneddon was the dominus litis of that action? I proceed to consider the pursuer's statements on record here with reference to the plea on which no judgment has been pronounced—the plea to relevancy.

The pursuer begins by stating that the defender was the proprietor of the subjects which became the property of Bennett, and that he disponed these subjects to Bennett by a feu-disposition in 1894, but there is not a word said which implies that, as the seller of the subjects to Bennett, any liability attaches to the defender. It is just an ordinary disposition by a seller to a purchaser. It is no doubt a disposition under which the purchaser was to hold of the seller as superior, but there is no suggestion that liability attaches to Sneddon as superior any more than as seller. I can understand the case of a seller granting a conveyance in such terms as to make him liable to the purchaser in the event of the purchaser being unsuccessful in a litigation with a third party regarding the subjects. In such a case if the seller actively intervenes and assists the purchaser in the litigation, it may well be that he may be held liable as dominus litis. But there is no averment of that sort here. Neither the fact that Sneddon was the seller to Bennett nor the fact that he was Bennett's superior is alleged to have any bearing on the question.

I come now to the 5th article of the condescendence, for the case for the pursuer does not seem to me to begin to be stated until that article is reached. It is in these terms (his Lordship read cond. 5). That contains in my opinion the whole statement in support of the proposition on which this action is founded—that Sneddon was the dominus litis of the former action.

Now, I am, I must say, clearly of opinion that the averments which I have just read do not contain a relevant case for holding that Sneddon was dominus litis of the former action. In the averments no distinction is drawn, or is attempted to be drawn, between Sneddon's relation to that action before it was appealed to the Court of Session, and his relation to it after it had been appealed. Your Lordship is of opinion that Sneddon was not dominus litis before the case came to the Court of Session, and I am of that opinion also. But I further think that there is here no relevant statement that he was dominus litis even after the case had been appealed. I think that there is no relevant statement that he had a direct interest in the subject-matter of the action, and through that interest a proper control of the action. In the case of Mathieson[1] both Lord Rutherfurd and Lord Ivory point out that there may be very substantial interests which do not amount to interests giving a control of an action. For example, a man of business who, from motives of pure charity, undertakes the case of a poor person who himself cannot afford to defend or prosecute a claim; or a speculative agent, who is of opinion that, with probable advantage to himself if successful, he may undertake to conduct a litigation for a poor person; in such cases the agent has an interest in the litigation, but it is not an interest of a kind which will constitute him the dominus litis. In the same way an action is frequently taken up by a trade or profession, who promise to see the pursuer or the defender, as the case may be, through with it to the very end from the Sheriff Court or the Outer-House to the House of Lords, if need be; but neither in that case is there an interest in the subject-matter of the suit. The trade or profession plainly enough has an interest in having the case decided in the one way or the other, but an interest in the subject-matter of the suit does not mean an interest in having the case decided in one way or the other—it means an interest in the suit itself.

Now, are there any averments here shewing that Sneddon was interested in the subject-matter of the suit? I do not think so. What is required is not a mere general averment that Sneddon was interested in the suit. It will not do just to say that. You must point out in some detail what the nature of his interest is, and how he came to have it. I put the question more than once—was it intended to say that Sneddon had an interest as the seller of the subjects or as the superior? and the answer I got was that it was impossible to say that he had an interest either as the seller or as the superior. Your Lordship, I suppose, thinks so too, because it is your Lordship's opinion that Sneddon had no interest in the suit up to the date of the appeal. Now, what does Sneddon's anxiety as to prosecuting the appeal shew? It shews, I should suppose, merely this—that he was anxious to make plain his bona fides in expressing the belief that Bennett was in the right. I should infer that Sneddon desired an appeal, and advised an appeal to be taken, merely because he thought that Bennett had the right on his side. I do not think that there is any averment here implying that there was anything more. There is no doubt the guarantee to pay the expenses, but as to that I must say that I am unable to see the bearing of it. It is just the case of a poor litigant with a friend who comes forward and undertakes responsibility for the litigant's expenses. When a person interposes in this way with his assistance there is nothing, I think looking either to authority or to the reason of the thing which should require us to hold that the person who has so come forward has been constituted the dominus litis. In a sense of course he has an interest in the litigation, and he also, through the litigant whom he is befriending, may have a certain control of the proceedings, but that is not the kind of interest nor the kind of control which are required to make a man the dominus litis. The control must be control through a direct interest in the subject-matter of the litigation, entitling the person having the interest and the control to deal with the litigation as he pleases without any regard to the will and disposition of the person who is nominally the party to the action—that person being, in so far as the action is concerned, a name and nothing more.

My opinion therefore is that the defender's plea to relevancy should be sustained, but if the case is to be determined on the facts disclosed by the proof, I should reach the same practical result. I should hold that it has not been proved that the defender had any direct interest in the subject matter of the suit, from which it follows that he had no proper control of the proceedings, and consequently that he was not the dominus litis.

Lord Trayner.—I think it may fairly enough be represented that, according to some authorities in our law, the distinctive marks of a dominus litis are, an interest in the subject-matter of the suit, and control of the action. It has not been determined, so far as I know, how much or how little interest in the subject-matter of the suit is necessary or sufficient to constitute the dominus litis; and as to the control, I think it is settled that that need not be absolute. But I think the later authorities have countenanced a somewhat wider view, and laid down a principle or rule upon the subject which is easier of application and altogether less technical than the rule which I have said is that recognised in the older cases. I shall advert to this, the newer principle, immediately; but think it right first to notice shortly the facts out of which the present question has arisen.

The defender is the proprietor of lands in the neighbourhood of Shotts, part of which he feued to the pursuer with a right of access to his feu over a certain road. The defender subsequently granted a feu of part of his lands in favour of Alexander Bennett, which included in its measurement the foresaid road, but reserved Stevenson's servitude over it. The pursuer, having some reason to believe that Bennett proposed in his building operations to encroach upon the road, intimated to the defender that such a proceeding, if adopted, would be an invasion of his rights, and that he would, if necessary, bring an interdict to prevent it. The defender's reply to this practically was that what Bennett proposed to do was within his right, and that the road to which the pursuer's complaint referred was not the road reserved to the pursuer; but that the pursuer had himself encroached on the defender's rights by placing his gate in such a position as to increase the length of the road in question, an encroachment which the defender said he would take steps to prevent by having the pursuer's gate removed from where it then stood. The result was that the pursuer brought his action of interdict against Bennett, in which he was successful, and Bennett was found liable in expenses. That action was appealed to the Court of Session, where the judgment of the inferior Court was affirmed, and Bennett again found liable in expenses. It is for the expenses in that action that the pursuer now seeks decree against the defender. I think the following facts have been clearly established:—(1) That Bennett personally had no desire or interest to encroach upon the road. (2) That he was incited to persist in his encroachment by the defender. (3) That the defender undertook to keep Bennett free of expense in connection with the encroachment, and the action of interdict. (4) That the defender was kept duly informed of the different steps of procedure which were taken in the action in the inferior Court by the agent therein, who acted for and in name of Bennett, and was also the defender's law-agent. (5) That when the decision in the inferior Court was pronounced, the defender, without the authority of Bennett, and contrary to his desire, instructed an appeal to this Court, where the appeal was conducted entirely on the instructions and at the expense of the defender; and (6) That he paid the expenses of the appeal, as well as the expenses incurred in the inferior Court, to the agents who acted for him, although acting nominally for Bennett. Now, if to this state of facts be applied what I have referred to above as the later or newer doctrine, there can be no doubt of the defender's liability for the claim now made upon him by the pursuer, at all events to some extent. In the case of Kerr[1] the Lord President said—"What is the ground on which a dominus litis is made liable in expenses? As I take it, it is simply the ground on which everybody is made liable in expenses, and it is stated thus by Lord Jeffrey in Kirkpatrick v. Irvine[2]—'If any party is put to expense in vindicating his rights, he is entitled to recover it from the person by whom it was created'—that is to say, by whom the expense was created. The person who ultimately holds a judgment in his favour is held to be the person who has the right, and if that right is challenged by anybody, and expense caused by the challenge, against the person causing the expense is the right to recover expenses." In like manner Lord Adam[3]—"The principle, I think, is that the party who has occasioned the expenses in the proceedings must refund these expenses." The other Judges in the Division concurred. I find the same views indicated, although not expressed with the same precision, in the case of Hepburn v. Tait.[1] No doubt the cases of Kerr[2] and Hepburn[1] were different in many respects from the present, but the opinions I have referred to were delivered as expressing a general principle, not affected by the specialties which distinguish those cases from this one. I concur in the opinions so delivered. The person who without just cause puts another to expense in vindicating his rights is the person who ought to pay the expense.

In the case of Fraser v. Malloch,[3] Lord Kyllachy, in an able and very interesting judgment, arrives at the conclusion that the liability of a dominus litis depends upon whether it can be affirmed that the nominal pursuer or defender was merely the agent acting for an undisclosed principal. I reserve my opinion upon this view. But assuming it to be sound, I think the application of that rule also would involve the defender in liability for the expense, at least, incurred by the appeal to the Court of Session. For in that appeal Bennett simply lent his name to the defender at the defender's request. Bennett thought that in the case with the pursuer he (Bennett) was in the wrong, and wanted to give up the case before judgment was pronounced by the Sheriff. He certainly never appealed against that judgment. So entirely did the defender know this, that after he had (without authority) taken the appeal, he asked his agent to apply to Bennett for leave to use his name as appellant, as Bennett (in his opinion) was more likely to give his consent if asked by the agent than if asked by himself (the defender). Bennett did consent to his name being used on being guaranteed that the present defender would keep him free of expense as well as relieve him of any expense for which he might be held liable. That guarantee the defender gave. I think, therefore, it cannot be doubted that in the appeal to this Court Bennett was merely a nominal appellant acting merely as agent for and at the request of the present defender.

But even applying the old and narrower ground of liability, I think the defender has incurred some liability for expenses as dominus litis. The old requirements were, as I have stated, interest in and control of the suit. Had the defender no interest in the action between the pursuer and Bennett? His law-agent (examined as a witness in the case) says that the defender had a "real interest in the action," and explains this to consist in questions which might arise on his warrandice to one or other of his vassals. If the law-agent had that opinion, he doubtless so advised the defender, and the defender therefore had, or thought he had, a "real interest" in the question which the pursuer's application for interdict raised. That he did think so appears from his statement in this case, where he explains (stat. 1) that he assisted Bennett from a desire to protect "his feuars." I do not suppose he came to Bennett's assistance merely because Bennett was being oppressed by a neighbouring feuar. He would probably have allowed Bennett to fight his own battle had there not been behind his own interest as superior to look to. He had not only an interest in the case, but he had also the control, and the entire control, of the appeal. He instructed it, he called it his appeal, was present at its discussion, paid for it, and could certainly have departed from it just as he had taken it, without consulting Bennett or any other person. It was remarked in the course of the debate that he had not the control of the appeal, because Bennett could at any moment have disclaimed or withdrawn it. Well, perhaps he could. So could any nominal pursuer or defender. But so long as that is not done the control lies with the dominus—and it remained in fact with and was exercised by the defender in this case down to the final judgment of this Court.

On either of the views, therefore, whether the older or more modern, on which the liability for expenses as dominus litis may be founded, the liability of the defender here seems to be made out. I have had no difficulty in coming to that conclusion. The only difficulty I have felt is, whether the defender's liability is for the whole expenses incurred, or only the expenses of and connected with the appeal to the Court of Session. I think there is room for holding as I do (although I have reached that conclusion with some difficulty), that while the action was pending in the Sheriff Court, the connection which the defender had with it, although he had then as later a real interest in the case, was or might be thought to be that only of encouraging Bennett to resist the pursuer, and assisting him to do so by agreeing to pay the expenses incurred to his own agent. On that ground I am of opinion that the defender is not liable to the pursuer in the expenses incurred by the pursuer in the Sheriff Court. But in regard to the appeal the case stands in a very different position. In the appeal the defender was the true dominus litis, and for the reasons I have already given, I think he is liable to the pursuer in the whole expenses of and connected with that appeal. To that extent and effect I would affirm the interlocutor appealed from.

I have not adverted at all to the terms of the guarantee given by the defender to Bennett after the appeal to the Court of Session was taken, because, in my opinion, the defender's liability to the extent I have mentioned seemed sufficiently established without reference to the guarantee. I may just add, however, that the terms of that guarantee afford important evidence of the fact that in the appeal the defender was the true dominus litis, and Bennett in the strictest sense a mere mask or name under cover of which the defender acted.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree with the Sheriffs that in the former process between the pursuer and Alexander Bennett the present defender Sneddon was the true dominus litis. He caused the litigation; he instructed the defence; he financed it; he controlled it from first to last; and in consequence of his persistence, both in the Sheriff Court and in this Court, the pursuer, although successful in both Courts, has been saddled with expenses amounting to upwards of £80, which he is unable to recover from Bennett, who is bankrupt.

The facts which I have summarised are fully established by the proof and correspondence; but as the case is somewhat special, I shall advert in some detail to one or two points which seem to me to be of importance.

It is of importance to note that the dispute arose between the pursuer

No. 31.

Nov. 30, 1900. Stevenson v. Sneddon.

and the present defender before the feu was granted to Bennett. In January 1894 the pursuer suspected, and suspected rightly, that Sneddon intended, by himself or under cover of a feuar, to encroach upon an access to the pursuer's ground to which the latter is entitled under his feu-disposition. The access is described in his title as being a "road or entrance into Dykehead farm-steading to the extent of 11 feet in breadth and 65 feet backwards from off said public road." Accordingly, by letter of 18th January 1894, the pursuer's agents intimated to Sneddon that if any attempt were made to build on or otherwise block up this road an action would be raised.

In reply Sneddon's agents wrote a letter, dated 19th January 1894, which I quote in full, because it shews that at that time Sneddon maintained his right (wrongly, as appears from the subsequent decision) to encroach upon the pursuer's access—"Dear Sirs,—Mr Sneddon of Hillhouseridge has handed us your two letters of yesterday with instructions to reply. With reference to Mr Stevenson's feu we are to state that our client has no intention of building by himself or feuars on the 11 feet road running along the side of Mr Stevenson's feu. Mr Sneddon, however, informs us that the strip of ground on which Mr Stevenson under his title has right of way is 11 feet broad and 65 feet long. Instead of putting his gate, as he was bound to do, within 65 feet from the northern boundary, it appears that Mr Stevenson has gone 12 feet further back, thus making the road 77 feet long. Our client cannot permit this encroachment to continue, and unless you can assure us by Wednesday first that he will remove his gate from its position, and bring it northward within the 65 feet limit, our client will immediately take steps that will effectually prevent further encroachment.—Yours truly."

From this letter it will be seen that the dispute was not as to the width of the access, but as to its length, Sneddon alleging that the pursuer had encroached 10 or 12 feet beyond the 65 feet allowed by his feu-right. Off the piece in dispute the pursuer's only access opened.

In a letter dated 23d January the pursuer's agents accurately described the pursuer's position, which was afterwards held to be well founded, that his gate was within the 65 feet, and on 24th January 1894 Sneddon's agents reiterated their contention, and added,—"We must ask that your client desist from putting any gate beyond the limit of this 65 feet."

On 21st March 1894 Sneddon granted a feu to Bennett of the ground over which the access ran. The terms of the feu-disposition are unobjectionable, because in reserving the pursuer's right to the access it simply echoes the words in the pursuer's title—that is, it describes the right as being a right to use the road or entrance into Dykehead farm-steading to the extent of 11 feet in breadth, and 65 feet backwards from off said public road. But then—and this is the important matter—Sneddon instructed Bennett to build upon and obstruct the existing access so as to shut up the pursuer's gate. This is the account which Bennett gives,—"Before the feu was actually granted, and before any buildings were commenced, the defender said to me to go on with the building, that he would see it all right, or something to that effect. He told me that he had received a letter from the pursuer's agents with reference to the entrance, and that they had threatened, in the event of that entrance being blocked up, an action for interdict would be raised. After this conversation the defender authorised me to go on with the building, as the ground was his, and he said that I would be all right, that he would stand responsible for anything that would happen between pursuer and me. He was aware that the buildings were being erected; he saw them every day. Besides erecting the buildings I laid down soil on the entrance in question, and while I was doing so the pursuer checked me for putting the soil down—that I encroached on his gateway. Pursuer told me that I was encroaching too far, and I stopped at that time. I told him that I was only obeying orders. He asked me who gave me the orders, and I told him that it was Mr Sneddon, the defender. In consequence of the amount of dirt which was laid down, it was not very easy for a cart to go in; it was nearly half-way over the gate. I remember of a lorry coming from the railway station to deliver goods. The lorry could not get in, and the dirt was shifted at the time. I sent word to the defender about this; I was still to continue putting on the dirt—that the ground belonged to me. This was shortly before I was served with a summons for interdict." I may here note that this account, as far as I know, is not contradicted by Sneddon in his evidence.

The pursuer's agents on 22d September 1894 complained of Bennett's operations, stating that he was about to erect a fence which would prevent the pursuer getting entrance to his feu, and adding,—"We also find that, notwithstanding your letter to us of 19th January last, your client (that is Sneddon) has allowed Bennett to build on the 11 feet road." They added,—"Our client has no wish to adopt legal proceedings if these can be avoided, and we would suggest that a meeting upon the ground should take place at once, where we could more easily explain the position of matters, and when some arrangement might be come to."

The reply, 25th September 1894, is,—"We are not prepared to make any arrangement in the meantime in this matter." And on 3d October, long after Bennett had obtained his feu-charter, Messrs Brown, Mair, Gemmill, & Hislop, as agents for Sneddon, write,—"Referring to Mr M'Murdo's call to-day, we have seen Mr Sneddon, who says that he has undoubted evidence that the fence is on the line of the old hedge except at one point, where it slightly encroaches on the 11 feet of reserved ground. You had better, therefore, raise your action. We are," &c.

I have dwelt upon this part of the case because it shews that the dispute originated with the defender, and not with Bennett; that Bennett acted on the defender's instructions, and that even after the feu was granted to Bennett, Sneddon accepted the position of being the real contradictor, and challenged an action. The truth is that Bennett had no real interest to encroach upon this disputed 10 or 12 feet of ground; while the effect of the encroachment was to deprive the pursuer of his existing and only access.

Accordingly, when the process of interdict against Bennett was raised, it is not surprising to find that it was Sneddon and not Bennett who instructed Brown & Company to defend the action (see entry in business account under date 11th October 1894 [1]). Bennett's account of his position after defences were lodged is this—"When I got the summons I took it to the defender. I told him about getting it, and he said, in regard to that, that the thing was right enough, that he would stand responsible, and fight the battle to the end. I would not have fought the action if I had known that I was to pay the expenses, and would not have interfered with anything of the kind. It was on the distinct understanding from the very beginning that he was to pay all the expenses that I went on with the case. He told me that the case could only proceed in my name; that was in consequence of my desiring to have my name taken out of it; I did not want anything to do with it at all. I thought it was a matter I had nothing to do with. Mr Hislop, writer, Glasgow, took charge of the case; I suppose he was the defender's agent. It was not I who instructed Mr Hislop with reference to the defence in the action; I never gave him any instructions to go on with the case. I did not give instructions for the case being appealed to the Sheriff-principal, Glasgow, after it was decided by the Sheriff in Airdrie; and after it was decided by the Sheriff-principal I did not give any instructions for it being appealed to the Court of Session."

And again—"I asked him to withdraw the case and be done with it; even after the diet of proof in Airdrie, I told him when I went home that I thought he had the worst of the case, but he said he would not give it up, and that he was prepared to spend £100 on it, and more if it was required."

Although during the progress of the case in the Sheriff Court Sneddon kept in the background, he was in constant communication with the agents as to the conduct of the case, as the business account shews. I need not go over the items which instruct this. The most significant fact of all in judging who had control of the defence is that on the Sheriff affirming the Sheriff-substitute's judgment we find Brown & Company writing to Sneddon—"We are much disappointed that the Sheriff has not reversed in the case of Stevenson against Bennett, and would advise an appeal to be taken to the Court of Session. We have not written Mr Bennett, but perhaps you would communicate to him the nature of the Sheriff-principal's judgment, and let us have your views in course as to what should be done"; and in their business account this entry appears under date 31st March 1897—"Attendance with Mr Sneddon, who instructed us to appeal"; and accordingly on 1st April 1897 an appeal was taken to the Court of Session without communicating with Bennett.

Of course it was necessary that Sneddon should have the use of Bennett's name, and that was obtained on Sneddon giving Bennett a guarantee that he would relieve him of all the expenses of the action, and of all the expenses for which he might be found liable in the event of the case being decided against him.

The Sheriff's judgment against Bennett was pronounced on 19th March 1897. The appeal was noted on 1st April 1897. After the judgment, but before the appeal was taken, Brown & Company, on 25th March 1897, wrote to their Edinburgh correspondents, Macpherson & Mackay, a letter in which they ask the latter to advise them as to the prudence of appealing to the Court of Session. It contains this very suggestive passage—"The action is born of feeling and concerns a trumpery piece of garden ground not worth 20s. in all, but the parties have fought it as keenly as if it concerned a large estate." It may fairly be asked between whom was the feeling and who were the parties who fought so keenly. As far as I can observe from the proof I can detect no signs of feeling or keenness on the part of Bennett.

I refer to, but shall not read, Brown & Company's letter to Sneddon of 7th April 1897, and their letter to Bennett of 9th April 1897, which contained the guarantee.* From that time forward Bennett was not communicated with at all during the course of the appeal, and it was insisted in solely by Sneddon. So thoroughly did he identify himself with the case that when the appeal was dismissed he was anxious to bring a declarator at his own instance in the Court of Session.

It only remains to add that before judgment was pronounced Bennett, as Sneddon well knew, was hopelessly insolvent. Bennett himself says that Sneddon "urged on me being a bankrupt to let the debt fall on me, and he said in these circumstances I would be clear of it. I was not bankrupt at the time the proceedings were going on in the Sheriff Court."

And Macpherson & Mackay writing on 1st June 1897 say,—"Mr Sneddon has just been with us. He fears Bennett is on the eve of bankruptcy, and has urged us to press on the case." The reply is, "Yes, Bennett seems to be in difficulties, and we would like to see the decision before the smash comes."

I have said that Sneddon financed the defence. He did so by paying the agent's expenses in full. Mr Hislop, his agent, says,—"So far as I was concerned I looked to the defender as my client and for payment of our account. The defender has paid not only our account, but also the Edinburgh agent's account in connection with the whole action."

These being the facts, I think it is clear that the defence was lodged and persisted in, not for the benefit of Bennett, who had no interest that has been suggested to shut up the pursuer's gate, but to enable Sneddon to justify the position which he took up at the outset, and to defeat the pursuer.

It remains to be seen whether the law of Scotland provides no remedy for the serious loss which has been inflicted on the pursuer through the defender's actings.

The decisions in our Courts on the question of dominus litis are neither numerous nor exhaustive. I agree with Lord Kyllachy in what he says on this point in the case of Fraser v. Malloch,[1]—"Coming next to the Scots authorities, there is no doubt that these recognise the proposition that a party outside an action may in certain circumstances become liable for the expenses awarded to the successful party, and may be sued for those expenses as here by separate action. There is also no doubt that this liability has been said to depend on the interest which the outside party has in the subject-matter of the suit, and on the control which he possesses and exercises over the course of the suit. But the practical question always is as to the kind and degree of interest and of control which shall be sufficient for the purpose. And I am afraid that none of the decided cases formulate or ascertain the principle on which that question must be decided."

* These letters are quoted supra, p. 187, note.

Stevenson v. Sneddon.

I do not think that Lord Rutherfurd's definition of dominus litis in Mathieson v. Thomson,[1] "that he is a party who has an interest in the subject-matter of the suit, and through that interest a proper control of the proceedings in the action," is, or was intended to be, an exhaustive definition. His Lordship himself says there may be some difficulty in exactly defining what is a dominus litis; and I regard the definition and also the illustrations which his Lordship gives as being more illustrative than exhaustive. But it is of importance to note how widely different were the circumstances of the case in which Lord Rutherfurd's remarks were made from those of the present case. They will be found stated with great accuracy and detail in Lord Cowan's interlocutor,[2] but they are summarised clearly and shortly in the following passage[1] in Lord Ivory's opinion:—"Now, keeping in view the principle to be gathered from these and other sources, I do not think the circumstances of this case establish such an interest in or control over either the suit or its subject-matter on the part of this person as to impose upon him a liability for the expenses of process. This is not an action for his benefit. It was begun for no end of his, nor at his instigation. The summons had been raised and an agent employed before he had at all interposed. After he did interpose, it was to a very special and limited effect, and entirely in the interests and for the objects and purposes of the pursuer. And his interference had altogether ceased long before the litigation came to an end; so that it stands a fact in the case that even the agent ultimately employed had not a claim against him for the expenses incurred by the pursuer." The facts in the present case differ in every particular from those noted by Lord Ivory. It cannot be said that the defence was not instigated by Sneddon; nor that it was begun for no end of his; nor that he did not interpose until the defence had been lodged and an agent employed; nor that when he did interpose it was to a limited effect and in the interests of Bennett; nor that his interference ceased long before the litigation came to an end. We have not the advantage of knowing what would have been the opinion of Lord Rutherfurd and Lord Ivory in such a case as we have here; but it will be seen that the facts with which they were dealing were widely different. The two points of importance, however, in all such cases seem to be, for whose ends was the litigation truly carried on, and who had the control of it? In most of the reported cases the alleged dominus litis was, or was said to be, the owner of, or the person having the sole interest in, the subject-matter of the suit, who clothed a man of straw with the formal title and put him forward to fight his battle. Those, though clear and typical cases, I regard as merely examples of the rule. It is only right that any more extended application of the doctrine of dominus litis should be carefully scrutinised so as to guard against interference with legitimate advice and assistance given to a poor or inexperienced litigant. Where there is an independent litigant, advice and pecuniary assistance given by an outsider will not be enough to infer liability for expenses. But where the ostensible litigant has no wish, and no real interest, to sue or defend, and no money to litigate with, and no real control of the suit, but simply allows the man behind him to use his name, in order, it may be, to gratify some personal grudge, why should the latter, if he is unsuccessful, escape liability for expenses?

It is said that Sneddon had not control of the litigation, because Bennett could at any time have pressed it on or abandoned it. But the same might be said in any case in which the question of dominus litis arises. It is enough if the alleged dominus had, as here, the practical control of the suit.

In the case of Bradlaugh v. Newdegate,[1] Lord Coleridge quotes with approval a passage from Chancellor Kent (adopting Blackstone's definition, which is founded on a passage in Hawkins) which seems to me peculiarly apposite. It is to the effect that it is "a principle common to the laws of all well-governed countries that no encouragement should be given to litigation by the introduction of parties to enforce those rights which others"—that is, those whose rights they are—"are not disposed to enforce." And in dealing with the case in hand, Lord Coleridge says in regard to the defendant Mr Newdegate—"But, undoubtedly, he drove on to sue Mr Bradlaugh for a penalty, and he supported and maintained in involving Mr Bradlaugh in protracted and expensive litigation, a man who admitted that he would have never brought the action but for Mr Newdegate, who would never have gone on with it but for Mr Newdegate's bond, and who could himself pay no costs if the action failed."

The English doctrine of maintenance has no exact counterpart in our law, but it seems to me that the principle which underlies the passages which I have quoted is appropriate to this case, and in accordance with the spirit of our law, which is, that where a man is obstructed and put to expense in vindicating his legal rights, he should be reimbursed by the person who has truly caused the expense.

The matter therefore stands thus: If to involve liability interest is essential, it is sufficient that this was Sneddon's own quarrel, begun at a time when he had the plenum dominium of the ground of which he is still superior.

If interest is not essential, he is liable as an intermeddler in the dispute of another man who had no wish and no real interest to litigate.

In my opinion the defender has been most justly found liable in the pursuer's expenses. For myself I should not have been disposed to distinguish between the expenses of the appeal to this Court and those in the Sheriff Court. No doubt the defender's liability is clearer as to the former, because he granted a written guarantee for Bennett's expenses, and his control was no longer disguised, there being not even a pretence of consulting Bennett in regard to the conduct of the appeal; but even as regards expenses in the Sheriff Court, I should have been prepared to hold on the evidence that Bennett had no real control, and that Sneddon could have made him abandon the defence at any moment.

At the same time I appreciate the difficulty which your Lordship in the chair and Lord Trayner feel in regard to that part of the case; and as the judgment proposed is, looking to the division of opinion on the Bench, the only one possible in the circumstances, I do not dissent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of date 17th January and 24th May 1900 appealed against: Find in fact (1) that in October 1894 the respondent raised an action in the Sheriff Court against Alexander Bennett, praying, inter alia, for interdict against the said Alexander Bennett laying down soil or other material, and from erecting a fence, all or part of which obstructed the free use by the respondent of a road or footpath by which he had by his title a right of access to his ground feued by him from the appellant; (2) that the said Alexander Bennett did not desire to defend said action, but was urged and incited thereto by the appellant, who agreed and undertook that he would pay any expense incurred in so defending said action, in respect of which undertaking the said Alexander Bennett did appear in said action and defended the same; (3) that the defence stated by the said Alexander Bennett was repelled and interdict granted in said action by the Sheriff-substitute on or about the 31st day of July 1896, which was affirmed by the Sheriff on or about 19th March 1897; (4) that on or about 1st April 1897 the appellant, without the knowledge or authority of the said Alexander Bennett, appealed against the judgments mentioned in the preceding finding to the Court of Session, which appeal was ultimately dismissed, and the appellant therein found liable in expenses; (5) that in taking such appeal to the Court of Session the appellant was acting in his own interest, and had the entire control of the proceedings in connection with said appeal, and that the said Alexander Bennett had no interest in or control thereof; (6) that the appellant has paid the whole expenses incurred by Bennett in the Sheriff Court to his own agent, and has also paid the expenses incurred by himself to his own agent in connection with said appeal; (7) that the appellant was the true dominus litis in said appeal; and (8) that the respondent incurred expense in opposing said appeal to the extent of £42, 13s. 6d., as the same was taxed by the Auditor: Find in law that the appellant is bound to pay to the respondent the said sum of £42, 13s. 6d.: Therefore decern against the appellant for payment of the said sum of £42, 13s. 6d. to the respondent, with interest: Find the appellant liable in expenses both in this Court and in the Sheriff Court," &c.

Fee and Liferent—Company—Conversion of profits into capital—Issue of new shares in respect of capitalisation of profits.—A limited company which had power to capitalise profits duly passed the following resolutions:—"(1) That the board may apply £60,000 of the moneys standing to the credit of the reserve fund by way of dividend, distributable amongst the members in proportion to the amount paid up on each of their shares, and that such dividend be distributed as provided in the next resolution. "(2) That the board may pay said dividend by the distribution of paid-up shares of the company in manner following—that is to say, the board shall allot such new shares pro rata amongst the existing members according to the number of shares of which they may, on the 14th day of June 1899, be registered as holders, in the proportion of two new shares to thirteen existing shares, or as near thereunto as may be, and that the dividend to which each member is entitled under the preceding resolution be applied in payment of the shares falling to him."

The directors, in the exercise of the powers thereby conferred upon them, allotted the unissued shares among the shareholders, and applied the £60,000 in paying for them.

In a question between the liferenter of certain original shares and the fiar as to the right to the new shares, held that the operation was not a payment of dividend by the issue of paid-up shares, but was an addition to the capital of the company by the conversion of profits into capital, and that the new shares did not belong to the liferenter, but to the fiar.

1ST DIVISION.

THIS was a special case relating to the trust-disposition and settlement of the late Richard Shotman Cunliff, formerly engineer and shipbuilder in Glasgow, who died on 8th January 1879. The first parties were the acting trustees, the second party was the truster's widow, and the third parties were the representatives of the truster's eldest son (who survived the truster, but died on 15th February 1896), and nine surviving children of the truster.

The following narrative is taken from the opinion of the Lord President:—

"The questions in this case are (1) whether Mrs Cunliff, the liferentrix of nine-tenths of the residue of the estate left by her husband, the truster, is entitled to have 352 shares in the British and African Steam Navigation Company, Limited, which were issued under the circumstances after mentioned, transferred to her as part of the revenue of the estate; or (2) whether she is entitled to payment of the sum of £3524, the amount of the dividend on the original shares applied, to the extent of £3520, in payment of the new shares; or (3) whether the first parties, the truster's testamentary trustees, are entitled and bound to retain and administer the 352 shares as part of the capital of his trust-estate.

"The following are the circumstances under which these questions arise:—Mr Cunliff, the truster, died on 8th January 1879, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement and relative codicil, dated respectively 28th July 1871 and 31st August 1875, under which the first parties are the acting trustees. By that trust-disposition and settlement the truster directed his trustees to hold nine-tenths of the residue for behoof of his spouse—the second party—in liferent for her liferent use only, and he gave directions with respect to the capital which it is unnecessary to consider.

"At the time of his death the truster held shares in the British and African Steam Navigation Company, Limited, and the residue of his estate liferented by the second party consisted, inter alia, of 2290 shares of £10 each fully paid in that company, part of the truster's holding which the first parties were empowered to retain.

"By special resolution of the company passed at an extraordinary general meeting held on the 1st March 1899, and confirmed at another extraordinary general meeting held on the 22d of the same month, new articles of association replacing the old ones were adopted.

No. 32.
Nov. 30, 1900.
Cunliff's Trustees v. Cunliff.

These new articles provided and declared, inter alia, by article 3, that the capital of the company then stood at £450,000, divided into 45,000 shares of £10 each, of which 39,000 shares had been issued, which were, or were deemed to be, fully paid up, and that the remaining 6000 had not been issued; and, article 4, that 'the unissued shares shall be under the control of the board, who may issue such portion thereof as they may consider advisable, and allot or otherwise dispose of the portion they resolve to issue, to such persons, on such conditions, and either at par or at a premium, and at such times as the board may determine.'

"Under the original articles the directors were empowered to set aside out of the profits of the company such sums as they might think proper (1) as a reserve fund to meet contingencies, or for equalising dividends, or for repairing and maintaining, renewing and replacing and increasing the number of the vessels belonging to the company, or for any other purpose connected with the business of the company or any part thereof, or for discharging any of the liabilities of the company, or otherwise as the directors should think reasonable; and (2) such sum as they might think proper as an insurance fund; and they were empowered to invest the sums so set aside as they might think fit.

"By articles 122 and 123 of the new articles large powers were conferred upon the board of setting aside out of the profits of the company, before declaring a dividend, (1) such sum as they might think proper as a reserve fund; and (2) such sum as they might think proper as an underwriting account or insurance fund. The board were also vested with a large discretion as to the investment of these funds.

"For many years the company had, besides writing off largely from the book values of their ships for depreciation, kept, in terms of the articles, an underwriting account or insurance fund, crediting it with premiums in respect of the insurance of the ships, and debiting it with the amount of the losses.

"In December 1893 an account called 'reserve fund' was opened, and large sums were carried to the credit of that account from the profits of the preceding year, and of certain subsequent years, the balance at the credit of the account at 31st December 1897 amounting to £65,000. At the same date the balance at the credit of the underwriting account was £99,000, and the company held £200,000 in cash and liquid assets. Its liabilities to the public were of small amount.

"By article 124 of the new articles, the board were empowered 'from time to time (with the authority of a general meeting), to apply any of the moneys or investments then standing, or which may thereafter stand, to the credit of any reserve fund, or of the underwriting account or insurance fund, for the time being, by way of dividend, distributable amongst the members in proportion to the amount paid up, or held to be paid up, on each of their shares; and that such dividend may be distributed wholly or partly in cash, or in specific assets as provided in the following article,' and by article 125, it was declared that the board might (with the authority of a general meeting) 'pay any dividend wholly or in part by the distribution of specific assets, and, in particular, of paid-up shares of the company'; and that when any difficulty arose in regard to the distribution, they might settle the same as they might think expedient, and, in particular, might issue fractional certificates, and fix the value for distribution of such specific assets or any part thereof in order to adjust the rights of all parties. On 5th June 1899, the directors called a general meeting, to be held on the 14th of that month, for the purpose of considering, and, if so resolved, passing two resolutions, '(1) That the board may apply £60,000 of the moneys standing to the credit of the reserve fund by way of dividend, distributable amongst the members in proportion to the amount paid up on each of their shares, and that such dividend be distributed as provided in the next resolution'; and (2) 'that the board may pay said dividend by the distribution of paid-up shares of the company in manner following,—that is to say, the board shall allot such new shares pro rata amongst the existing members according to the number of shares of which they may, on the 14th day of June 1899, be registered as holders, in the proportion of two new shares to thirteen existing shares, or as near thereunto as may be; and that the dividend to which each member is entitled under the preceding resolution be applied in payment of the shares falling to him, and that cases involving the allotment of fractional parts of a share be adjusted by a cash payment of £1 for each fractional part, that is, £1 for each thirteenth part, the value of the shares being taken as equal to £13 per share, and that the board dispose of the fractional parts, so as to provide the funds for such payment.'

"Along with the notice calling the meeting, a circular was sent to the shareholders reminding them that, at the extraordinary general meeting of shareholders held on the 1st March then last, the chairman intimated that the board had had under consideration whether it might not be desirable 'at some time to convert a portion of the reserve fund into capital, and issue it to the shareholders in that form. The board having further considered the matter, have now resolved to carry this out, and the meeting on the 14th inst. is called for the purpose of giving effect to the resolutions.'"

The resolutions were duly passed, and the directors, in exercise of the powers thereby conferred upon them, allotted the unissued shares among the shareholders, and applied the £60,000 in paying for them. The shares were allotted without any application being made from the shareholders. 352 shares were issued to the first parties, and they received at the same time a cheque for £4 for the fractional parts of the allotment.

After the shares were allotted, the £60,000 were transferred in the company's ledger, by a journal entry, from the reserve fund to the credit of the dividend account, the account out of which all the dividends were paid. The dividend account was then debited in the cash-book with the amount due to each shareholder in respect of the dividend, the capital account being at the same time credited with the amount required to pay up each allotment, and the difference between the amount of dividend credited to each shareholder and the amount required to pay up his allotment being paid to him in cash. The sum entered in the dividend account as due in respect of the first parties' holding was £3524.

On 14th June the shares of the company were, as quoted in the official list of the Glasgow Stock Exchange, at 14½, this being cum the new shares. Thereafter the shares were not quoted till 27th July, when the quotation was 14, this being ex the new shares.

The second party contended that the shares issued as above mentioned should be treated as revenue, and be paid or transferred to her as liferentrix; or, alternatively, that she was entitled to the sum of £3524, the amount of the dividend on the original shares held by the first parties, applied to the extent of £3520 in payment of the new shares. The third parties contended that the shares formed part of the capital of the trust-estate, and ought to be retained and administered by the first parties as such.

The case contained this statement:—"16. At the date of the allotment of the shares the amount of cash and liquid assets belonging to the company was approximately equal to the combined amounts of the underwriting account and the reserve fund, the liabilities to the public being small. The combined amount of the underwriting account and the reserve fund as at 31st December 1898 was £164,000, and was at the date of the allotment of the new shares somewhat larger. The dividend could have been paid in cash."

The questions submitted to the Court were:—"1. Is the second party entitled to have the said 352 shares transferred to her as part of the revenue of the estate liferented by her? or 2. Is she entitled to payment of the said sum of £3524? or 3. Are the first parties entitled and bound to retain and administer the said shares as part of the capital of said trust-estate?"

Argued for the third parties;—This case fell within the principle of Bouch v. Sproull.[1] That case decided that a conversion validly made by a company of its profits into capital was binding on all parties interested as shareholders, and accrued to the benefit of a fiar as against a liferenter, where the shares were destined to, or held in trust for, a liferenter and fiar. In this case it was clear that a conversion had been validly effected, the capital being represented by the new issue of shares paid for by the dividends taken from the reserve fund.

Argued for the second party;—The articles of association which the House of Lords had to consider in the case of Bouch v. Sproull[1] were different from those of the British and African Steam Navigation Company now in question. This applied particularly to articles 124, 125. By these articles the only distribution of the reserve fund which could competently be made was a distribution by way of dividend. There was an authority to pay dividends by shares, but no authority to convert dividends into capital, whether in the form of shares or not. It was as a payment of dividend that new shares might be issued. In Bouch v. Sproull,[1] the profits could not have been paid or distributed in cash; they had been invested in buildings, and there was thus a de facto conversion into capital. The present case was thus distinguished in two respects from Bouch v. Sproull[1] (1) that there was no authority to distribute the reserve fund otherwise than by payments of dividend; and (2) that the assets to be distributed consisted not of corporeal moveables, ear-marked as capital, but of cash. This case was more analogous to the cases where it had been held that there was no conversion.[2] The alternative contention for the second party was supported by the case of In re Northadge.[3]

At advising,— No. 32.

Nov. 30, 1900. Cunliff's Trustees v. Cunliff.

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After the above narrative)—The questions which require to be considered are (1) Had the company power to capitalise the profits which had gone to make up the reserve funds? (2) If it had this power, did it, in intention and effect, exercise it? and (3) If it did exercise it, do the shares form part of the capital of the trust-estate, or are they payable to the second party as income of that estate?

I do not understand it to be disputed that the company had power to capitalise profits, thereby increasing the capital, and in this essential particular the present case differs from Brander v. Brander,[1] and Irving v. Houstoun,[2] which related to the stock of the Bank of England and stock of the Bank of Scotland respectively, neither of which had by its constitution any power to increase its capital.

Then as to the second question, it appears to me that the company validly exercised the power to convert the money in question into capital.

If this be so, it would prima facie appear that the shares of capital created by capitalisation would, like other shares of capital, in such a question as the present, form part of the estate falling to be held by the trustees, and would not be payable to the liferentrix as income. But the second party maintains that a specialty is introduced by the terms of articles 124 and 125 of the new articles, as well as of the resolutions of 14th June 1899, and these require careful attention. By article 124 the board were authorised to apply any moneys standing at the credit of any reserve fund by way of dividend, and it was declared that such dividend might be distributed in cash or in specific assets, and by article 125 the board were empowered to pay any dividend by distribution of specific assets, "and in particular, of paid-up shares of the company." It appears to me that if the power thus far recited had been exercised simpliciter, and according to its terms, i.e., by the Board first declaring a dividend and then resolving that it should be paid in paid-up shares, there would have been strong grounds for holding the second party, as liferentrix, entitled to the shares. But what was actually done seems to me to have been essentially different. While by the second resolution of 14th June 1899, the board were empowered to pay the dividend by distribution of paid-up shares in the manner therein mentioned, it was also thereby declared that the dividend to which each member was entitled under the resolution should be applied in payment of the shares falling to him, and in the accompanying circular the shareholders were reminded that at the meeting of 1st March the chairman had intimated that the board had had under consideration "whether it might not be desirable at some time to convert a portion of the reserve funds into capital, and issue it to the shareholders in that form. The board having further considered the matter, have now resolved to carry this out, and the meeting on the 14th instant is called for the purpose of giving effect to the resolution." This appears to me not to be a resolution to pay dividends by shares, but instead of paying dividends, to capitalise the amount which would have been required to pay them, and issue the shares in payment of which that amount was applied, with all the qualities and incidents attaching to shares of capital. The statement in the case as to the manner in which the operation was carried out is in entire accordance with this view.

The true principle upon which such questions should be solved appears to be that which was stated by Lord Hatherley (when Vice-Chancellor) in In re Barton's Trust.[1] "The dividend to which a tenant for life is entitled is the dividend which the company chooses to declare. And when the company meet to say that they will not declare a dividend, but will carry over some portion of the half year's earnings to the capital account and turn it into capital, it is competent for them, I apprehend, to do so, and when this is done, everybody is bound by it, and the tenant for life of those shares cannot complain."

The case of Bouch v. Sproull[2] is, in my judgment, a fortiori of the present case, as it related to a "bonus dividend," and the House of Lords held that looking at all the circumstances, the real nature of the transactions was that the company did not pay, or intend to pay, any sum as dividend, but intended to appropriate, and did appropriate, the undivided profits as an increase to the capital stock; that the bonus dividend was therefore capital of the testator's estate, and that the life tenant was not entitled to the bonus of the new shares. In the present case the act of the company was not ambiguous—it was unequivocally a creation of capital in exercise of an express power to do so.

The cases of In re Bridgewater Navigation Company,[3] and In re Malam,[4] were relied upon by the second party, but neither of them appears to me to be at variance with the views which I have just expressed.

In the former case it was held that all the three reserve funds in question represented undrawn "profits," uncapitalised, and were therefore to be treated as income to which, subject to the preferential dividend for a broken financial year, the ordinary shareholders were exclusively entitled, and not as "capital" or "assets" distributable among both the ordinary and the preference shareholders, but this conclusion was arrived at upon a state of facts essentially different from that which exists in the present case.

In the latter case it was held (first), upon the evidence that the company intended to distribute its profits as dividend, not to capitalise them, and (second), that the tenant for life was only entitled to so much of the value of the new shares as represented the dividend applied by the trustees in taking them up, the balance of such value forming part of the capital of the estate. For the reasons already given, I consider that in the present case the company intended to convert, and did convert, the part of the profits in question into capital.

I am therefore of opinion that the first and second questions should be answered in the negative, and that the third question should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD ADAM concurred.

which the case must be determined is that when a company has power to apportion its profits by distributing so much as income or dividend to shareholders, and adding so much to its capital, everyone becoming a member of the company, either originally or by purchase of shares, is bound by his contract to accept as income or dividend so much as the company declares to fall under that denomination. That is the essence of Lord Hatherley's statement which is the foundation of the law upon this point. I think there are two consequential propositions following on this. First, that where shares are held by two persons in liferent and in fee, or where one is entitled eventually to the capital of shares held by trustees and another to the income, when once it has been ascertained what share of the profits is income, and what is capital, that is binding on the persons holding such shares just as in the case of an individual having the full property of the shares. But again it seems to me that it can make no difference whether the portions of profits which a company adds to its capital are paid into the capital account, thus increasing the value of existing shares, or whether these are kept apart and formed into additional stock divided into shares. I cannot see that such a circumstance affects the interests of the liferenter and the fiar, or of any person holding a qualified interest in shares. The views stated by your Lordship seem to me sufficient for the decision of the case, and I would only add that it would be difficult to apply any other rule, by attempting to go outside the determination of the company. I may suggest by way of illustration the case of a company which every year sets apart a portion of its profits not into a reserve fund, but as irrevocably applied to capital or extension of its business; everyone must admit that such money cannot be regarded as anything but capital, and so too if there is such application at regular intervals of two or three years. But it would be vain to seek for any criterion distinguishing between additions made to capital at regular and at irregular intervals. Another difficulty in a different relation would be to distinguish between cases in company law and what might be done in private partnerships, because in the first case the powers of the company are regulated by their articles of association, while in the second there is a greater latitude given to the partners in dealing with their shares. I do not, however, elaborate that point. I do not think that our decision necessarily determines the case of bonus dividends. I desire to reserve my opinion on that point, because in an English decision the two cases are apparently treated as illustrating each other. If a bonus means an extraordinary dividend, our decision would not be in point.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Falconer v. M'Cabe.

JOHN FALCONER, Pursuer (Appellant).—Orr—Munro.
P. & J. M'CABE, Defenders (Respondents).—M'Clure.

Reparation—Negligence—Master and Servant—Person entrusted with Superintendence—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42), sec. 1, subsec. 2, and sec. 8.—The Employers Liability Act, 1880 (sec. 1), enacts that a workman shall have right to compensation who is injured "(2) By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has any superintendence entrusted to him, whilst in the exercise of such superintendence."

By sec. 8 "The expression 'person who has superintendence entrusted to him' means a person whose sole or principal duty is that of superintendence, and who is not ordinarily engaged in manual labour."

A firm of stevedores employed two squads of dock labourers in loading a steamer, at the same hatch, one squad being under the superintendence of M'Neilly its foreman, who acted as hatch-mouth man for the lowering of goods from a shore crane, and the other under the superintendence of its foreman Murray, who acted as hatch-mouth man for the conveying of goods from the ship's winch. Falconer, one of M'Neilly's squad, who was injured by the fall of a piece of wood from the ship's winch, raised an action under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, against the stevedores as responsible for Murray, through whose fault he alleged the accident happened.

It was proved that Murray was generally employed by the defenders as a labourer, but that he was occasionally selected to act as a hatch-mouth man—that at the time of the accident his duties were to superintend the lowering of goods into the hold and to take the chain of the winch ashore and to attach the hook to the goods—that he had complete control over his squad, and could dismiss any members of it, and that he was paid by the hour, but received higher wages than the men under him.

Held (diss. Lord Young) that Murray was a person ordinarily engaged in manual labour, and could not be regarded as a person having superintendence entrusted to him in the sense of the Act.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

ON 13th May 1899 John Falconer, quay labourer, was working in the employment of P. & J. M'Cabe, stevedores, Glasgow, in the lower hold of a hatch of the s.s. "Clan Mackenzie." When engaged along with his squad in slinging the dome of a boiler to the fall of a crane on the quay in order to remove it to make room for other cargo, the ship's winch was in the act of lowering an iron girder into the same hold. In the sling along with the girder was a piece of wood about a yard long by 2 feet thick, which had been put into the sling for the purpose of tightening it. When the girder was slung off the deck over the open hatch the plank of wood slipped out of the sling and fell into the hold. It struck the pursuer on the head, with the result that he was severely injured.

Falconer then brought an action of damages in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Messrs M'Cabe, at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

The pursuer, inter alia, averred;—(Cond. 8) "Said accident was due to the fault of the foreman, Thomas Murray, whose principal duty was that of superintendence, and not manual labour, and who was at the hatch-mouth, and whose duty it was to see that each load sent down the hatch was properly slung. The girder and wood were improperly slung in this instance. . . . He was also in fault in not calling out 'Stand clear,' to the men below, and in permitting the sling-load to clear the deck before seeing that the men below were standing clear. Murray was a foreman or superintendent in the sense of the Employers Liability Act 1880. Pursuer was bound to conform, and was at the time of the accident conforming, to Murray's orders."

The defenders' answer was,—"Admitted that it was part of the duties of the 'ganger,' Thomas Murray, to see that each load was properly slung before being lowered into the hold. Quoad ultra denied. . . . If there were any fault other than pursuer's, such was that of a fellow-servant or fellow-servants with him, for whom the defenders are not responsible. . . . The said Thomas Murray was ordinarily engaged in manual labour."

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer having been injured whilst in defenders' employment, through the fault and negligence of defenders, or of those for whom they were responsible under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, is entitled to decree, with interest and costs, as craved.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(5) Separatim, if there were any fault other than pursuer's, such was that of a fellow-servant or servants with him, for whom the defenders are not responsible, and they should be assoilzied.

Proof was allowed and led. In the course of the proof the following evidence as to Murray's duties as hatch-mouth man was adduced by the pursuer:—James Farrell, secretary of the Dock Labourers Union, deponed,—"The hatch-mouth man employs the men, discharges them, determines the number of hours they will work, and superintends their work. They are absolutely subject to his orders. The foreman is in full control of the hatch and all that is done in it. Nothing can be done without his consent. I know M'Neilly. He is the same kind of foreman as I have been describing. (Q.) It has been suggested that this hatch-mouth man or foreman is engaged in manual labour; isn't it the case that with very many kinds of cargo the stage man or hatch-mouth man or foreman, or whatever he may be, never leaves the stage? (A.) He should not. It is the case that in some employments, for the sake of economy, the hatch-mouth man, although foreman, is forced to carry the sling ashore. It is the case that in well regulated employment the stage man or foreman never leaves his hatch. There is a man for the purpose of carrying the sling ashore. . . . A hatch-mouth man gets 7s. a day, and an ordinary man 5s. 10d. . . . . In the Clan Line a hatch-mouth man like Murray has to take the fall of the winch and carry it ashore. . . . He has to take it ashore whether it is the heavy iron chain of the winch or a rope sling. He attaches the hook to the goods that are coming aboard, and then gives the signal to the winchman. He stands on the stage to see that the thing is properly slung and lowered. He guides it and steadies it going up the stage. When the ship is high he has to push it over the hatch mouth and see that it goes down straight. Practically Murray is the leader of the squad; they are under his control. . . ."

Thomas Dillon, stevedore, deponed,—"With regard to cargo steamers, we appoint a hatch-mouth man. I consider him both a labourer and a foreman. He is a man whom we entrust with the superintendence of the hatch; he starts his own men, and is responsible for them. He superintends them, and they are bound to conform to his orders. He can discharge any man that does not suit him. The hatch-mouth man takes the fall to the end of the planks, and hooks on the stuff, and follows it in. It is only occasionally that that has got to be done. That is all the labour he has got to do. . . ."

Murray, the hatch-mouth man, adduced by the defenders, deponed,—"I remember the accident to pursuer on the 13th of May last. . . . There were two gangs working that morning, and I was ganger of one squad and M'Neilly ganger of the other. The ship's winch was working in connection with my gang and the shore crane with M'Neilly's. These two gangs worked one in the fore end of the hatch and the other in the rear end. Pursuer was in the forward part of the hatch. I was at the stage end when pursuer was injured. I am called a sub-boss. It is not known as a hatch-mouth man. There is such a thing as a hatch-mouth man and sub-boss; I do both duties. I had to signal to the winchman when to raise and lower the fall of the winch into the hold. I had also to shout to the men in the hatch to stand clear when goods were being loaded; that is part of my duty. I take the fall of the winch and carry it ashore down the staging. I attach the hook of it to the goods and assist to sling the goods. I also assist to put the goods on the truck if they are heavy. After we get the goods made fast at the end of the stage I signal to the winchman to heave, and I walk up behind the goods. I steady them sometimes if it is required. . . . I am paid by the hour, and dock labourers are paid by the hour. An ordinary dock labourer gets 7d. an hour. When I am sub-boss I get 7s. for the day. That is calculated by the hour. I am paid off with the ordinary dock labourers. . . . I work all over the harbour. I am employed by the hour just the same as ordinary dock labourers. . . . When I was running the sling and hooking on the goods and doing that work in the shed, there was nobody at the hatch-mouth. The chain goes right into the sheds; the sheds are quite close to the ship. I am running back and forward to the shed all day long." Cross-examined.—"I was at the ship's winch. I walk ashore with the sling for the goods in order to hand it to the man on the shore end of the stage to sling the goods. That is the only reason. Where they are working with the shore crane they can swing the thing ashore, and we don't require to leave the ship at all. I was a sub-boss; I was in full charge of my squad at the hatch. I superintended in every way. They are subject to my orders, and can do nothing without my consent, as regards the work. If they don't obey me I can put them ashore. When I am working with defenders, and if there be a vacancy for a sub-boss, I am one of the men who is selected. I am rather favoured in that respect. Defenders don't keep any sub-bosses, and pay them weekly. . . . They employ sub-bosses when they require them. I know that with certain companies at the harbour, the hatch-mouth man has never to leave the hatch. There is another man employed for carrying the fall ashore. With defenders, in order to save this other man, the hatch-mouth man has to do the other man's duty. On many occasions, when I take the fall ashore, I sling the goods, and on other occasions I assist in slinging. If I choose, I don't do either. I make the man at the truck do it. It is to further the work that I do it, to push on the stuff. It is usual for the hatch-mouth man, when he is standing idle, to give the other men assistance. . . . (Q.) When you were calling down the hatch before the accident, were you calling to both crowds to stand clear? (A.) I was calling to stand clear, and it might apply to either or both. When M'Neilly was calling down the hatch, he was also calling to both sides to stand clear. . . ."

On 9th March 1900 the Sheriff-substitute (Strachan) found that there was fault on Murray's part, and that the defenders were responsible, and awarded the pursuer a sum of damages.*

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Berry), who, on 12th June 1900, found "that the said injury was not caused by the fault of the defenders, or of any one for whom they are responsible: Therefore recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Assoilzies the defenders: Finds the pursuer liable to them in expenses." †

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—Murray was a person having

* "NOTE.— . . . What, then, was the duty of the hatch-mouth man? He engages the men, directs and controls their operations; they are bound to obey him, and act according to his instructions, and he has the power of dismissing them at will. His pay is at least one shilling per day more than that of an ordinary workman. Why, then, is he not a superintendent in the sense of the Act? It is said that the hatch-mouth man in this case took the chain which came up from the hold, and carried it on his shoulder to the quay, and attached it to the sling which was ready to be taken on board. But was this the principal part of his duty? Very far from it. His principal duty was to superintend and control the men working under his instructions, and the carrying of the chain was a very small and subsidiary part of his work. It was not for that that he received higher wages than the ordinary workman. It was not even an ordinary part of his duties. It is proved that according to the usual practice the hatch-mouth man does not leave the hatch, and that another person is employed to carry the chain and attach it to the sling. In the present case this practice was, I think, improperly disregarded for the mere sake of economy, and the hatchman had to do work which did not fall within the ordinary scope of his duties, and which should not have been imposed on him. Besides, the carrying of the chain in this case was a pure accident. The hatch-mouth man of the other gang, standing at the other side of the hatch, did not require to carry the chain, as it was swung ashore along with the derrick to which it was attached, so that his wholy duty was superintendence. It would, certainly, be a curious result, if it depended on which side of the hatch the hatch-mouth man was standing, whether he was a superintendent or a workman. It has, in my opinion, been clearly proved that, in the words of the Act of Parliament, the hatchman was 'a person in this case whose whole or principal duty is that of superintendence, and who is not ordinarily engaged in manual labour,' and that the defenders are consequently liable for fault or negligence on his part. . . ."

† "NOTE.— . . . It is certainly with reluctance that, on the question regarding Murray's position, I have come to take a different view from that of the Sheriff-substitute. My conclusion, however, is that Murray was not a person who had superintendence entrusted to him within the meaning of that expression as defined by section 8 of the Act. By that definition the expression is declared to mean 'a person whose sole and principal duty is that of superintendence, and who is not ordinarily engaged in manual labour.' It seems clear from the proof that superintendence was not Murray's sole duty, and I am not satisfied that it was even his principal duty. But, at all events, I am unable to hold that he was not ordinarily engaged in manual labour. Murray, as the proof shews, worked sometimes as an ordinary dock labourer, but on the morning of 15th May, when the accident happened to the pursuer, he was employed by the defenders as foreman or ganger of a squad engaged along with another squad in loading iron and machinery into one of the hatches of the steamship 'Clan Mackenzie.' . . ."

superintendence in the sense of the Act. His sole or principal duty was superintendence, and if, as here, an accident resulted from his negligence, it was not enough to relieve his employers of the consequences, that while performing that duty he had also voluntarily undertaken some manual labour.[1]

Argued for the defenders;—Murray was a person ordinarily engaged in manual labour.[2]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff have come to opposite conclusions. My consideration of the case leads me to agree with the Sheriff. The pursuer was injured by a piece of wood used to secure some pieces of iron slung in a crane sling, which, while the load was descending into the hold of a vessel, fell out, and struck him when he was in the hold.

The duty of seeing that the material was properly slung before it was brought over the hold lay upon the hatch-mouth man, and it is alleged that it was through his fault that the accident happened. Now, whatever his fault might be, it would not entitle the pursuer to prevail, unless the hatch-mouth man, who was a fellow-servant of the pursuer, was in a position which would make the master of both liable under the Employers Liability Act. A consideration of the evidence leads me to the conclusion that the hatch-mouth man was not in such a position. He was the foreman, or, as some of the witnesses call him, the sub-boss under the inspecting superintendent, of a number of men brought by him to work at the loading of a ship. His own duties appear to have been to look after those in the hold, to see that the hatch was cleared when goods were going down, and to look after the men slinging the goods on the quay; he practically superintends the whole work at the hatch. But he had also to work himself. His duties are described by one of the witnesses, a witness for the pursuer himself:—"He has to take the fall of the winch ashore whether it is the heavy iron chain of the winch or a rope sling. He attaches the hook to the goods that are coming aboard, and then gives the signal to the winchman. He stands on the stage to see that the thing is properly slung and lowered. He guides it, and steadies it going up the stage. When the ship is high, he has to push it over the hatch-mouth, and see that it goes down straight."

Accordingly, another stevedore, who is examined, speaks of such a man as "both a labourer and a foreman." The description given by the particular man in question in this case, Thomas Murray, gives practically the same account of his duties and work, adding that where goods are to be put on a truck, he assists at that if they are heavy, a thing which another witness who does the same work describes as "part of his duty" to help to load the stuff on to the truck.

Such being the nature of the hatch-mouth man's employment, I am unable to hold that he was a superintendent for whom the defenders are responsible. I think he is shewn to have been a man who had ordinarily to work himself, while at the same time looking after others, as distinguished from a man whose sole or principal duty is to superintend others, not being ordinarily engaged in manual labour.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the decision of the Sheriff was right, and ought to be adhered to.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree with the Sheriff-substitute. I think it is clearly established that Murray was entrusted with superintendence, and that in the very matter which is proved to have led to the accident. I think further that this accident would not have happened if the girder had been properly slung. It was Murray's duty to see that it was properly slung, and I think it was substantially his sole and certainly his principal duty. It is said that Murray took the chain, carried it to the quay, and attached it to the sling. I agree with the Sheriff-substitute that this was a very subsidiary part of his work, and that his principal duty was to superintend the men who were working under his instructions. I am not surprised that the Sheriff reached a different conclusion with regret—a conclusion which allows the employer, who from economy had not provided a sufficient staff, to escape liability.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with the Sheriff. I think the man Murray was not a person who had superintendence entrusted to him within the meaning of the Act. On the contrary, he was a man ordinarily engaged in manual labour, who was engaged to perform, and did perform, manual labour, as part of the very work in the course of which the pursuer was injured.

LORD MONCREIFF concurred with the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD TRAYNER.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, finding in terms of the interlocutor of the Sheriff, of 12th June 1900.

ANDREW BUCHANAN AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Appellants).—Ure, Q.C.—Younger.
JOHN MAIN, Defender (Respondent).—Salvesen, Q.C.—F. T. Cooper.

Payment—Appropriation—Bank—Cautioner.—By letter of guarantee dated in 1894 five persons jointly and severally guaranteed to a bank "due payment of all sums for which the U. Company, Limited, are or may become liable to you, the amount which we are to be bound to pay under this guarantee not to exceed £12,500," it being declared that the bank might at their discretion grant time or any other indulgence to the U. Company without discharging the liability of the guarantors; and further, "that this guarantee shall apply to and secure any ultimate balance of the sums that shall remain due to you after applying any dividends, compositions, and payments you may receive, . . . and shall be without prejudice to any other securities or remedies you may have for the general obligations or any particular obligation of the U. Company."

In January 1896 Main, one of the guarantors, intimated to the bank that he withdrew from the guarantee. The bank on receiving this intimation closed an account-current which the U. Company had with them, and which was then overdrawn to the extent of £12,000. Immediately thereafter the directors of the U. Company called up its remaining capital, the call being payable at the bank. In all £6000 was paid into the bank in respect of the call, and was entered by the bank in a special account headed "Call Account." This was a credit account only. This was done in accordance with the intention of the company that the £6000 should be available for its business. Shortly afterwards the bank opened a new account-current with the U. Company. This account-current did not contain any reference to the earlier account-current.

In May 1896 the U. Company went into liquidation. The new account-current was then overdrawn to the extent of £2300. The respective debit and credit balances shewn on the old account-current and the call account were undiminished. Ultimately a dividend of 10s. in the £1 was paid in the liquidation.

The bank then called on Buchanan and Brown, two of the guarantors, to pay £4300 as being the sum due under the guarantee. In bringing out this sum the bank had applied the £6000 of call money in reduction of the general indebtedness of the U. Company to the bank. Buchanan and Brown paid £4300 to the bank, and then brought an action against Main for payment of his share thereof. Main contended that the £6000 of call money ought to have been applied exclusively to the reduction of the overdraft of £12,000 existing when he withdrew from the guarantee.

Held that the defender had no right to require that the call money should be applied exclusively to the reduction of the £12,000 overdraft, and that he was liable for his share of the sum paid by the pursuers.

Cautioner—Joint Cautioners—Relief—Measure of cautioners' liability inter se—Insolvency.—Five persons jointly and severally guaranteed to a bank payment of all sums for which a company might become liable to the bank. The company having gone into liquidation, the bank called on two of the cautioners to pay the balance due under the guarantee. They did so, and then brought an action against another of the guarantors for relief to the extent of one-third of the sum they had paid. The pursuers averred, and led evidence to prove, that the two remaining guarantors were insolvent. The defender denied that the insolvency of either of the remaining guarantors had been proved, and pleaded that he was liable in relief to the extent of a fifth only of the sum paid by the pursuers.

Held that, whether the two remaining guarantors were insolvent or not, the pursuers were not bound to bear the whole risk of their insolvency, and therefore that the defender was liable in relief to the extent of one-third of the sum paid by the pursuers.

BY letter of guarantee, dated 18th May 1894, Andrew Buchanan, William Stevenson Brown, John Main, and two other persons, all being the directors of the United Gutta-Percha and Rubber Company, Limited, Glasgow, jointly and severally guaranteed to the Bank of Scotland "due payment of all sums for which the United Gutta-Percha and Rubber Company, Limited, Glasgow, are or may become liable to you, the amount which we are to be bound to pay under this guarantee not to exceed £12,500 sterling, with interest from the date or dates of advance. We agree that you shall be entitled to make calls on us, or any of us, from time to time, in respect of our said guarantee, for such sums as you may fix. And we further declare that you may at any time or times, at your discretion, grant to the said The United Gutta-Percha and Rubber Company, Limited, or to any drawers, acceptors, or indorsers of bills of exchange or promissory-notes received by you from them, or on which they may be liable to you, any time or other indulgence, and compound with them or with the said drawers, acceptors, or indorsers respectively without discharging or satisfying the liability of us or any of us; and that this guarantee shall apply to and secure any ultimate balance of the sums that shall remain due to you after applying any dividends, compositions, and payments which you may receive. And it is further declared that this guarantee is to remain in force until recalled by us or our heirs or executors in writing, and shall be without prejudice to any other securities or remedies which you have or may acquire for the general obligations or any particular obligation of the said The United Gutta-Percha and Rubber Company, Limited. In witness whereof," &c.

On 28th January 1896 Main, who had on 30th October 1895 resigned his office of director, and who had also ceased to be a shareholder of the company, intimated to the bank that he withdrew from the guarantee. One of the two guarantors not above named did the same.

On receiving these intimations the bank closed the company's account-current with them at their Glasgow office. This account was then overdrawn by the company to the amount of £12,283, 5s. 3d.

Immediately thereafter the directors of the company called up the remaining uncalled capital of the company. The call was made payable at the Glasgow office of the bank. Sums amounting in all to £6387, 10s. were paid into the bank in respect of the call, and were entered by the bank in an account headed "United Gutta-Percha and Rubber Company, Limited, No. II. Call Account." This account was a credit account only.

On 30th March 1896 the bank opened a new account-current for the company. This account contained no entry of the debit balance on the former account-current, and made no reference to that account.

On 30th May 1896 the company went into liquidation. At that date the new account-current was overdrawn to the extent of £2349, 9s. 6d. A dividend of 10s. in the pound was ultimately paid in the liquidation.

In October 1898 the bank called on two of the guarantors, Buchanan and Brown, to pay the sum of £4306, 17s. 11d., as being the amount due under the letter of guarantee.

In bringing out this sum the bank had, inter alia, proceeded on the ground that the sum standing at the credit of the company in "No. II. Call Account" (which, with interest, had come to be £6433, 15s. 6d.) was not appropriated to the reduction of the overdraft on the first account-current, and the bank had consequently applied it in reduction of the company's general indebtedness to the bank. This indebtedness amounted to £15,669, 7s., being the total of the two overdrafts, which, with interest, had come to be respectively £13,021, 13s. 5d. and £2647, 13s. 7d.

Buchanan and Brown having paid the sum of £4306, 17s. 11d. to the bank, called on Main to relieve them to the extent of one-third of the sum so paid, viz., £1435, 12s. 8d.; Main disputed liability.

Buchanan and Brown then brought an action against Main in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow for £1435, 12s. 8d.

The questions raised in the action were, inter alia, these:—(1) As to whether the sum of £6433, 15s. 6d. standing at the credit of the company in "No. II. Call Account" ought to be applied exclusively to the reduction of the overdraft on the first account-current. The defender maintained that it ought, and that if it were, it would (with the dividends and certain other sums to which the company was entitled to credit on an accounting with the bank) either extinguish the liability of the guarantors to the bank, or at least reduce that liability to a much smaller sum than £4306, 17s. 11d. (2) As to whether the liability of the defender in relief to the pursuers was a liability to the extent of one-third of such sum as might be found to be due to the bank under the letter of guarantee, as the pursuers claimed, or was a liability to the extent of one-fifth only of that sum, as the defender maintained. On this question the pursuers averred that the estates of one of the two remaining guarantors (who was dead) were insolvent, and that the other "maintains that he is unable to pay."

A proof was allowed. There was no direct evidence that the company had instructed the bank to close the first account-current on the defender intimating his withdrawal from the guarantee, or that they had directed the bank not to place the call money to the credit of that account. Leggatt, the accountant at the Glasgow office of the bank, deponed that the bank had acted as they did "because it is always our practice to do so when we receive intimation from cautioners; that is, to leave their account alone, and not to apply moneys received in reduction of that debt. As a rule we do that." Brown, one of the pursuers, and the only other witness examined on the point, deponed,—". . . There was no intention of placing the money received from calls to account of the old overdraft. If that had been done we would have had no funds to work the company—no funds to meet other liabilities. . . . I was not conversant with the manner in which the bank accounts were kept at the bank till near the stoppage. I was aware that a call account had been opened by the bank. . . . I did not call at the bank. . . . I did not write the bank; I think any communication there was was sent through the secretary. . . . Personally, I did not give any instructions to the bank in regard to the bank account. . . ." No written evidence on the point was produced.

A judicial factor under section 164 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, had been appointed on the estates of the guarantor who had died. The managing clerk of the judicial factor deponed that the appointment was not made on the ground of insolvency, but that on investigation it had turned out that the estates would probably not realise more than a dividend of 3s. in the £1.

As regarded the remaining guarantor, the liquidator of the company deponed that he had compromised a claim by the company against this guarantor for 2s. 6d. in the £1, because he believed the guarantor to be insolvent at the time.

The defender deponed that he believed the last-mentioned guarantor to be solvent, and that when he intimated his withdrawal from the guarantee he believed the other guarantor to be a rich man.

On 21st May 1900 the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) pronounced an interlocutor decerning for £566, 15s. 9d. against the defender. The Sheriff-substitute reached this sum by, inter alia, giving effect to the defender's two contentions above stated.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—(1) The defender relied on the rule in the case of Clayton,[1] but that rule had no application in the circumstances here. If there had been a single continuous account-current instead of, as there was in fact, two separate accounts-current, and if the call money had been placed to the credit of that account, the case of Clayton[1] would have applied, unless the bank, in following the method of accounting supposed, had violated the instructions of the company. Prima facie, the right to appropriate a payment into bank was with the person making the payment; if he made no appropriation, the bank was entitled to make an appropriation, subject to the recognised rules and practice of bankers; failing which the law made an appropriation in accordance with the rule in the case of Clayton.[1] Here on the evidence it was clear that the company did not intend the call money to be appropriated in reduction of the overdraft on the first account-current; the bank's method of accounting, which prevented such an appropriation, was thus in accordance with the intention, if not the result of the positive instructions, of the company, and was consequently conclusive in favour of the pursuers, unless the defender was entitled to require the call money to be applied exclusively to the reduction of the first overdraft. The defender's right depended on the construction of the letter of guarantee, and on this question of construction the case of In re Sherry[2] was very close to the present. The letter of guarantee there was in its essential features identical with the letter of guarantee here, and on the construction of the letter there the Court of Appeal held that the guarantor was not entitled to require that sums paid into the bank to the credit of the customer in an account-current opened after the simultaneous closing of the guarantee and of an overdrawn account-current should be applied exclusively in reduction of the overdraft on the last-mentioned account. That decision was sound, and ought here to be followed. (2) The defender was liable in relief to the extent of one-third of the sum due to the bank, and not to the extent of one-fifth merely. That was in accordance with the general rule.[3] Even if the insolvency of the two other guarantors had not been established, there was a reasonable possibility that they would not be able to pay their share in full. That being so, there was neither authority nor principle for holding that the pursuers should bear the whole of this risk. Of course, the defender if he paid one-third would have the same remedies as the pursuers against the two other guarantors.

Argued for the defender;—(1) There was here truly only one account-current, and the call money ought to have been paid into the credit of that account. If that were so, the call money would have reduced pro tanto the overdraft on the so called first account-current—strictly speaking, it would have extinguished or reduced the earlier items of that overdraft.[4] It was clear on the evidence that the company had not instructed, or even authorised, the method of accounting which the bank had adopted, and the unauthorised act of the bank could not affect the rights of the parties. It was true that the money was derived from a special source—the payment of calls, and it might be, as Mr Brown deponed, that the company did not intend it to be applied to reduce the existing overdraft, but quoad the bank it was simply money paid in to the credit of the company, and as such the bank ought simply to have placed it to the credit of the company. The bank was not entitled, without instructions, to earmark it in any way. (2) The defender was liable in relief to the extent of one-fifth only of the sum due to the bank under the letter of guarantee, and paid by the pursuers. The liability in relief was pro rata, except where one or more of the guarantors was insolvent.[1] Here neither of the two guarantors in question had been proved to be insolvent, and they must therefore be assumed to be solvent.

LORD TRAYNER.—(After dealing with another branch of the case)—There remain two questions. These questions are—(1) What is the amount for which the pursuers, defender, and two others were liable to the Bank of Scotland under their guarantee dated 18th May 1894? and (2) What is the proportion of the amount which the defender is bound to pay the pursuers? The facts are not disputed, and admit of being shortly stated. The United Gutta-Percha and Rubber Company being in need of financial assistance was allowed an overdraft by the Bank of Scotland on the guarantee I have referred to being granted. The guarantors were the parties to this action, and two others, all directors of the company, and their guarantee was limited to the sum of £12,500. On or about 28th January 1896 the defender and another of the guarantors intimated to the bank that they withdrew from the guarantee, and thereupon the bank closed the account on which the overdraft had been allowed. When that account was so closed there was due to the bank something over £12,000—the exact figure is not material. Immediately thereafter the directors of the company made a call on the shareholders, which they were requested to pay into the Bank of Scotland, and this call realised a sum of over £6000. The sum so received by the bank was entered in a new account, and against this sum the company operated by drafts which were entered in another account still. There were thus three accounts on the bank's books—(1) the guaranteed account closed in January 1896, (2) the call account which was entirely at the credit of the company, and (3) a new account-current between the company and the bank, which contained no entry of the debit balance on the guaranteed account or any reference to that account. The company went into liquidation in May 1896, at which time a large balance was due to the bank. It is unnecessary to follow out the accounting; it is enough to say that the pursuers have been called on to pay, and have paid, to the bank under the said guarantee the sum of £4306, 17s. 11d. The defender denies his liability for any part of this sum, because on a just accounting any balance due on the guaranteed account has been discharged. The defence is based upon the view that the £6000 paid into bank on the call account should have been placed as it was paid in to the credit of the guaranteed account. If that had been done, and all the other sums for which the bank gives credit had been added to it, then the balance on the guaranteed account would have been wiped out. I think this defence cannot be sustained. I accept the principle, frequently laid down, that when you have an account-current the payments on the credit side of that account (there being no specific appropriation of such payments) are held to extinguish the items on the debit side of the account in the order of their date. But that principle is, in my opinion, inapplicable here. The amounts paid into the bank by the shareholders of the company under call made by the directors were not paid in to the guaranteed account at all, and it was not intended either by the shareholders who paid the call nor by the company that they should be. That account was closed before the calls were received, and stood so closed until the liquidation. Further, the calls were not paid into the bank as payments to account of the company's debt, nor as a payment towards any balance then due on any account-current, but as deposits to lie subject to the company's orders. It lay therefore with the company, in the first place, to appropriate the sums thus deposited for its behoof, and they did so, not by paying the same into the guaranteed account which had been closed, so as to extinguish pro tanto the balance due on that account, but appropriated it as a fund towards the present necessities of the company, against which they operated by way of draft as occasion required. The directors who so appropriated the call fund, in appropriating it as they did to the then present necessities of the company, did the defender no wrong. They were plainly using the call fund for the very purpose for which it had been paid. I am therefore of opinion that the defence fails in so far as it is founded on the defender's alleged right to have the call fund appropriated to the extinction of the balance due on the guaranteed account. This view seems to be in accordance with the decision in the case of In re Sherry[1] to which we were referred.

The pursuers have paid to the bank the whole balance due on the guaranteed account. What portion of that are they entitled to claim from the defender? The pursuers claim a third—the defender maintains he is only liable for one-fifth. There were five guarantors all jointly and severally liable. Two of these guarantors, as the pursuers say, and, as I think, have fairly established, are insolvent, in which case the defender must bear with the pursuers the whole claim under the guarantee. But whether the other two guarantors are insolvent or not, I think the same result follows. The pursuers are no more liable than the defender; he must therefore share their burden, with the same rights and the same risk as the pursuers of obtaining relief from the other two guarantors of the amount due by them.

I think therefore the interlocutor appealed against should be recalled and decree pronounced as concluded for.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—That is the opinion of the Court.

LORD MONCREIFF was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 21st May 1900 and found in fact, inter alia, "that after crediting all dividends received from the company's estate and securities held by them, there remained due to the bank upon the said guaranteed account the sum of £4306, 17s. 11d.; that upon demand made by the bank the pursuers each paid to the bank" the sum of £2153, 9s.: "Find in law that the pursuers are entitled to payment from the defender of one-third of the sums so paid by them," with interest from the dates of payment: "Therefore decern against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the petition."

Succession—Election—Legitim—Clause of Forfeiture—Effect of parent's repudiation of liferent on children's right of fee.—A testator, who was survived by six children, directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate into six equal shares, one share to be paid to his son "Peter and his heirs," one share to his daughter Mary Ann and her heirs, one share to his son James and his heirs, and, "with regard to the three remaining shares," one share to be held and applied for behoof of each of his three other children, John, Alexander, and Duncan, and their children, whom failing, their other next of kin as thereinafter directed. The testator thereinafter, with reference to "the share" which the trustees were directed to hold for "John and his foresaids," directed his trustees to pay the annual income thereof to John for his liferent use allenarly, and on John's death (until which event no vesting was to take place) to pay the principal or capital to John's lawful children, whom failing to his other next of kin. Similar directions were given in regard to the shares of Alexander and Duncan.

The testator further provided and declared that in case any of his children repudiated the settlement and claimed their legal provisions, "then such child or children shall forfeit all right to any share or shares of that part of my estate and effects, heritable and moveable, that I may freely dispose of by law, and they shall have right only to their legal provisions, and the share or shares of such child or children shall in that event accresce and belong or be held for behoof of my other children equally who shall abide by this settlement and accept of the provisions herein contained, the surviving issue of predeceasing children taking equally the share to which their parent, if alive, would have been entitled as aforesaid and providing and declaring that any share accrescing in virtue of this clause for behoof of my sons, John, Alexander, and Duncan, shall be retained and held by my trustees for their respective behoofs, for their liferent use allenarly, and for behoof of their respective foresaids in fee, in the same manner and for the same ends as are applicable to the other shares hereinbefore provided for their behoof."

John declined to accept the provision made for him, and claimed legitim. In a special case, held (dub. Lord M'Laren) that on a construction of the whole settlement the word "share" was throughout used in the sense of an aliquot sixth part of the residue, and that John by his repudiation forfeited not only his own rights under the deed, but also those of his issue or other next of kin.

1ST DIVISION. JAMES M'CAULL died on 20th November 1884, survived by six children, Peter, Mrs Mary Ann M'Caull or Robertson, James, John, Alexander, and Duncan.

Mr M'Caull left a trust-disposition and settlement by which he conveyed his whole estate to trustees.

The fourth purpose of his settlement was as follows:—"(Fourth) After my trustees shall have realised and converted into money my whole estate, heritable and moveable, they shall as soon as convenient divide the free residue and remainder thereof into six equal shares, and shall dispose of said shares as follows, viz.—one share shall be paid to my said son Peter and his heirs, under deduction of the sum of £100 formerly advanced by me to account of his legitim and share of my estate; one share shall be paid to my daughter Mary Ann M'Caull or Robertson, wife of David Robertson, Allanhill House, Dunblane, and her heirs, under deduction of the sum of £160 formerly advanced by me to account of her legitim and share of my estate; one share shall be paid to my son James and his heirs, under deduction of the sum of £100 formerly advanced by me to account of his legitim and share of my estate; and with regard to the three remaining shares the following provisions shall have effect, viz., my trustees shall hold and apply one of said shares for behoof of my son John, and his lawful children or their lawful issue, whom failing his other next of kin or their representatives as hereinafter directed, under deduction of the sum of £500 formerly advanced or expended by me to account of his legitim and share of my estate: my trustees shall hold and apply another of said shares for behoof of my son Alexander, and his lawful children or their lawful issue, whom failing, his other next of kin or their representatives, as hereinafter directed, under deduction of the sum of £500 formerly advanced and paid by me to account of his legitim and share of my estate."

A similar provision was made in favour of Duncan.

By the fifth purpose the testator directed his trustees to divide the cumulo amount of the deductions into six equal shares and to dispose of them in the same way as was provided with regard to the six original shares of residue, "and it is hereby declared with reference to the whole of the shares hereinbefore provided, that if any of my said children shall predecease me leaving lawful issue, such issue shall be entitled to the share or shares, original and accruing, which their parent would have taken by survivance, and the share of any child predeceasing me without leaving lawful issue shall be divided among, or held and applied for behoof of, my surviving children and their foresaids respectively, in the same manner and to the same effect as is provided in clause fourth with reference to the original shares, and the lawful issue of such children as may have died leaving such issue, in equal shares per stirpes."

The sixth purpose was as follows:—"(Sixth) And with regard to the shares which my trustees are by the two immediately preceding clauses, fourth and fifth, directed to hold and apply for behoof of my son John and his foresaids, including the portion of any share which may accrue through any child predeceasing me without leaving lawful issue, and also the portion of any share accruing through any child repudiating this settlement and claiming his or her legal provisions, it is hereby provided and declared that my said son John is to be entitled to receive only the free annual income and revenue thereof, and that for his liferent use allenarly, and my trustees are directed to pay the said free annual income and revenue to him accordingly at such times and in such portions as they may think fit, but my said son is to have no right to the principal or capital of said shares, original or so accruing, or to assign, convey, or bequeath the same, and my trustees are hereby directed to hold the said principal or capital until the expiry of the liferent hereby provided to my said son, and at his death (until which event no vesting shall take place), or at my death should he predecease me, to pay or make over the said principal or capital to his lawful children then surviving jointly with the then surviving issue, if any, of such of his children as may have died leaving issue, equally among them per stirpes, whom all failing, to his other next of kin then in life jointly with the lawful issue of any predeceaser who had he or she survived would have been amongst said next of kin, such issue succeeding equally among them to the share to which their parent would have been entitled if alive."

M'Caull's Trustees v. M'Caull.

Then followed similar provisions with reference to the shares of Alexander and Duncan.

The deed contained these further clauses:—"And it is hereby declared that the sums hereby provided to my children are and shall be in full satisfaction to them and each of them of legitim, bairn's part of gear, and all other claims competent to them by or through my decease in any manner of way: And further, I do hereby provide and declare that in case any of my said children shall repudiate this settlement or question or impugn the same and claim their legal provisions, or shall by any means prevent this settlement from taking effect in whole or in part, then such child or children shall forfeit all right to any share or shares of that part of my estate and effects, heritable and moveable, that I may freely dispose of by law, and they shall have right only to their legal provisions, and the share or shares of such child or children shall in that event accresce and belong or be held for behoof of my other children equally who shall abide by this settlement and accept of the provisions herein contained, the surviving issue of predeceasing children taking equally the share to which their parent, if alive, would have been entitled as aforesaid: And providing and declaring that any share accrescing in virtue of this clause for behoof of my sons John, Alexander, and Duncan, shall be retained and held by my trustees for their respective behoofs, for their liferent use allenarly, and for behoof of their respective foresaids in fee, in the same manner and for the same ends as are applicable to the other shares hereinbefore provided for their behoof."

The residue of the truster's estate amounted to £11,361, 2s. 4d., of which each of his children under the settlement became entitled to one-sixth, or £1893, 10s. 4d. John claimed his legitim. The first parties thereupon, after paying him as out of the whole estate the sum of £943, 8s. 8d., less £248 admitted to have been received by him from the truster in respect of his legitim, divided the residue into six equal shares of £1777, 12s. 3d., one share being paid to each of Peter, Mary Ann, and James, while one share was invested for behoof of each of Alexander and Duncan, and the remaining one-sixth share was set aside for the representatives of John. In making that division the trustees gave effect to the directions of the truster in regard to the deductions before referred to, and the apportionment of the amounts thereof. The income on the last-mentioned one-sixth share set aside for the representatives of John was in turn periodically divided into six equal shares, one share being paid to each of Peter, James, and Mrs Mary Ann M'Caull or Robertson, one share being added to the capital of the shares set aside for behoof of each of Duncan and Alexander, of which only the income subsequently accruing thereon was being paid to them, and the remaining share being added to the capital of the share set aside for John's representatives.

Questions having arisen as to the validity of the division thus made by the trustees, a special case, in which the foregoing facts were stated, was presented by James M'Caull's trustees, first parties; Peter, James, and Mrs Mary Ann M'Caull or Robertson, second parties; Alexander and Duncan, third parties; and John, fourth party.

The opinion and judgment of the Court was asked on several questions, but in the view which the Court took, it is necessary to state only the following:—"1. Did John M'Caull, by declining to accept the provision made for him in his father's settlement and claiming his legitim, forfeit, not only for himself but also for his issue or other next of kin, all further interest under the fourth, fifth, and sixth heads of the settlement?"

Argued for the second and third parties;—There was here no separate and independent estates in John and his children or other next of kin. There was no estate in his children at all at the date of his repudiation, and could not have been, for there was no vesting until the parent's death. "Share" throughout the deed meant an aliquot sixth part of residue, the portion dedicated to and set apart for each stirps. There was no reason for giving it a restricted meaning in the forfeiting clause, even if the context had permitted it, which it did not; the language used in directing what was to be done with a forfeited share was referable only to the entire share of the stirps. It was absurd to read out of it an intention to provide in certain contingencies the liferent of a liferent. It was to be noted also that if the opposing view were upheld, the result of John's repudiation would be in the end to secure a greater benefit to himself, his family, or next of kin, than would enure to those of the testator's children who accepted their provisions. The case of Campbell[1] was on all-fours with the present, and in it the parent was held to have forfeited not only for himself but also for his children.

Argued for the first and fourth parties;—The rule of construction applicable to provisions like that in question had been ascertained and laid down in Fisher v. Dixon,[2] and had been followed in many subsequent cases.[3] The forfeiture fell to be limited to the share or interest of the person repudiating, unless there was an express declaration or provision extending its effect. There was no such provision here.

LORD PRESIDENT.—James M'Caull, the truster, died on 20th November 1884, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 18th November 1884, by which he conveyed to the first parties to the case, along with another person, now deceased, as trustees for the purposes therein mentioned, his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable.

(After reciting the purposes of the trust before narrated)—The truster's estate amounted to £11,361, 2s. 4d., to one-sixth of which, or £1893, 10s. 4d., each of his children had right under his settlement. John, the fourth party, claimed his legitim, and the trustees paid to him his share of the legitim fund, and divided the residue into six equal shares, paying one share to each of Peter, Mary Ann, and James, investing one share for behoof of each of Alexander and Duncan, and setting aside the remaining one-sixth share for the representatives of John.

The first question put in the case is,—"Did John M'Caull, by declining to accept the provision made for him in his father's settlement and claiming his legitim, forfeit, not only for himself but also for his issue or other next of kin, all further interest under the fourth, fifth, and sixth heads of the settlement?

The second and third parties maintain that the truster's intention was that if any child should decline to accept the provisions of the settlement and claim legitim, such child should forfeit, not only for himself or herself, but also for his or her representatives, all further interest in the estate, and that therefore, as John, the fourth party, claimed legitim, his representatives are not entitled to have any share of the estate set aside for them. The trustees, the first parties, and John, the fourth party, on the other hand, maintain that no such forfeiture is implied in the settlement.

I am of the opinion that the contention of the second and third parties is well founded, and that John by claiming legitim disentitled his representatives to any benefit which they might otherwise have taken under the settlement. In the fourth purpose the word "share" is used to designate one-sixth of the residue, six being the number of aliquot parts of the residue corresponding to the number of the truster's children, and the word appears to me to be used in the same sense in the fifth and the sixth purposes. Thus in the sixth purpose the shares which the trustees are directed to hold and apply for John and his foresaids are declared to include the portions of any share which might accrue through any child predeceasing the truster without leaving lawful issue (clearly a share of capital) and also the portion of any share accruing through any child repudiating the settlement and claiming his or her legal provisions. The latter, like the former, appears to me clearly to mean a share of capital, not merely the liferent given to the repudiating child. The most important question, however, is as to the meaning of the word "share" in the clause which declares the consequence of a child repudiating the settlement and claiming his legal rights, and I think that the word "share" is used there as in the rest of the settlement, as meaning the aliquot part of the residue directed to be held for the repudiating child and his issue or next of kin. The contention of the trustees and of John involves the view that the word "share" is used in two different senses in the settlement, first, as meaning an aliquot part of the residue, and secondly, in the clause of forfeiture, as designating merely the life interest in the aliquot part given to John, leaving the right of his issue or next of kin to the fee of that part unaffected. This does not seem to me to be a natural construction of the word "share." The share "of" John mentioned in the clause of forfeiture appears to me to mean the aliquot part given to him in liferent and to his issue or representatives in fee, and if the term was to be used for the first time in an essentially different sense as designating merely John's life interest in the share, some clear evidence of the change might have been expected. The provision in this, as in the sixth purpose, that the share of the repudiating child shall accresce to the other children, naturally means the share or portion primarily given to that child, not merely the liferent of that share. If the word "share" in the clause of forfeiture meant merely the liferent in the case of John, the interest in his share given upon his repudiation to Alexander and Duncan would be a liferent of a liferent.

The trust-disposition and settlement was made in November 1884, long after the decisions in Fisher v. Dixon,[1] and other cases of that class, and at a time when the prevalent practice of conveyancers had come to be to make repudiation by a child infer the forfeiture of any gift made by the settlement not only to him, but to his children. I consider this to be a very reasonable practice, seeing that if (to take the present case) John was allowed to take his legitim, and his children were permitted to claim the fee of an equal share of the residue upon his death, John and his children collectively would obtain a larger proportion of the estate than the other children, contrary to the intention of the truster. The decision in the case of Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell[2] appears to me to support the views now expressed.

Other questions are put in the case, but if the view now stated in regard to the effect of John having claimed his legitim is correct, they do not arise.

LORD ADAM.—The testator directed that if any child should claim his legal provisions, he should forfeit his right to any share or shares of the estate, and the share or shares of such child should in that event accresce to the other sisters and brothers of the forfeiting child and their heirs.

One of the sons, John, has claimed his legal provisions, and has thereby forfeited any right to a share of the estate. But John's position was this, he had a liferent only of a share of the estate, the fee of the share being held by the trustees for his children; and the question arises whether John has forfeited his own liferent only, or whether by claiming his legal provisions he has also forfeited any right of his children to the fee of the share. That is the question which arises in this case. Now, it appears to me that that question depends on what meaning is to be attached to the words "the share or shares of such child" which are to "accresce." What did the testator mean when he used these words? Is it as your Lordship said merely the interest of John in that share, or is it not only that interest but also the fee which was given to the children? Now, that takes us back to consider the settlement generally to see what meaning the testator himself attached to the words "share of such child"—whether he meant the share itself or merely the interest in the share. What the testator did with reference to the residue of his estate was this: He divided it into six equal shares. One of these he gave to his son Peter under certain deductions. A second share he gave in similar terms to Mary Ann, and the third he gave to James under similar deductions, so that the whole of these shares were given to these three children. With reference to the other three shares, his direction to the trustees was this:—"My trustees shall hold and apply one of said shares for behoof of my son John and his lawful children, or their lawful issue, whom failing," &c. The second of these three shares was given to his son Alexander, and the third to his son Duncan in exactly similar terms, deductions in each case being made from the share to be paid to each of them. We see from a subsequent part of the deed that these shares were to be held by the trustees—in John's case for John in liferent allenarly and his children in fee. Then the testator, after directing that the sums deducted from the several shares of the children shall be made into a cumulo sum, and that cumulo sum divided and paid in the same way as the original shares, goes on to what appears to me to be a very important clause, and, therefore, I shall read it,—"It is hereby declared with reference to the whole of the shares hereinbefore provided that, if any of my said children shall predecease me, leaving lawful issue, such issue shall be entitled to the share or shares original and accruing which their parent would have taken by survivance," and then come these words—"the share of" "any child predeceasing me without leaving lawful issue shall be divided in the same manner as the original share." It will be observed that the testator in here speaking of shares makes no distinction whatever between the shares which were to be paid to the three first children in fee and the shares which were to be held for the three last-mentioned children in liferent. He refers to the whole of these shares, and speaks of them all without distinction, and it will, therefore, be observed that the words "share of any child predeceasing me" apply to the one set of shares just as much as to the other, and, accordingly, it appears to me to be clear in this part of the deed that he uses the word share of a child indifferently whether it refers to the share of a child that is to be paid in fee, or the share that is given in liferent to the child, and to the child's issue or next of kin in fee. Therefore, I think it is clear from this clause of the deed that when the testator speaks of "share" he means the share itself, whether it be one in fee, or whether it be one to be held by the trustees in liferent. Having done that, he goes on in the next clause to give directions as to the shares of the three latter children, John, Alexander, and Duncan, which come to this, that the share of each is to be held and applied by the trustees for the child in liferent allenarly, and his children in fee; and then there is this declaration, that there is to be no vesting until the expiry of the liferent. He deals with each son severally and separately, but the provisions in regard to each are identical. These being the provisions of the deed, we are brought back to the forfeiture clause to see—having ascertained in what sense the testator speaks of the share of a child—whether it applies to this clause. In dealing with this clause, the testator says "such child shall forfeit all right to any share or shares," and "the share or shares of such child" or children shall in that event accresce to the brothers and sisters and their issue. I think it is clear that when he speaks here he again imports no distinction between the two classes of shares, whether they are to be paid in fee or whether they are to be held by the trustees in liferent. He deals with them all in the same category, and obviously when he speaks of the shares of such child accrescing, he means the share of the child, whether it be a share of the first class to be paid at once or whether it be a share to be held by the trustees; and I think that the meaning of the testator is the whole share of the son who has the liferent only, and not merely the liferent interest in it. Therefore I agree with your Lordship, and I do not think it necessary to say more about it. But as your Lordship pointed out, if we were to take the meaning that it was only the liferent interest that was to accresce we should get into a very anomalous position—a position anything like which I do not remember ever seeing in this Court—because the result would be that all that would accresce, for example, to the younger sons, Duncan and Alexander, would be John's liferent, and all that they would get would be the liferent of a liferent, which in one case, I observe, would mean that they would get the liferent of £17, 17s. 3d. That is a reductio ad absurdum, and it could not be the meaning of the testator; and therefore I agree with your Lordship in the result at which you have arrived.

LORD M'LAREN.—There can be no doubt at this day of the principle to be applied to the determination of such cases. If the election and the consequences of the election are determined by law, then the law is, that if the children take an interest independent of that of the parent, the election of the parent in no way affects the independent right of the child; but if the child's right is dependent on that of the parent, as, for instance if he takes by substitution, or if a sum is given to the parent for the maintenance of himself and his family, so that the two rights are inseparable, it may be in such a case that the forfeiture of the share given to the family would involve the children in the consequences of forfeiture. But in order to avoid the consequence which has been pointed out by your Lordship—that it leads to one branch getting a larger share than the other branches of the family—it has been not unusual for lawyers in framing wills to provide that anyone who claims contrary to the scope of the will shall forfeit his provisions, not only for himself, but also for his children or descendants.

Now, when a testator uses an unusual word, or it may be a common word in an unusual sense, and thereby puts a mark upon the word, defines it inferentially as having a signification peculiar to his will, it is in the absence of any explanatory context probably quite legitimate to carry that meaning into the other clauses of the will. But then the word "share" is a very common word. It may be said in wills to be nomen generale. I do not know any word that is more frequently used, or one which is used in a more general sense, and its ordinary meaning is just the benefit that is reaped by the individual whose interest is dealt with. Although for shortness the testator in the clause of residue speaks of the portion of his estate that is given to a family as the share of his son, I have difficulty in understanding that as impressing a peculiar meaning on the word "share," or obliging us to read it in the sense of share of a family wherever the word is used again. It is just the function of a will to describe in what way a testator's estate is to be "shared" by relatives or persons to whom he leaves it. I think it would be quite consistent with sound construction to hold that, as no reference is made to the issue of the person who incurs a forfeiture (in the clause of forfeiture), the clause means nothing more than what the law would imply—a declaration that whoever claims contrary to the will shall take no benefit under it, and that the benefit intended for him shall pass to the other branches of the family. But then while I should probably have accepted that interpretation if I had been considering this case alone, I do not feel so confident on the subject as to induce me to dissent from the judgment proposed, there being no question of principle involved. I hope it will always be kept in view in such cases that the ambiguities of one testator are not to form a canon of construction for the ambiguities of

No. 35. another testator; and under that condition I am prepared to concur in the judgment proposed, which I think involves nothing more than a question of construction of a special clause in a somewhat special will.

Dec. 4, 1900. Dairon v. Dairon.

Expenses—Witness—Party as Witness.—An action of reduction of a trust-deed was directed against the trustees, and against an individual who was a party to the deed. The last-mentioned defender appeared and gave evidence at the proof in support of the deed. Held that he was entitled to expenses against the unsuccessful pursuer (per the Lord President) on the ground that he was a necessary witness for the trustees, who were the proper defenders of the trust; (per Lord Adam and Lord M'Laren) on the ground that as a necessary witness he was entitled to expenses whether he was a party to the case or not.

Opinion (per Lord M'Laren) that such expenses ought to include an allowance for subsistence as well as travelling expenses.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Low.

BY trust-assignation and settlement dated 8th June 1892, Andrew Miller Dairon, since deceased, James Dairon, Edward Dairon, David Alfred Dairon, and Catherine Dairon or Fleming, all children of the deceased James Dairon, plasterer in Glasgow, conveyed the heritable estate left to them by their father to Andrew Miller Dairon, Edward Dairon, and James Brownlie, writer in Glasgow, as trustees. The purpose of the trust was to regulate the distribution of the trust-estate among the different members of the family and their children.

In 1898 James Dairon and Mrs Fleming raised an action of reduction of this deed on grounds involving a charge of personal fraud against Edward and David Dairon. The defenders called in the action were (1) the surviving trustees, and (2) Edward and David Dairon as individuals. At the proof before the Lord Ordinary David Dairon, who was resident in Canada, appeared as a witness for the defenders.

On 11th August 1899, the Lord Ordinary repelled the reasons of reduction and assoilzied the defenders, and this judgment was affirmed by the First Division on 22d June 1900. The defenders being found entitled to expenses, the accounts were remitted to the Auditor for taxation, and on his report coming up for approval the pursuers objected to the report in respect, inter alia, that the Auditor had not disallowed the following items:—

Witnesses examined.—(2) David A. Dairon, plasterer, Vancouver, British Columbia, 36 days at £1, 1s.; travelling expenses between Vancouver and Montreal, £38, 12s.; and passage money between Montreal and Glasgow, £25, charged at £101, 8s.; taxed at £63. (3) Edward Dairon, plasterer, Glasgow, 2 days at £1, 1s., and travelling expenses, 15s., charged at £2, 17s.; taxed at £1, 8s. 6d.

On 20th July 1900, the Lord Ordinary sustained this objection to the extent of £61, 11s. 6d., reducing the sum of £63 allowed to David Dairon to £1, 8s. 6d., the same sum as that allowed to Edward Dairon.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—By the Act of Sederunt of 15th July 1876[1] non-resident witnesses were entitled to an allowance at the same rate as resident witnesses for the time "necessarily occupied by them in going to, remaining at, and returning from the place of trial or proof, besides reasonable travelling charges for going to and returning from the place of trial or proof," and as a party was now a competent witness,[2] there was no reason why a party appearing as a witness should be treated differently as regards the question of expenses from other witnesses.[3] It was not disputed that David Dairon was a necessary witness, while the nature of the case made against him and Edward rendered examination on commission inappropriate.

Argued for the pursuers;—A party was not entitled to recover expenses incurred in pleading his own cause, although it was his right to plead it if he chose,[4] and the same principle applied where a party appeared as a witness on his own behalf. Under the law as it stood prior to 1853 a party, even when a competent witness, was not treated on the same footing as other witnesses in the matter of expenses. Thus, a defender deponing on a reference to his oath by the pursuer was held not entitled to the usual charges for loss of time, but only to travelling expenses.[5] Further, this witness might have been examined on commission, and his coming to this country was an unnecessary expense.

Lord President.—I think the Lord Ordinary has erred in this matter, as I am unable to see any reason why David Dairon should not get his expenses. His position in this action is peculiar. He was a party to the family arrangement which was challenged, but he is not one of the trustees. Hence, in so far as the action was directed against the trustees as defenders of the trust, he was not a party, but he was asked by the trustees to appear as a witness, and no ground has been stated why in that capacity he should not be entitled to his outlays, which is all he claims. It is not disputed that he was a necessary witness.

But we have heard an argument which covers a much larger ground. It is maintained by the pursuers as a general rule that a party to a cause is not entitled to expenses—even outlays incurred by him as a witness—and although he may be a necessary witness, and whatever the nature of the case may be. In this case a very serious charge of fraud was made on record against this defender, and it would be an unfortunate state of the law if an innocent party was not, under such circumstances, entitled to come and deny such a charge except on condition of paying his own outlays. In this case both the Lord Ordinary and the Court have held the charge of fraud to be wholly unfounded, and it would require much stronger authority than has been quoted to us to dispose me to hold that a witness is not, in such circumstances, to have his outlays, merely because he is a party to the case. But the first ground which I have stated is, in my judgment, sufficient to warrant us in holding that David Dairon is, as a witness, entitled to the very moderate sum in name of outlays which was allowed by the Auditor.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I always understood, and my impression has been confirmed, that by the old law if a party chose at his own convenience to attend the Court in his own case he was not entitled to be remunerated for doing so. And if he chose to go further, as in the case of Whyte,[1] and to plead his own cause, dispensing with the aid of agent and counsel, that would make no difference. But a material change in the law was made as to the position of parties by the Evidence Act, which enabled a party to become a witness in his own case; and if a party is entitled to give evidence, why should he not get his expenses? Now, in this case not only was the evidence necessary, but I think it was not such as could properly be taken on commission, because there was a personal attack on the defender's character—a charge of fraud—and he was one of the only two witnesses who could speak on that matter. The case turned upon the credibility of the witnesses, and the Lord Ordinary and we were of opinion that Edward and David Dairon had spoken the truth. No doubt if David had not come here he would have lost his case. There is, accordingly, no question as to the relative expense of his coming here and of his evidence being taken on commission. Being present he was examined as a witness, and why should not the rule applying to other witnesses apply to him? The necessity for his coming here was caused by the pursuers, and there was a decree for expenses given against them. Was the expense to him caused by them any the less because he was a party to the case?

LORD M'LAREN.—When a party to a case is examined as a witness, whether in his own favour or at the instance of his adversary, he gives his evidence under the same conditions as any other witness, and if his evidence is necessary he will be entitled to his travelling expenses and to money for his subsistence during the journey.

It is strange that this point is raised for the first time so many years after the date of the Evidence Act, by which it was made competent for parties to appear as witnesses, and the fact that no distinction has been taken during all this time (for I presume the Auditor has followed the practice of his office) leads me to suppose that a contrary view could not be maintained. If that be so, the only question is whether the evidence given by David Dairon was necessary for the determination of the case. It was said that a party is not to be allowed expenses for conducting his own cause. I agree in the decision quoted, in which I concurred, that no party can be allowed such expenses, because he is entitled to appear by counsel, and if he does not choose to avail himself of that privilege, and thinks he can conduct his case better in person, his election is not to be the means of subjecting the other party to a new liability. But if a party gives evidence he must do so in person, and I cannot see how he differs from any other witness. No. 36. Dec. 4, 1900. Dairon v. Dairon.

As to the materiality of the evidence, I think that where a person is charged with fraud there is a direct challenge to him to appear and maintain the deed or the benefit which is said to have been obtained by fraud. I cannot figure a clearer case for allowing the application of the ordinary rule.

I would add that, while the Auditor has only allowed the reduced charge of £63, and the present reclaiming note is only directed to having that amount allowed, if the matter had been open I should have seen no reason for distinguishing between travelling expenses and subsistence money. If a witness is entitled to journey money as costs in the cause, he must live on the way, and he is entitled to an allowance for subsistence in so far as it is not covered (as in the case of a steamship voyage) by the passenger fare.

Assignation—Real Security—Tantum et tale—Trust—Trust title for beneficiaries pro indiviso—Proof of purposes of trust—Joint Adventures.—A feudal title to lands was taken to A and B as trustees for themselves, each to the extent of one-half pro indiviso. By ex facie absolute disposition, B conveyed to an onerous assignee his one-half pro indiviso of the lands. This disposition was recorded.

In a competition between B's disponee and A, held (1) that the disponee's right was qualified by the trust disclosed in his disponer's title; (2) that the purposes of the trust, not being set forth in the title, might be proved by parole; and (3) that, accordingly, as it was established by such proof that the purpose was a joint adventure by A and B with reference to the lands in question, the disposition by B was only effectual to the extent of his interest in the joint adventure, viz., to the extent of one-half of the free balance on an accounting with A.

HUGH LIVINGSTONE, wholesale ironmonger in Glasgow, and William Brown Alexander, wright, Bridge of Weir, acquired in 1896 an area of ground on the west side of Milbrae Crescent, Glasgow, for the purpose of a joint building speculation, and as a site for tenements to be erected and afterwards sold for their behoof. In the feu-contract of this ground, dated 10th and 25th, and recorded 27th April 1896, the title was taken "to and in favour of the said Hugh Livingstone and William Brown Alexander, and the survivor of them, and the heir of the survivor, as trustees and in trust for behoof of the said Hugh Livingstone and William Brown Alexander, and their respective heirs 1ST DIVISION. and assignees whomsoever, each to the extent of one-half pro indiviso, heritably and irredeemably."

In pursuance of the joint adventure a tenement, No. 17 Millbrae Crescent, was built during 1896-97, the main part of the outlay on which was borne by Livingstone.

By disposition dated 23d, and recorded 25th April 1898, Alexander, having borrowed £250 from James and John Allan, wholesale provision merchants in Glasgow, conveyed to them his "one-half pro indiviso" of the subjects described in the feu-contract. This disposition was ex facie absolute, but was qualified by a back-letter, restricting it to a conveyance in security of the loan. The disposition was duly recorded.

Disputes having arisen among the parties, the tenement No. 17 Millbrae Crescent was, by common agreement, conveyed to Mr William M. Buchan, writer in Glasgow, in order that he might sell it and hold the proceeds for whoever should be found entitled thereto.

The tenement was accordingly sold, and one-half of the proceeds was, of consent, paid to Livingstone. In regard to the other half, amounting to £273, 7s. 10d., an action of multiplepoinding was brought by Livingstone as real raiser in name of Buchan as nominal raiser, and calling Alexander and the Allans as defenders. In this action claims were lodged by Livingstone and the Allans. Livingstone claimed the whole fund in medio in liquidation of the balance due to him by Alexander arising out of the joint adventure.

He pleaded;—(1) The said indebtedness of the defender Alexander to this claimant being a proper charge upon the share of the proceeds of the heritable property in question, and being in excess of the said share which forms the fund in medio, this claimant ought to be ranked and preferred in terms of one or other of his claims, with expenses.

The Allans also claimed the whole fund in medio as onerous assignees of Alexander holding a completed real security.

They pleaded;—(3) The said claimant's [i.e., Livingstone's] averments of joint adventure are excluded by the terms of the title to the property; et separatim, they can only be proved by writ or oath.

On 7th March 1900 the Lord Ordinary (Pearson), before answer, allowed the parties a proof. The proof established, inter alia, the facts relating to the joint adventure, and the state of the accounts arising therefrom between Livingstone and Alexander.

On 17th August the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the claimant Hugh Livingstone is entitled to be ranked and preferred primo loco on the fund in medio for the sum of £172, 17s. 6d. sterling, and that quoad ultra the claimants James Allan and John Allan are entitled to be ranked and preferred on the fund in medio for the whole balance thereof, reserving as to the expenses of raising and bringing the action into Court; and ranks and prefers the respective claimants accordingly, and decerns." *

* "OPINION.—(In his note the Lord Ordinary, after reviewing the facts, with the result, inter alia, of holding that the Allans were onerous assignees, dealt with the question of law as follows):—This being so, the Allans contend that the terms of the title on which the subjects stood are conclusive in their favour, and that it is incompetent to look behind it. Their argument is, that while it is a trust title, it discloses a bare formal trust without purposes, each being beneficial owner of one-half pro indiviso of the

No. 37.

Dec. 5, 1900. Livingstone v. Allans.

The Allans reclaimed, and argued;—In a question with an assignee a title to heritage could not be qualified by a latent trust.[1] Here the feu-contract defined the interest of each beneficiary as "one-half pro indiviso," and the principle referred to applied just as if the title had been taken in the name of the parties as individuals and without a trust. The Allans were onerous assignees, and were not aware of the existence of the joint adventure. They were entitled to rely on the records, and as the title disclosed an interest in Livingstone and Alexander, each to the extent of one half, they were not bound by extraneous transactions altering this division. The proof led of the joint adventure was thus incompetent, or at any rate irrelevant. It was also incompetent on the ground that against a third party a joint adventure could only be proved by writ or oath.[2]

Argued for the respondent;—Alexander, who was merely one of two trustees in whom the feudal title was vested, could not effectually convey to an assignee any real right. He could only convey his jus crediti in the subjects. To determine what this was, parole proof that the purpose of the trust was a joint adventure on the part of subject, and being entitled at any time to get rid of the trust by an action of denuding. They say that they advanced the money in reliance on the records, and that they are in the position of a bona fide onerous disponee or assignee acquiring from a trustee who is vested in the subject by a title ex facie absolute. It is necessary in considering this question to examine the Allans' title, and it at once becomes apparent that the principle does not apply. They hold no title from the trustees, and it was the trustees who alone had the power to sell that subject or to borrow upon it. The Allans' title is derived from Alexander alone, and although it bears to dispone his one-half pro indiviso of the subjects, and was recorded in the Register of Sasines, it really amounts to no more than an assignation of Alexander's beneficial interest under the trust. No doubt the registration in the sasines would accresce to the Allans so soon as the trustees had conveyed to Alexander his pro indiviso half (as they might ultimately be bound to do), and he had completed his title thereto; but until that time the Allans were merely assignees of Alexander's interest, and were subject to all the qualifications affecting that interest.

"Now, one of these qualifications was, that Livingstone was not bound to concur in any deed affecting the subjects until he was reimbursed for his outlay on the subjects. This followed from the fact that the tenement was beyond all doubt erected 'on joint account'; and I presume that the original title was taken as it was, not merely for convenience, but in order to secure the rights of the two joint adventurers inter se.

"The Allans further object to this view of their rights, on the ground that even as between Livingstone and Alexander it is incompetent to qualify the terms in which the title was taken except by writ or oath, and that this rule holds good whether the case falls within the law of trust or the law of partnership, Wilson v. Threshie, 1826, 4 S. 366, being referred to. Alexander's right, they say, is by the title declared to be a full half pro indiviso of the subjects, and this is an attempt to cut it down. I do not think this is accurate. The right of each co-adventurer was and remains a right to one-half of the proceeds of the joint adventure. While the subjects remain heritable it is accurately expressed as a right to one-half pro indiviso, just Livingstone and Alexander was competent. The jus crediti of Alexander in the property of the joint adventure was the residue after all the charges on it had been met, and the accounts of the joint adventure adjusted.[1] It was only to this extent that the assignation to the Messrs Allan was effectual.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This action has been raised for the purpose of obtaining a decision as to the right to the sum of £273, 7s. 10d. held by Mr Buchan, the pursuer and nominal raiser. The competitors are Mr Livingstone, who was, along with Mr Alexander, engaged in a joint adventure in building, and Messrs Allan, who claim as the assignees of the share which belonged to Mr Alexander. It was not disputed that Mr Livingstone was entitled to one-half of the free proceeds of the joint adventure, and the fund in medio consists of the other half, which would have belonged to Mr Alexander if no charge had been created upon or against it. Part, however, is claimed by Mr Livingstone, who maintains that upon a just accounting between the parties to the joint adventure, there would be very little left for Mr Alexander, or anyone claiming in his right.

Messrs Allan, on the other hand, contend that they are not affected by the result of such an accounting, because they made to, or procured for, Mr Alexander a loan of £250 on the security of his whole right in the property, which they say is not affected by the accounting. The success or failure of that contention must, in my view, depend upon their being able to establish that they were entitled to rely on the records, or upon evidence submitted to them that the right assigned to them by Mr Alexander was not burdened with any debt or charge. I concur with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the Messrs Allan were bona fide onerous assignees, and I shall deal with the case on that assumption.

The question at once arises, what information did the Messrs Allan get from the title shewn to them—did it or did it not shew an unequivocal and an unburdened right? The title is a feu-contract dated February 1896, by which certain subjects were disponed in feu to Mr Alexander and Mr Livingstone, and the survivor of them and the heirs of the survivor, as trustees for behoof of themselves and their respective heirs and assignees as, if the subjects had been held under the power of sale, it may be described as a right to one-half of the net proceeds. It does not really alter the copartners' equal rights, that there may have to be an accounting between them as partners in order to ascertain what it is that they are to share equally. If writ be necessary at all to shew the relation between Livingstone and Alexander touching this property, it is furnished by the minute of reference between them, which expressly bears that the tenement in question was built on joint account. It was not suggested that the original site could in this dispute be treated separately from the tenement built upon it. The sale was of the entire subject, and the fund in medio is one-half of the net proceeds of that sale.

"In my view, therefore, the Allans cannot compete upon the fund in medio with Livingstone's claim against Alexander on account of the tenement No. 17 Millbrae Crescent."

whomsoever, each to the extent of one-half pro indiviso. The beneficiaries under the trust are the same persons as the trustees—that is to say, on an accounting between them each would be entitled to one-half of the free value or proceeds of the trust-estate, but their right rests upon the trust, not upon the feudal conveyance in the feu-contract. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the principle applicable to a feudal title, ex facie absolute, in two persons, does not apply here, although it happens that the trustees and the beneficiaries are the same persons. Their real position was that they were engaged in a joint adventure in building, and were accordingly entitled to charge the trust property, which was in effect the capital of the adventure, with all the liabilities incident to it, so that all that Mr Alexander could effectually assign to Messrs Allan was half the free balance which might remain after the joint adventure had been wound up. Though not technically a partnership, as no separate legal persona was created in whom the common stock could be vested, the case of such a joint adventure is very similar to that of a partnership for the purposes of the present question. This follows from the decisions in the cases of Keith v. Penn, 2 D. 633, and Creditors of M'Caul, M. 14,608, which establish that the property embraced in a joint adventure cannot be effectually assigned until all the liabilities of the joint adventure have been satisfied.

It was maintained by the claimant Allan that it is only competent to prove a trust by writ or oath, and this is true as in a question between the truster and the alleged trustee. But here the fact that the property was held in trust is proved by the writ of both, viz., the feu-contract. It was argued that there is a similar restriction as to the mode of proving the terms of a trust, but this is not so, it having been repeatedly decided that when the fact that property is held in trust has once been admitted or proved by writ or oath, the terms and purposes of the trust may be proved otherwise.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's decision upon the main question is right. If this be so, the only remaining question is one of amount, and as it is evident that this question has been carefully considered by the Lord Ordinary, we should be slow to disturb his decision upon it. After giving all due attention to the argument, I can see no reason for differing from him on that question.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think the case is one of difficulty, but it is interesting because it raises in a new form the well-worn distinction between the rights of an assignee and a creditor either under his own diligence or through the trustee in a sequestration. Reference was made by both parties to the opinions expressed in the case of The Heritable Reversionary Company v. Millar.[1] The point decided in that case was that a creditor cannot acquire from a debtor who is in possession of estate anything more than the interest really belonging to him. He takes his debtor's interest tantum et tale, and, if the debtor has no real interest will acquire nothing. But it was clearly recognised in that case in my opinion and in the opinion delivered in the House of Lords, that an assignee may take a higher right than a creditor. He takes in general all that his cedent has to convey or is empowered to convey. In this case we are not concerned with any question of power, because the debtor as a partner is only assigning what is his own, i.e., a jus crediti in the partnership estate held. Now every assignee of a jus crediti under a trust is put on his inquiry to ascertain the terms of that trust, because the right assigned cannot be larger than the cedent's right against the trust. It is not enough merely to look at the terms of a trust-deed declaring that the trustees held for two persons pro indiviso. In such a case there may well be a supplementary deed embodying contract rights under which the trustees are bound to hold upon conditions not expressed in the deed of conveyance. That is the case here, and it is the key to the decision of the case, because while for convenience the title was taken in favour of the two partners as owners each of one half pro indiviso of the subject the real purpose of the trust was to hold it as estate of the joint adventure, and subject to the debts affecting such joint estate. I therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary that, assuming the Allans to be bona fide onerous assignees, they took nothing beyond such rights in the property as their author could have insisted on, having regard to his contract with his copartner.

I also agree with your Lordship that in applying that principle to the accounting the Lord Ordinary has dealt with the case correctly and satisfactorily, and that no sufficient cause has been shewn for reopening the accounting.

Succession—Vesting—Fee or Liferent—Direction to Trustees to hold—Repugnancy—Power to advance capital.—By a testamentary settlement trustees were directed, on the death of two annuitants (who predeceased the testator), to hold a share of residue "for behoof of" J. H. and his family, as follows, viz., for payment of the interest of said share to said J. H. to the extent of one half thereof, and the interest of the other half thereof to his children, and if the said J. H. and his children "stand in need thereof" the trustees were directed "to expend the capital of said share for and in behalf of the said J. H. and his said children in such proportions as they may think proper." The settlement further declared that in the event of J. H. "dying before the division of the residue," the share which he would have been entitled to if alive was to go to his issue, but failing issue, then to the survivors of the beneficiaries equally. There was no further disposal of the share.

Held that the power to advance capital was a power to advance to the extent of one-half only to J. H., and to the extent of the other half to the children, and that there was a gift of the fee of the share to the extent of one-half to J. H., and as regards the other half, to the children, which vested a morte testatoris.

BY trust-disposition and settlement, dated 15th April 1879, Mrs Mary Mitchell or Gillies, widow of Thomas Gillies, Stirling, disponed her whole estate to John Morrison and others, as trustees, inter alia, for the following purposes:—(4) and (5) To pay annuities to two persons named; and (lastly) on the death of the survivor of the two annuitants, to divide the residue into seven shares, one of which they were directed to dispose of as follows:—"To hold another of said shares for behoof of the said John Hodge junior and his family, as follows, viz.:— . . . for payment of the interest of said share to the said John Hodge junior to the extent of one half thereof, and the interest of the other half thereof to the children procreated of the marriage between the said John Hodge junior and the deceased Elizabeth M'Laren, and if the said John Hodge junior and his children by the said Elizabeth M'Laren stand in need thereof, I direct my trustees to expend the capital of said share for and in behalf of the said John Hodge junior and his said children, in such proportions and in such way and manner as they may think proper . . ."

Then followed a declaration that in the event of any of the beneficiaries having right to the said shares, including John Hodge junior, "dying before the division of the said residue, leaving lawful issue, such issue shall be entitled to the share or respective provisions and share which their deceased parent or parents would have been entitled to if alive, but, failing issue, then to and among the survivors equally."

The testator was predeceased by the two annuitants and survived by John Hodge junior and his children. One of the other beneficiaries to whom a share had been destined, having predeceased the testator without issue, the share of residue to which John Hodge and his children became entitled as above, at the testator's death, amounted to one-sixth. John Hodge junior died in 1899, leaving a settlement by which he conveyed to trustees, inter alia, everything to which he was or might be entitled under the settlement of Mrs Gillies. Down to the time of his death Mrs Gillies' testamentary trustees had retained in their own hands the share destined to John Hodge junior, and his children for their behoof, and had advanced no part of the capital. After the death of John Hodge junior certain questions, hereinafter set forth in the contentions of the parties, arose as to the construction of the last purpose of Mrs Gillies' settlement, to determine which the present special case was brought.

The parties to the case were (1) Mrs Gillies' testamentary trustees; (2) The trustees of John Hodge junior; (3) John Hodge (tertius), a son of John Hodge junior; and (4) the other children of John Hodge junior.

The second parties maintained that Mrs Gillies' settlement conferred the fee of one-half of the one-sixth share on John Hodge junior a morte testatoris, and that they were entitled to payment thereof, and in this view the third party concurred. The fourth parties maintained that they and the third party were entitled in virtue of their having survived their father, John Hodge junior, to payment of the whole one-sixth share, or alternatively to payment of one-half thereof.

The questions of law for the determination of the Court were:—"(1) Are the second parties entitled to payment of the one-sixth share of the residue of Mrs Gillies' estate provided in her trust-disposition and settlement to John Hodge (secundus) and his family? or (2) Are the second parties entitled to payment of one-half of said one-sixth share? or (3) Are the children of John Hodge (secundus) and Elizabeth M'Laren entitled to payment of the whole of said one-sixth share equally among them? or (4) Are said children entitled to payment of one-half of said one-sixth share?"

Argued for the second and third parties;—The right to the fee of the one-sixth share vested a morte, one-half in John Hodge junior and the other half in his children.[1]

Argued for the fourth parties;—Nothing vested in John Hodge junior. The only fee he was to get depended on the trustees exercising their power of apportionment—a power which suspended vesting.[2] At his death the fee vested in the children. The only other possible view was that there was no fee in anybody but the trustees until apportionment. The fee was conveyed to them for the purposes of the trust, one of which was the disposal of the fee. They might dispose of the whole to these parties,[3] and counsel mentioned, though it was not stated in the case, that they desired to do so. Further, the meaning of the survivorship clause was that if Hodge junior died before the division of the residue, i.e., before any capital had been advanced to him, his issue took the whole.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The testator directed her trustees after the death of two annuitants to realise his whole estate and divide it among certain beneficiaries named. To some of the beneficiaries the share destined to them was to be paid, the shares of other beneficiaries were to be held by the trustees for their behoof. The share with which we are here concerned the trustees were directed to hold for behoof of "John Hodge junior and his family, as follows"—to pay the interest of one half thereof to John Hodge junior, and the interest of the other half to his children, "and if the said John Hodge junior and his children . . . stand in need thereof I direct my trustees to expend the capital of said share for and in behalf of the said John Hodge junior and his said children, in such proportions and in such way and manner as they may think proper." There is also a provision that if John Hodge junior should die before "the division of the said residue" his said children should be entitled to the provision and share of the residue which he would have taken had he survived that period. As the two annuitants (on whose death the residue was directed to be divided) predeceased the testator, the period of division was reached when the testator died. John Hodge junior having survived the testator, he accordingly survived the period of division, and therefore the provision made in favour of his children in the event of his predecease never became operative. It was said that we should read "division of the residue" as meaning actual payment of the residue—a reading which I reject as introducing a term which is inconsistent with the plain words of the trust-deed. We have therefore to decide what was the right conferred on John Hodge junior and his children respectively, and when did that right vest.

The testator directed the share in question to be held by the trustees for behoof of John and his children. I take that to be equivalent to a gift to John and his children, in accordance with opinions expressed in several recently decided cases, and the gift, in my opinion, was a gift of fee which vested a morte. There seems to me to be no reason for holding that vesting was postponed, and without such reason vesting must be held to have taken place a morte according to the well-settled presumption of law. I think further that it was a gift of fee, for this reason, that if it was not, then the fee was not disposed of at all, and would fall into intestacy, a result which is to be avoided if possible, and in itself rather inconsistent with the fact that the testator was by her deed disposing and intending to dispose of her whole estate.

But the question remains, In what proportion was the fee gifted to John and his children? The deed certainly does not make this clear, but I am of opinion that the deed sufficiently indicates that the fee was to be divided into equal parts, one of which went to John and the other to his children. The fact that the interest of one-half was to be paid to each is an indication of the extent of their respective rights in the capital. It was said that the direction to the trustees to expend the capital, if necessary, on behalf of John and his children was against this view. But I think otherwise. If the trustees were authorised to expend the whole capital for the benefit of the children (which was an argument used in support of the view that they alone were fiars), they were equally authorised to expend the whole capital for behoof of John, the result of which (on the argument I have referred to) would be to confer the whole fee on John. This was not, however, the testator's intention. She did not, I think, authorise the whole capital to be expended for behoof of the children, for that would have deprived John of the interest of the half, which was carefully guarded for him. In like manner, the trustees could not expend the whole capital for behoof of John, which would have deprived the children of the interest of one-half, as carefully guarded for them. But the trustees could expend the capital destined to John for his behoof, and equally expend the one-half of the capital destined to the children for their behoof. That I take to be the meaning and intention of the testator, and on no other interpretation of her deed does it appear to me that her whole directions can be carried out. I think, therefore, that the second and fourth questions should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am also clearly of opinion that the one-half of a sixth share of the residue, which the trustees were directed to hold for behoof of John Hodge junior, vested in him a morte testatoris, and that the other half of the said sixth share vested at the same date in the children of the marriage between him and his first wife Elizabeth M'Laren. The scheme of that clause in the deed which deals with the one-sixth share in question makes it clear that the trustees were to hold one-half exclusively for the benefit of John Hodge junior. The interest of it was to be paid to him, and the trustees were empowered to expend so much of the capital of said half share for his behoof as they thought fit. I do not think that his children had any interest in that half, or that he had any interest in the half destined to them. Accordingly, it would not have been in the power of the trustees to apply any part of the capital of John Hodge junior's half for behoof of his children, or vice versa.

It is true that there is no direct gift of the capital to John Hodge junior; but this is one of the class of cases in which a gift of the interest coupled with a power to the trustees to make advances of capital is sufficient to indicate a gift of the capital to the beneficiary. John Hodge junior was a residuary legatee. There was no ulterior destination and no survivorship clause, because the survivorship clause, which was relied on strongly by Mr Vary Campbell, relates solely to the date of division of the residue, which is directed to take place on the death of the survivor of the two annuitants. At that date the truster directs her trustees to divide the residue into seven equal parts or shares, and pay the same to or hold them for the beneficiaries as therein directed. That is "the division of the said residue" which is referred to in the deed.

I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that the second alternative question and the fourth alternative question should be answered in the affirmative; and the first and third in the negative.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD YOUNG concurred.

THE COURT answered the second and fourth questions in the affirmative, and found it unnecessary to answer the others.

Succession—Legacy—"Free from Legacy-duty"—Annuity—Substituted Annuitant.—A testator by his settlement directed his trustees to pay certain annuities, "each free of legacy-duty." By a supplementary will he nominated four persons, a nephew and nieces of the annuitants, as "heirs to the annuities" of their uncle and aunts, as these should become vacant by the deaths of the annuitants.

Held that the trustees were not bound to pay the succession-duties exigible on the "heirs" becoming entitled to the annuities.

2D DIVISION.

LEWIS CARMICHAEL URQUHART, sometime at West Villa, Elgin, died on 20th January 1889. He left a holograph will, dated 31st July 1878, with a codicil, dated 14th August 1884, and a supplementary will, dated 1st May 1888.

By his will he left his whole estate of every description to trustees for certain purposes, and, inter alia, directed them to pay "annuities of £50 sterling, in half-yearly instalments, each free of legacy-duty, to my dear brother Alexander Urquhart, . . . and to my dear sisters, Helen Urquhart and Isabella Urquhart or Stewart; . . . and also to pay therefrom, in a similar manner, annuities of £10 sterling, each free of legacy-duty, to my cousins Margaret Cormie, Helen Cormie or Archibald, and Penuel Anderson or Falconer, whom failing, to her daughter Penuel Falconer . . . and, free of legacy-duty, an annuity of £20 sterling to Ann Reid, spinster, in Elgin, presently in service with me."

By codicil of 14th August 1884 he provided,—"The annuity of £10 sterling, lapsed by the death of Helen Cormie or Archibald, I give, devise, and bequeath to the aforementioned Ann Reid, my housekeeper, in addition to the annuity of £20 sterling previously settled on her, and all free of legacy-duty."

By the supplementary will of 1st May 1888 the testator recalled a bequest under the will in favour of his nephew and nieces, Frank Urquhart, Agnes Urquhart, and Elspeth Jane Urquhart; and further provided,—"I hereby constitute and appoint them and their brother, Dr Alexander Reid Urquhart . . . heirs to the £50 annuities of their uncle Alexander Urquhart, of Agnes Villa, and their aunts Miss Helen Urquhart and Mrs Captain Stewart, . . . each annuity as it may become vacant by the death of the annuitant being divided equally amongst the said four children or the survivors of them during their lifetime. . . . With regard to the annuities of Miss Penuel Falconer, Margaret Cormie, and Alexander Macintosh, as they become vacant by death, I constitute and appoint Miss Ann Reid, my housekeeper, heir to each of them, in addition to that settled upon herself."

The testator was survived by the said Alexander Urquhart, Helen Urquhart, and Isabella Urquhart or Stewart, who all subsequently died. He was predeceased by Mrs Penuel Anderson or Falconer. Miss Penuel Falconer and the annuitants substituted by the supplementary will survived.

Upon the death of the original annuitants, and the succession to their annuities opening, a question arose between the trustees and the substituted annuitants as to whether the former or the latter were liable for the succession-duty which then became payable. To determine this, among other questions not here reported, the present special case was brought.

The parties to the case were—(1) the testamentary trustees; (2) the trustees and managers of Dr Gray's Hospital, Elgin, to which a legacy had been left; (3) the trustees and managers of the Northern Infirmary, Inverness, to which a legacy had been left; (4) the testator's nephews and nieces, Alexander Reid Urquhart, Frank Urquhart, and Mrs Agnes Urquhart or Tamson, Mrs Elspeth Jane Urquhart or Hobart, and their husbands for their interests, and Miss Penuel Falconer; (5) Ann Reid; and (6) the Baptist Union of Scotland, the residuary legatee.

The first, second, third, and sixth parties maintained that the substituted annuitants must pay the succession-duties due on their succeeding to the annuities; the fourth and fifth parties maintained that they must be paid by the testamentary trustees.

The following questions, inter alia, were submitted for the judgment of the Court:—"(3) Do the succession-duties upon the annuities of £50 bequeathed by the testator to his brother Alexander Urquhart and his sisters Helen and Isabella respectively, which became payable upon the succession thereto of the said Alexander Reid Urquhart, Frank Urquhart, Agnes Urquhart or Tamson, and Elspeth Jane Urquhart or Hobart, and which will hereafter become payable upon the succession of the survivors and survivor of them; and also upon the annuity of £10 bequeathed by the testator to Penuel Falconer, which may become payable upon the succession thereto of the said Ann Reid, fall to be paid by the first parties? or

Urquhart's Trustees v. Gordon.

(4) Are these duties payable by the parties respectively succeeding to said annuities?"

Argued for the first, second, third, and sixth parties;—The testator neither directed nor intended that the substituted annuitants should escape paying legacy-duty, except in the case where he expressly said so, viz., in the bequest to Ann Reid in the codicil of 14th August 1884. This was not a case of changing a gift to the same legatee or of changing the legatees.[1] It was a case of a gift to a legatee in succession to a different legatee, and there was no case where the succeeding legatee was held entitled to take free of legacy-duty because the original legatee did.

Argued for the fourth and fifth parties;—These parties were made "heirs" to annuities free of legacy-duty. The testator intended to place them exactly in the position of the original annuitants. The bequest to Ann Reid in the codicil of 14th August 1884 was altogether different. That was a bequest of a lapsed annuity, and it was necessary there to repeat the condition. Here there was a gift of annuities as originally bequeathed, i.e., free of legacy-duty.

The opinions of the Court, so far as applicable to the point reported, were:—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—Further in the same codicil, he recalled his bequests of several heritable subjects and in lieu of them he made those who would have been entitled to them "heirs" to certain annuities left by the previous deed. The question in regard to them is, whether the trustees must pay these annuities free of legacy-duty. The contention upon which the beneficiaries maintain that the annuities must be paid free of duty, is that the original legacies, to which they were made heirs were declared to be free of legacy-duty, and that it must be presumed that in conferring this benefit upon the new legatees it must have been the intention of the testator to confer it upon the same conditions. If there were nothing else in the testamentary writings except the bequest in general terms, and if this making of heirs to legacies had followed in the same deed on the original legacies, there would I think be great plausibility in the suggestion that the intention must be held to be the same as in the original bequest. But here the testator was by a separate deed making an entirely new arrangement, in view of an expected deficiency in his estate, giving a new gift in lieu of what he was cancelling, and it is according to the sound reading of such a bequest to look for conditions favourable to the legatee and against the estate to the words of the bequest itself, and not to inferences to be drawn from the favourable conditions under which by a previous deed the same gift had been given to another. But even if this latter were proper to be done, in such a case it could only be done fairly if all parts of the testamentary deeds which might bear upon the question of intention were considered also. And in this case we find that the question of legacy-duty was considered and specifically dealt with by the testator in the immediately preceding codicil, in which he is doing a similar act to that which he does in the last codicil. An annuity which he left to one legatee, who predeceased him, he bequeathed to another legatee, and in that particular case he provided that the legacy—which was also in the form of an annuity—should be free of legacy-duty. He having not so expressed himself in regard to the legacies in question, I am unable to hold that the trustees are entitled to free the legatees of legacy-duty.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur.

LORD TRAYNER.—There is some difficulty perhaps connected with the question, whether the annuitants who succeed to annuities originally paid "free of legacy-duty," are entitled to receive the annuities they succeed to on the same terms. But I think the safer view is to hold that no annuity is to be paid "free of legacy-duty" except where this is distinctly and in terms provided. It supports this view to note that in one case where the testator provides for the annuitant succeeding to an annuity originally provided to another person he distinctly states that the annuitant so succeeding shall receive that succession free of duty. Having so provided in one case, the presumption is that he did not intend the same benefit to be conferred in other cases where he did not so provide.

LORD MONCREIFF.—The next question is whether the annuities given by the supplementary will to certain parties who are substituted to the original annuitants should be paid free of legacy-duty. I am of opinion that they should not, for the reasons that have already been stated.

THE finding of the Court with regard to the question here reported was "(2) That the legacy or succession duties upon the annuities of £50 bequeathed by the testator to his brother Alexander Urquhart and his sisters Helen and Isabella respectively, which became payable on the succession thereto of Alexander Reid Urquhart, Frank Urquhart, Agnes Urquhart or Tamson, and Elspeth Jane Urquhart or Hobart, and which will hereafter become payable on the succession of the survivors and survivor of them, and also upon the annuities of £10 bequeathed by the testator to Margaret Cormie and Alexander Macintosh respectively, which became payable on the succession thereto of Ann Reid, and on the annuity of £10 bequeathed by the testator to Penuel Falconer, which may become payable upon the succession thereto of Ann Reid, fall to be paid by the parties respectively succeeding to said annuities."

JESSIE BUCHANAN raised an action of filiation and aliment in the Sheriff Court of Fifeshire against John Finlayson, butcher in Kincardine-on-Forth, on the ground that he was the father of her illegitimate child, which was born on 13th February 1900.

The pursuer averred a continuous course of connection during the period from December 1898 till August 1899, and in particular on the 22d May 1899.

I admit that I was with you on the Fair night [11th August 1899], which was the first and only time that I had connection with you, as you also state in the letter which I received from you last month, which I have in my possession. You will see from the above it is useless for you to try and make me the father of it, as I now know of others whom you have been in company with, and I therefore deny all liability."

I have always wanted a chance this last fortnight to explain everything to you, but you never looked near hand me. So I came away on Saturday and never said where I was going, so I don't know what they are thinking, but believe me, dear John, I never will tell them; but you must know, John, as well as I can tell you, I never took up with any other one, and I blame the Fair night for it, because it was just after that I was afraid what was going to be. I know you will be in a state, but how do you think I am? for I think I will lose my senses. I am staying with my cousin just now. . . . I will not go home for certain till everything is over; but if I had seen you yourself I could have explained things better, for I'm sure I hardly know what to write; but, John, if you would only write me a few lines and say you forgive me. It will always help to cheer me on a bit. I will stay here for a few days longer; and about them at home I'm sure I don't know what to do. . . . Oh, John, if this had never happened; but it can't be helped now, more's the pity. But, John, you might write me a few lines; you don't know what they would be to me; and I don't think I need write any more, for I'm sure I don't know what to write, but surely, John, you think more of me than cast me off when it has come to this, for I'm sure nobody will ever be what you are to me.—From your sincere friend, JESSIE BUCHANAN."

understanding that the child of which the pursuer was pregnant was the result of what took place on 11th August 1899, he accepted responsibility, and made arrangements for the confinement of the pursuer on this footing.

Proof was led, in which the defender deponed that the one and only time of connection was the Fair night in August. Apart from pursuer's evidence, there was evidence of opportunity at the date of conception, but not of opportunity peculiar to the parties, or such as was not open to any other man residing in the same town, or of familiarity from which intercourse might have been inferred apart from the admission which the defender made. Of the two men with whom the defender alleged the pursuer had connection at the date of conception, both denied it, one of them, however, deponing that he had connection with the pursuer two years previously. The pursuer denied connection at any time with either. The nature of the evidence generally sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Court.

On 4th June the Sheriff-substitute (Gillespie) assoilzied the defender,* and the pursuer appealed to the interim Sheriff (Chisholm)

* "NOTE.—The child was born on 13th February 1900. The pursuer avers a course of connection from December 1898 to August 1899, and among other occasions 'on or about the 22d May 1899.'

"The defender admits having had connection with the pursuer on the night of Kincardine Fair, 11th August 1899, but he explains that this was the first and only time.

"Now, it is settled in actions of filiation, that when the man admits connection, but at a time too near the birth to result in the birth of a full-grown child, the admission may be sufficient confirmation of the woman's statement that connection took place at a time corresponding with the ordinary period of gestation, if similar opportunities existed at that time. But the admission is not necessarily sufficient confirmation.

"In the present case there is nothing in the parole evidence to make it improbable that connection took place in May, though there is no direct evidence in support of it. The parties had the same opportunities which they admittedly took advantage of on 11th August.

"There was nothing in the manner of either party to lead me to give a decided preference to one over the other as regards credibility. Each gave evidence in a fairly consistent way, and neither is materially contradicted except by the other. . . .

"The decision of the case largely depends on the pursuer's letter to the defender (No. 5 of process), in which she says, 'You must know John, as well as I can tell you, I never took up with any other one, and I blame the Fair night for it, because it was just after that I was afraid what was going to be.' While it is a fair observation that the letter indicates terms of closer intimacy and affection than the defender admits, it contains nothing which to my mind suggests that there had been a course of illicit connection previous to the 'Fair day,' though, with the explanations which the pursuer has given, there is nothing necessarily inconsistent with there having been such a course of connection.

"On the whole, I cannot but regard the letter as raising some difficulty in the way of accepting the pursuer's statements as to previous connection without more corroboration than she has been able to bring.

"It is in the defender's favour so far, that on the understanding that the pursuer's pregnancy was due to connection on the 'Fair' night, he accepted the legal responsibility. But he has not improved his case by putting on record an averment that two other men named had connection with her in or about the month of May 1899, which has completely broken down."

who, on 14th July, adhered to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute.*

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—There having been admitted connection during the period of pregnancy, that, coupled with evidence of opportunity at the date of conception, and the absence of evidence of connection with other men at that date, was sufficient corroboration of the pursuer's oath that there was connection at the date of conception.[1]

Argued for the defender;—The pursuer must prove her case, and evidence in filiation cases must be treated just as in any other kind of case depending on disputed fact.[2] There was no doubt here evidence of opportunity, but none of any familiarity from which per se impropriety might be inferred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is in some respects a peculiar one. There is no evidence whatever, except the evidence of the defender himself, from which anything suggestive of corroboration of the pursuer's testimony can be drawn. The circumstances spoken to as regards the social intercourse between the pursuer and the defender are all of the most ordinary character, having regard to their rank in life, and nothing of the nature of intimacy, familiarity, or clandestinity is proved to have taken place at or near the time of conception.

But it is maintained that, as the defender admits, and all along has admitted, that he had connection with the pursuer on the Fair night in August, and by his conduct indicated his intention to meet his honourable obligations on the birth of the child on the assumption that it was then

* "NOTE.—The defender admits that he had connection with the pursuer on the 'Fair night,' i.e., on 11th August 1899, but he states that the 11th August was the first and only occasion on which he had such connection. It may, I think, be said fairly to be made out by the proof that practically similar opportunities of connection existed at the time of conception (in May 1899), and pursuer states that connection with defender occurred in May. In the absence of anything, other than defender's evidence, impugning pursuer's statements, I should have been disposed to apply what Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis, in Ross v. Fraser (1 Macph. 783), called 'a general rule in judging of evidence in such cases, founded on ordinary experience and common sense,' and to hold that (1) defender's admission of connection within the period of gestation, (2) proof of similar opportunity at the time of conception, and (3) pursuer's deposition on oath that connection took place at that time, are together sufficient to make out that the defender is the father of the child. But it seems to me that the letter (No. 5 of process), written by pursuer to defender in the beginning of January 1900, contradicts the pursuer's evidence as to connection having occurred before the 'Fair night,' 11th August 1900. The question of construction is a narrow one. But, on the whole, I think that the most reasonable interpretation of the passage quoted in the Sheriff-substitute's note is that the pursuer there admits that connection between her and the defender took place for the first time on 11th August 1899."

conceived, which was the pursuer's own statement in her letter to him, if the pursuer can prove that there was opportunity at the period corresponding to the birth, she has proved her case. This is maintained on the authority of two cases cited, in which some observations tending to support it are to be found. I confess that I find myself unable to hold that a confession of carnal intercourse at a period months after the actual time of conception constitutes in any sense a corroboration of a pursuer's statement of previous connection, requiring only that there be proof of previous opportunity about the time of conception to complete the chain of evidence, so that a defender cannot escape from it. I am far from saying that such a confession, if it fixes a date near the date of possible conception, may not be considered. If it is only a question whether the connection was in one month, when it probably was in the next month, then any inference deducible from a statement made by the defender may be strong. I also do not say that even where the date to which the confession relates may be many months from that of conception, the confession may not be an element for consideration along with other evidence, such as evidence of familiarity or clandestinity at the earlier period, but I cannot assent to the doctrine that it is sufficient of itself, coupled with mere proof of opportunity, to justify a decision that a pursuer's case has been proved.

I do not enter upon the question whether the pursuer's letter to the defender indicates a suggestion that there had been—according to the position she was then taking up—more acts of connection than one, for that letter cannot be looked upon as anything more than part of her own statement, which whatever it may have meant cannot be accepted as decisive if there is no corroboration. In my opinion, the case of an acknowledgment of connection by a defender before the time when conception could have taken place, and the case of connection at a period beyond the time when it must have taken place, are very different as regards their cogency. If a man has admittedly had connection with a woman, and is afterwards having meetings with her in circumstances in which connection could take place again, there is a considerable presumption from the fact of his continuing to meet with the same woman in such circumstances that the opportunity will be again taken advantage of. But I can see no sound reason for drawing back a presumption from one admitted act to there having been acts of a similar kind at an earlier period, unless there be evidence inferring improper familiarity of conduct. In the former case, it is quite reasonable to answer the question quo animo were the subsequent meetings, by saying there is strong presumption that intercourse would continue; in the latter the act confessed cannot be founded on to judge of the animus of what occurred months before. The distinction is, to my mind, very obvious, and it has a very important bearing in this case. I think the difference may be illustrated in the case of certain crimes, such as reset, where the law allows previous convictions to be founded on as corroborative proof. Where a person has been proved by his own confession, or by other evidence, to have been guilty of reset, that affords presumptive evidence in aid of proof that he has on a subsequent occasion committed the same offence. But it would be a totally different thing, and in no way just, to hold that evidence of a present act of reset afforded presumptive evidence in favour of an accusation of reset said to have occurred a long time before. It is principally because of the probability of one lapse from proper conduct leading to others when opportunity arises that any presumption is derived from previous lapses having been established.

No. 40.

Buchanan v. Finlayson.

There is further certain evidence in this case which tends to throw doubt on the pursuer's testimony—evidence that she had previously had connection with another man. She denies this, but it is difficult to throw it out of view that there is this sharp contradiction of her evidence in considering whether it is safe to proceed upon it to give decree, unless it is substantially corroborated. Also in her evidence there are some very vile suggestions made in regard to the defender's conduct otherwise, which were in no way followed up, and about which no questions were put to the defender.

In the whole circumstances, I hold that the pursuer has failed to bring any corroboration of her statement that there was connection with the defender at the time of conception, and that the Sheriffs were right in refusing to grant decree.

LORD TRAYNER.—After considering the argument addressed to us, and reading the proof more than once, I have come to the conclusion that the interlocutors appealed against are well founded, and ought to be affirmed.

If it were not for the defender's admission that he had connection with the pursuer in the month of August 1899, I think there could have been no hesitation in holding that the pursuer had failed to prove her case. The pursuer avers that she and the defender began to keep company in December 1898; that in that month the defender had carnal intercourse with her, that after this the intercourse was frequently repeated, and "was kept up during the months of May, June, July, and August 1899." It is somewhat remarkable that if the parties were "keeping company" all that time there should not be a single witness to speak to this fact except the pursuer herself. None of her relatives, acquaintances, or neighbours prove the "keeping company," of which they could scarcely have been ignorant had it been going on. It is also important to notice that while the pursuer speaks to an intercourse which for months had been frequent and continuous, yet there is no proof whatever of the slightest familiarity passing between the parties, nor of their ever having been seen in any place or in any position suggestive of the intimacy which is said to have existed. I repeat that but for the defender's admission the pursuer's case could not have been maintained.

Now, that admission is, that in the month of August 1899 the parties had intercourse. But the child in question, born in February 1900, could not be the result of that connection, and the only way in which the pursuer makes the defender's admission available as evidence of his paternity of the child in question is by adding to the admission given what she represents as a presumption, that from intercourse admittedly had in August, there may be inferred intercourse at an earlier date, if at that earlier date there was opportunity. For the position which the pursuer thus takes up, there is some show of authority in the opinions expressed in the cases of Law- son[1] and Ross,[2] which were cited to us. But in the latter case the Lord Justice-Clerk (while stating his concurrence with what Lord Benholme had said in Lawson's case[1]) said that the presumption was not a rule of law but "merely a general rule in judging of evidence in such cases founded on ordinary experience and common sense." To this, as a general rule, I must say that I cannot assent. Ordinary experience has no doubt shewn that intercourse once commenced will most probably be repeated if opportunity for it is afforded, but ordinary experience does not shew that intercourse in one month has probably been had six months before. Everything must have a beginning, and there is nothing in the commission of an offence or impropriety admitted to have taken place at one date to suggest that such impropriety had been committed at any previous date. I take no exception to the judgment in either of the cases cited, because in each of them there were facts proved from which intercourse might have been inferred apart from the admission which the defender made. That admission of subsequent intercourse threw light upon and gave significance to facts established by evidence to have occurred at an earlier date. But in this case no anterior facts are proved which have any bearing upon the question at issue. Still, if we apply to this case what has been termed the "general rule," as I have given it from the case of Ross,[2] one of the conditions of its application is that at the earlier (that is, the inferred) date there should be opportunity for illicit intercourse. I take that to mean, such opportunity as was peculiar to the parties—not opportunity such as was common to every man and woman in the same town or village. There was no such opportunity here, so far as the proof shews. Every young man in the town had as much opportunity as the defender of meeting with the pursuer, and receiving her favours if she was disposed to bestow them.

But there is a point in the case which goes far, in my opinion, to corroborate the defender's story. When the pursuer in January 1900 communicated her condition to the defender, and said that she blamed "the Fair night for it" (that being the occasion of the admitted connection), he made arrangements for acknowledging the pursuer's expected child as his, and providing for it, and the pursuer's accouchement. If he had been disposed to deny all connection with the pursuer I see nothing to have hindered him doing so, but he admitted "the Fair night," and was prepared to meet any obligation or duty which the proceedings of that night might impose upon him. When, however, he learned that the child was born in February, and could not be the result of what took place on the Fair night, he quite naturally declined an obligation which he was sure was not his. That accounts for the tone of his letter of 16th February 1900. He was resenting what he considered as an injustice—blaming him for a child which was not his, and a child which could not be the result of what took place in August, which could not, in the pursuer's own language, be "blamed" on the Fair night. I think the defender's readiness to be responsible for anything that could be "blamed on the Fair night" goes a good way to support his statement that that was the only occasion on which anything took place which might account, so far as he was concerned, for the pursuer's pregnancy.

No. 40.

Dec. 8, 1900. Buchanan v. Finlayson.

There is just one other point to notice. The Sheriff-substitute says that the defender has not improved his case by putting on record a statement that two men, whom he named, had had connection with pursuer in or about May 1899, which had "completely broken down." I agree that the defender has not proved that either of the persons named had connection with the pursuer in May 1899. But the statement was not so reckless as many of the same kind which we have seen. M'Nee admits having had connection with pursuer two years before. The pursuer denies this, but M'Nee had no interest to say what was false, the pursuer had an interest to deny this statement. I believe M'Nee, for there is no reason suggested why he should not be believed. As to Campbell he admits having said that he might get blamed for the pursuer's child. The defender hearing this might very well suppose that Campbell had some reason for saying so—Campbell now says he spoke in joke, but I accept that explanation given in the witness-box with some hesitation. All, however, that I infer from the evidence of M'Nee and Campbell is that the defender had some foundation for what he said—that it was not a mere invention of his own. That he has failed to prove a statement made by him, does not prove any statements made by the pursuer.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I have come to a different conclusion. This case besides raising questions of some difficulty upon the proof, also raises a question of general importance, viz.: as to the kind and amount of evidence that is required to establish previous opportunity where the defender admits connection with the pursuer during the period of gestation at a date which will not account for the birth of the child. And as the judgment proposed seems to run counter to previous decisions I shall state my views in some detail.

Before considering the facts of the present case, I think it will be convenient to state what is my understanding of the law and practice as to this matter. Lord Fraser in his work on Parent and Child, 2d ed. p. 138, after giving the rules relative to the older law of semiplena probatio and oath in supplement says: "The Act allowing parties to a suit to be examined as witnesses has superseded though not abolished the rules." Both the pursuer and defender may be examined and cross-examined as witnesses in the cause, and each case must be determined on the evidence as a whole; but from the very nature of such cases the evidence available and the conclusions to be drawn from it remain very much the same.

Lord Benholme thus states the effect of the alteration in practice effected by the Evidence Act, 1853, in Ross v. Fraser [1]:—"It appears to me that the rule of law, or rather the view of the evidence, on which the decision of this case ought to rest, is one which we have adopted from our former practice. The rule is in substance the same, although it is exemplified under different circumstances, the difference being this, that formerly the pursuer's deposition was not competent at all, until after a semiplena probatio, which she was allowed to supplement. And then if her oath was given without inconsistencies or contradictions, that was held sufficient to make out the case. We still adhere to the same rule substantially, viz., that where intercourse is admitted by the defender, though denied at the period of conception, an unsuspicious deposition of the pursuer will be sufficient to make out the case. I think that is the same rule in substance, although in practice we adopt it in somewhat different circumstances. There may be circumstances in which the pursuer's evidence is not worthy of credit, in which case her case will fail."

[1] 1 Macph. 783, 786.

No. 40.

Dec. 8, 1900. Buchanan v. Finlayson.

I may observe in this place that this statement of the law is not complete, because Lord Benholme does not make any mention of proof of opportunity at the date of conception; but this, I think, is through inadvertence, because in the earlier case of Lawson v. Eddie,[1] the same Judge said:—"Although it is true that in cases of filiation no one case can form a decisive precedent for another, yet I think our practice has proceeded on this general rule, that if the defender admits connection within the period of gestation, and if in addition to this it is proved that he had opportunity of connection at or about the time of conception, the pursuer's oath as to connection at that time will require little or no additional corroboration."

Reverting again to the case of Ross v. Fraser,[2] Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis says:—"I am not disposed to represent that presumption as a rule of law. . . . It is merely a general rule in judging of evidence in such cases founded on ordinary experience and common sense; and I think that view of the law could not be better stated than it is by Lord Benholme in the case of Lawson"[1]—that is in the passage which I have just quoted. The Lord Justice-Clerk proceeds thus:—"I go fully that length, and quite agree that if in such case the statement of the pursuer on oath be worthy of credit and not liable to be impugned on ground of contradictions on serious points, then the fact of connection having taken place between the parties within the period of gestation may be sufficient corroboration of such evidence." It is to be observed that here the Lord Justice-Clerk also does not make any mention of opportunity; but this omission, I think, is also inadvertent, because his Lordship approved of Lord Benholme's statement in Lawson v. Eddie,[1] which expressly mentions opportunity of connection at or about the time of conception.

The opinions thus expressed are indorsed in the opinions of other learned Judges in cases which have occurred since the Act of 1853. Therefore, as to the weight to be attached to an admission by a defender in such an action of connection at a time which will not account for the birth of the child, the decisions prior to 1853 may be referred to with advantage, and differ little in weight from subsequent decisions.

Of the cases prior to 1853, by far the most apposite are the three cases reported in Hume's Dec., pp. 32 and 33. In the first case, Brown v. Smith, decided 12th Dec. 1799, the facts were, that there was proof of great familiarity between the pursuer and defender in the end of harvest 1795. The child was not born sooner than 12th October 1796, and apparently there was no direct evidence of familiarity between the parties in the interval. But the pursuer was the defender's domestic servant, and remained in his service till Whitsunday 1796; and the Court, holding [1] 23 D. 880. [2] 1 Macph. 785.

No. 40.

Dec. 8, 1900.
Buchanan v. Finlayson.

that there was opportunity, admitted the woman to her oath in supplement.

In the next case, Leckie v. Lindsay, decided February 1810, the defender admitted intercourse with his father's servant down to but not later than a year before her delivery. But they both continued to live in the same house till within nine months of the birth of the child, and without any other evidence, the pursuer was allowed her oath in supplement.

The third case, Wightman v. Tomlinson, 17th November 1807, is still more closely in point. The defender admitted connection nearly twelve months before the birth of the child. The only evidence of subsequent opportunity was that the parties lived in the same village. The case was fully debated; the Commissary admitted the woman to the benefit of her oath in supplement. The Lord Ordinary altered, but the Court confirmed, the Commissary's interlocutor.

I may also refer to the case of Robertson v. Petrie.[1]

As to the cases after the Act of 1853, I may refer to Lawson v. Eddie,[2] There the defender admitted connection six months before the birth of the child, but denied prior connection; but the Court held that there being evidence of previous opportunity, the pursuer's case was proved by her oath as a witness.

Then came the case of Ross v. Fraser.[3] The evidence of familiarities at the time of conception was stronger, no doubt, than here; but the law laid down did not turn on that.

In M'Donald v. Glass,[4] the child was born on 28th November 1882. The defender, who was a son of the pursuer's master, swore that he never had connection with the pursuer before April 1882, but admitted connection on several occasions from that time onward. There was no proof of previous opportunity except the fact that they lived in the same house; but it was held that the pursuer's case was made out.

The decisions prior to 1853 and those since that date establish this—that if connection is admitted within the period of gestation, and the woman swears to acts which would account for the birth of the child, proof of opportunity about the date of conception will in general be sufficient to complete the pursuer's proof. The proof of opportunity need not, although it often does, include proof of familiarities; otherwise the defender's admission would be unnecessary. It is enough if it is shewn that at the time of conception the parties had the same opportunities of meeting as that which was admittedly taken advantage of.

Such evidence is at least as strong as that which is constantly accepted as sufficient in cases in which the defender denies connection altogether, and the only evidence against him, except that of the pursuer, is circumstantial; usually evidence, and sometimes very slight evidence, of familiarities or suspicious circumstances. In such cases there is no certainty that the defender ever had connection with the pursuer; while the same cannot be said when he admits connection, although he antedates or postdates it to suit his defence.

To come now to the facts of the present case. The Sheriffs have decided against the pursuer solely on account of a passage in a letter which she wrote to the defender in January 1900, which they construe as an admission by her that she only had connection with the defender on one occasion, viz., the "Fair night" of 11th August 1899. I think they are mistaken in this, and right in what was evidently their view of the evidence apart from the letter.

The letter (to which the defender returned no answer, because the letter No. 10 of process was no answer) strikes me as creditable to the pursuer; it is genuine and sincere, and indicates a much greater degree of intimacy than the defender is willing to admit. The pursuer when she wrote it must have honestly believed that her condition was due to the occurrence on 11th August, otherwise she would not have given herself away by fixing an impossible date.

The passage in dispute is this:—"But you must know, John, as well as I can tell you, I never took up with any other one, and I blame the 'Fair night' for it, because it was just after that I was afraid what was going to be."

Now, if there had been only one act of connection with the defender, and (as the pursuer states in the letter) none with any other man, there was no need to give or hint at reasons for selecting the 'Fair night' as the date of conception. The pursuer might have referred to the 'Fair night'; but it would only have been to remind the defender of what he had done to her then. The pursuer states more particularly in her evidence what those reasons were. I need not read them. They could not safely be put into a letter; but the passage, however elliptical, must have been quite intelligible to the person to whom it was addressed if the pursuer is right. In the least favourable view for the pursuer the letter will bear her construction equally well.

Therefore I regard the letter not as telling against the pursuer, but in her favour.

It is said as against the pursuer's credibility that she denied being in the family way in November 1899. Strangely enough the defender denies that he ever asked the pursuer as to her condition or that she denied it. The denial which the pursuer admits tells so far against her. At the same time I do not attach much importance to it, because it is a curious feature in these cases that the first intimation the man often gets of the woman's condition, especially when it is a first child, is after or shortly before the birth.

To turn now to the defender's own evidence. It has been stated as to his credit that when he thought the child was begotten on 11th August he was willing to admit paternity. At first I was disposed to attach a good deal of importance to the fact. But I find in the defender's evidence a statement as to the occurrences of that night which indicates pretty clearly that it would have been useless for him to deny the occurrence; because his companion and the witness Bessy Sneddon could have proved that he left the Fair in company with the pursuer at a late hour.

It is not to the credit of the defender that he has attempted, unsuccessfully, to blacken the pursuer's character by alleging that at or about the time of conception she had connection with two other men, Robert M'Nee and John Campbell. He endeavoured to get these men to swear that they had connection with the pursuer about that time. The pursuer's procurator boldly put them both in the box, with the result that Campbell denied ever having had connection with the pursuer; and M'Nee, while he alleged that he had connection with her, said it occurred two years before. This is emphatically denied by the pursuer. Thus the defender's attempt failed, and this necessarily affects the weight to be given to his evidence.

Thus, so far, if I am right, we have the pursuer's evidence not shaken in any material respect, and the defender's admission of connection in August 1899; and it only remains to consider whether there is sufficient proof of opportunity at the time when the child must have been conceived. I have already indicated my views, formed upon the authorities, as to the kind of evidence that is required. If it is necessary that there should be evidence of familiarities the pursuer must fail, because no such familiarities are proved prior to August. But I am of opinion that such evidence is not necessary. The Sheriff-substitute thus states his view of the evidence on this point. "In the present case there is nothing in the parole evidence to make it improbable that connection took place in May, though there is no direct evidence in support of it. The parties had the same opportunities which they admittedly took advantage of on 11th August." These words concisely express my view of the evidence. It is proved that the defender knew the pursuer intimately; indeed, he says himself that he has known her all his life. In the end of 1898 and beginning of 1899 he was in the habit of meeting her at dances and walking home with her from them; he frequently called at her father's house, to which he went with his van on business, or ostensibly to call upon her brother. Moreover, it is plain that the pursuer, unfortunately for herself, was allowed to go about unattended, and to be out later at night than was perhaps safe for her. Now, all this taken by itself was quite consistent with innocence. But the question is not whether it is proved that anything improper occurred on these occasions, but whether the pursuer and the defender had opportunities of connection if they chose to avail themselves of them. Although the case is narrow, I think that it is proved that they had. Considerable reflected light is thrown by the evidence of what took place on the 'Fair night.' There is no trace whatever in the evidence either of the pursuer or the defender of that being the first occasion. There would be nothing in this if the pursuer were proved to be the abandoned woman that the defender has unsuccessfully tried to prove her to be. But holding that not to be her character, it is a reasonable conclusion that that was not the first time that connection took place between the pursuer and the defender.

The defender would have us believe that this girl, with whom he says that he was not on intimate or affectionate terms, yielded herself to him without any previous courtship or course of seduction. I do not believe him. I believe that what took place on 11th August 1899 was merely a continuation of an improper intimacy of some duration.

I am therefore of opinion that judgment should be for the pursuer.

Cowie & Son v. Commissioners of Dufftown.

Burgh—Police—Drainage—Distillery—Proof—Onus—Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. 75), sec. 7.—The Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, sec. 7, enacts,—"Every sanitary or other local authority having sewers under their control shall give facilities for enabling manufacturers within their district to carry the liquids proceeding from their factories . . . into such sewers; provided that this section shall not extend to compel any sanitary or other local authority to admit into their sewers any liquid which would prejudicially affect . . . the disposal by sale, application to land, or otherwise, of the sewage matter conveyed along such sewers. . . ."

A distiller, who was liable in drainage assessment, presented a petition under the above quoted section against the local authority of the district for a decree ordaining them to allow him to carry the liquid refuse from his distillery into the defenders' sewers. The defenders pleaded that the liquid would prejudicially affect the disposal of the sewage matter conveyed by their drains.

After a proof the Court held that the liquid refuse was in fact of such a character that, if received into the defenders' sewers without treatment, it would prejudicially affect the disposal of the sewage, and that there was no obligation on the defenders themselves so to treat the liquid as to render it innocuous, or to shew that it was impossible to do so, and refused the petition.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff.

GEORGE COWIE AND SON were the owners and occupiers of the Mortlach Distillery in the county of Banff. The distillery was situated within the district of which the Commissioners of the burgh of Dufftown were the local authority, and Cowie & Son paid assessments to them for sewers and drainage.

On 13th April 1898 Cowie & Son wrote to the Commissioners of Dufftown requesting that, in terms of section 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. 75),* the Local Authority would afford Cowie & Son facilities for causing the liquid refuse from the Mortlach Distillery to be carried into the commissioners' sewers. The commissioners having declined to grant the facilities asked, on the ground, inter alia, that the introduction of the liquid refuse from the distillery would prejudicially affect the disposal of the sewage matter, Cowie & Son raised an action against the Commissioners of Dufftown in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff, at Banff, praying the Court "to grant a decree against the above-named defenders decerning and ordaining them to give facilities to the pursuers for enabling the pursuers to carry the liquids proceeding from their said Mortlach Distillery into the sewers under the control of the defenders, . . . or otherwise, to give to the pursuers such facilities for the purpose aforesaid in terms of section 7 of the said Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, and on such terms and conditions as to the Court may seem proper. . . ."

The defenders stated that their sewer was quite unable to carry off the discharge from the pursuers' distillery, and that the discharge would be injurious to their pipes and to the public health.

The defenders further stated that they had been in use to discharge the ordinary sewage of the town direct into the River Fiddich, but that they had been recently called upon by the County Council of Banffshire to make immediate provision for disposing of said sewage; that they had been advised by an engineer that the only practical way in which they could dispose of the sewage was by irrigation; that they proposed at once to proceed with the scheme thus recommended by the engineer; but that the introduction of the pursuers' sewage into their sewer would render this scheme quite impracticable.

"The pursuers' sewage would further, if introduced into the defenders' sewer, prejudicially affect the disposal by sale, application to land, or otherwise, of the sewage matter, in respect that the ingredients contained in the refuse from said distillery are of such a virulent caustic nature that the refuse would burn up and destroy all vegetable life in land to which it was applied, even though admixed with other sewage."

The defenders also referred to section 233 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 55),* and section 116 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. c. 38).†

Such owners and occupiers shall construct pools or reservoirs, as near their works as possible, for receiving and depositing such refuse and other substances. Cowie & Son v. Commissioners of Dufftown.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having wrongfully refused to give to the pursuers the facilities to which they are entitled under section 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, the pursuers are entitled to decree allowing them to carry the liquids from their said distillery into the defenders' sewers, and to make the necessary communication for that purpose. (2) Alternatively, and in any event, the pursuers are entitled to facilities for discharging the said liquids into the defenders' sewers, upon their adopting such steps as the Court may think necessary in order to comply with the provisions of the said statute.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The discharge from the pursuers' distillery being of an offensive character, and calculated to interfere with the free flow of sewage in the sewer, and being otherwise injurious to the sewer and dangerous to the health of those living in the vicinity, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (3) The pursuers' sewage being of such a character as would, if introduced into the defenders' sewer, prejudicially affect the disposal of the sewage matter, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

Proof was led in the Sheriff Court. The evidence sufficiently appears from the opinions and interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and of the Court.

On 28th July 1899 the Sheriff-substitute (Grant) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds in fact—subject to regulations to be approved of by the Court (a) to secure the settling and cooling of that part of the liquid effluent of the pursuers' distillery known as burnt ale; (b) to secure a proper mixture at a suitable temperature of all the different parts of the said liquid effluent before discharge into the defenders' sewer; (c) to secure a right to the defenders to exclude for a period not exceeding one hour at a time the whole of the pursuers' liquid effluent in times of excessive rain, or other cause of an excessive discharge of surface water by the defenders' said sewer—that the said liquid effluents proceeding from the pursuers' Mortlach Distillery will not prejudicially affect the defenders' sewers, or the disposal by sale, application to land, or otherwise, of the sewage matter conveyed along said sewers, and will not from its temperature or otherwise be injurious in a sanitary point of view: Further finds in fact that the said sewer is sufficient for the requirements of the district, including the discharge of the liquid effluents from the pursuers' Mortlach Distillery; and in law that the defenders, as local authority of the burgh of Dufftown, are bound to give facilities to the pursuers to carry the liquid proceeding from their said Mortlach Distillery into the sewers under the control of the defenders: Therefore, before further procedure, appoints the defenders to lodge in process draft regulations in terms aforesaid within two months from this date, and continues the cause, and grants leave to appeal." *

means for rendering the same inoffensive or innocuous before discharging it into any river, stream, ditch, sewer, or other channel."

* "OPINION.—. . . The defenders did not maintain that occasional and intermittent application of burnt ale might not be sometimes beneficial, but they say that from its physical properties it is sure to choke the surface of the soil if continuously applied, causing inevitably thereby [by the growth and decay of the characteristic fungus] a state of matters prejudicial to health on a small ordinary irrigation farm; and that to ask them to acquire an extent of land sufficient to allow of disposal by occasional and Thereafter the Sheriff-substitute approved of certain regulations, and ordained the defenders to give facilities to the pursuers to carry the waste liquids from their Mortlach Distillery (but subject always to the regulations and relative plans) into the sewers under the control of the defenders.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—The discharge from the distillery was in fact of such a noxious character that if the defenders were compelled to receive it, the sewage farm in contemplation would be impossible, and the disposal of the ordinary burgh sewage would be very materially prejudiced. The Sheriff-substitute had confused or rather subverted the issue. He was entirely wrong in putting on the defenders the onus either of themselves so treating the refuse as to render it innocuous, or at least shewing that it was impossible so to render it. There was no warrant either in the Act or at common law for laying such a burden on the local authority. It was clear that the refuse from the distillery when it was presented to the sewers—and that was the time when it fell to be examined—was of the most pernicious character. Again, the question was not a merely quantitative one, and it was no answer to say that by adding a few acres to the sewage farm the evil complained of would be overcome. That was not established by the proof to be an effective remedy. The evidence was the other way. It was clear from the proof that the methods hitherto attempted for the purification of distillery refuse had been failures. Even if there had been an effectual mode of purification, it was for the pursuers, not the defenders, to give intermittent application would be an outrageously unreasonable demand. They say that it amounts on the part of the pursuers to an attempt to put upon them the burden of solving a hitherto insoluble problem, videlicet, the safe and economical disposal of distillery refuse, and they point to the state of matters disclosed in the evidence taken in the recent case of Seafield and Others v. Kemp, reported in 1 Fraser, 402. To that last argument I fear the true answer is, that the whole point in this case is to ascertain on whose shoulders that burden is to fall: and that it is equally natural for the pursuers to seek to relieve themselves of it, as it is for the defenders to try and keep it off themselves. I certainly think the defenders have succeeded in shewing that hitherto no local authority in Scotland (excluding those who have facilities for putting distillery refuse into the sea) has succeeded in disposing of it by purification. But where they fail is in not satisfying me that it is scientifically impossible to purify it, seeing that from its inherent nature it is not destructive, but may be positively beneficial to land; or that the difficulties they find in the solution of the problem are greater than those that have been successfully surmounted in England, when dealing with far more virulent trade effluents, for which I refer to the evidence of Mr Thudichum. The defenders do not yet appear to have made any real attempt to ascertain how they might surmount that difficulty; in giving instructions to their engineer, Mr Gordon, to prepare a sewage scheme they allowed him to proceed without providing for the distillery effluent at all. I do not say that there is positively no limit to the extra expense, or to the extra land they must be prepared to take, to meet the pursuers' requirements, but it is obviously no discharge of their obligation to exclude the question of taking any. On the whole, therefore, they have failed to satisfy me that the problem is insoluble. Reading the striking evidence of Mr Thudichum, the pursuers' expert, I go further, and say that I think, by facing their obligation and availing themselves of the latest practical application of sewage purification schemes, that they will find it soluble after all. . . ."

effect to it. In no event were the defenders either entitled or bound to experiment. The case of Guthrie[1] did not apply. The decision in it proceeded on the assumption that the traders' effluent was in an innocuous condition when put into the drains.

Argued for the respondents;—The defenders were bound both at common law and under the Act to provide a sufficient drainage system for the burgh, and the pursuers were within the burgh. Section 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act regulated the way in which the local authority were to exercise their powers and perform their duties. The onus was on them to shew that they were entitled to refuse the facilities requested, and they had not discharged that onus. To enable them to do so, they would have to shew that the admixture of the refuse from the distillery would render the disposal of the ordinary sewage practically impossible. That followed from the Brechin case.[2] The evidence was entirely the other way. An acre or two additional of land would solve the difficulty. The question here was just as in the Brechin case[2] a quantitative one. There was nothing in the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act to suggest that any obligation was laid on traders of purifying the discharges from their works as a condition of their getting the benefit of the public sewers. That was in marked contrast to section 233 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. Even by that Act injury to the pipes and to the public health were the only results which had to be provided against, and it was not now pretended by the defenders that either the pipes or the public health would suffer by the pursuers getting the facilities craved. The scientific evidence established that distillery refuse could be so treated as to render it innocuous, and that so treated it could be disposed of just like the ordinary sewage. The matter was susceptible of equitable regulation, and there was no reason for upsetting the scheme which had been sanctioned by the Sheriff-substitute.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Dufftown is a police burgh with a population of about 1800, and the defenders are the Commissioners of it. The defenders in 1881 established a sewerage system in the burgh, consisting of glazed fireclay spigot and faucet pipes, by which the sewage was discharged into the River Fiddich. In consequence of the County Council having complained of the discharge of the sewage into the Fiddich, the defenders consulted Mr George Gordon, C.E., and he advised that the sewage should be disposed of by filtration and irrigation. The defenders state that they intend to act upon his advice.

The pursuers are distillers carrying on business at Mortlach Distillery, which is situated in the burgh of Dufftown. On 13th April 1898 the pursuers wrote to the defenders' clerk intimating that they intended to cause the liquid refuse proceeding from their distillery to be carried into the sewers belonging to the defenders, and requesting that, in terms of section 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, the defenders would afford them facilities for doing so. The pursuers stated in their letter that they were prepared to comply with any regulations of the defenders in regard to the mode in which the communication between their drains and those of the defenders should be made. On 28th April 1898 the defenders resolved, as the burgh sewer was sufficient only for the requirements of the district, and as the introduction of the liquid refuse proceeding from the pursuers' distillery would prejudicially affect the disposal by sale, application to land, or otherwise, of the sewage matter, as well as for other reasons, to decline to grant to the pursuers permission to introduce the liquid refuse proceeding from their distillery into the burgh sewer, and this resolution was duly intimated to the pursuers.

(His Lordship here read section 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, and section 116 of the Public Health Act, 1897)—The present action is directed to enforce the claim of the pursuers to have the liquid refuse proceeding from their distillery received into the defenders' sewers, and the defenders maintain that they are not bound so to receive that refuse, upon the grounds (1) that their sewers are not of adequate capacity to receive it; (2) that it would injure their sewers by causing them to leak, in consequence of the acid which it contains acting upon the lime in the cement at the joints of their sewer pipes; (3) that it would be injurious to the public health; and (4) that the admission of the refuse into the sewers would prejudicially affect the disposal by sale, application to land, or otherwise, of the sewage matter conveyed along them.

It appears to me that the defenders have failed to establish the first three of these objections, but I consider that a serious question, and a question of much general importance, is raised by their fourth objection. Section 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, does not declare that, in order to warrant the refusal of a local authority to admit a liquid into its sewers, it must be established that the admission of that liquid would render the disposal of the sewage matter conveyed along the sewers by sale, application to land, or otherwise, impossible. It is enough to warrant the refusal that the disposal of the sewage would be prejudicially affected by the admission of the liquid,—that is to say, that its disposal by sale, application to land, or otherwise, would be rendered more difficult, or less advantageous, than if the liquid had not been admitted. The word "materially" may be introduced as qualifying this statement, but if it is proved that the effect of the admission of the liquid would be "materially" to prejudice the disposal of the sewage by sale, application to land, or otherwise, I think that this would afford a sufficient answer to the demand that the liquid should be admitted into the sewers. So construed, the provision in section 7 appears to me to be entirely reasonable, and in accordance with the equities of the case. As the owners and occupiers of distilleries pay sewer rates, it is only just that they should get the benefit of the sewers, but they should only get a benefit similar to that received by other ratepayers, and if they were allowed to discharge into the sewers a liquid which would injure the sewers, or the sewage conveyed along them, in any of the particulars mentioned in section 7, they would get a greater and a different benefit, and would throw an unfair burden upon the other ratepayers. The equity referred to is also recognised by section 233 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892.

The effluent from the pursuers' distillery to which the defenders chiefly object is the burnt ale, and they maintain that they have proved that even after the solid ingredients contained in it have been allowed so far to settle in the pursuers' settling ponds, the burnt ale, if applied to a sewage farm, as it must be throughout the year while the distillery is working, would be most injurious in its effects. It is not, as I understand, disputed that burnt ale may be applied to land, or to vegetation, in certain quantities, at certain seasons, and at certain stages of growth, not only without injury, but with distinctly advantageous results. The defenders, however, say that if they were compelled to admit the pursuers' burnt ale into their sewers throughout the year, it would be highly prejudicial to any system of filtration, or of irrigation, or to any other system which they could adopt with a view to disposing of their sewage. It is essential to the efficiency and success of intermittent downward filtration, or indeed of any system of filtration, that the place upon which it is practised shall be kept porous; and they allege that burnt ale, even after its more solid ingredients have settled in the distillery, leaves upon the ground a glutinous or a "clotty" deposit which destroys its porosity and prevents the filtration from being accomplished. The defenders also say that owing to its strong acidity, the burnt ale in the sewage would have a burning or rotting effect on the vegetation, in the quantities in which, and in the circumstances under which, they would require to apply it to their land. It appears to me, upon a careful consideration of the evidence, that the defenders have established such a case on this head as to amount to a prejudicial affecting of the disposal of their sewage by application to land, within the meaning of section 7 of the Act of 1876.

Even if I had thought that this point had not been proved as adequately as I consider that it has been, it appears to me that it would have been a sufficient answer to the pursuers' demand for the defenders to plead that the question how to dispose of sewage containing burnt ale by application to land in such quantities or proportions as would require to be dealt with in this case, has not as yet got beyond the experimental stage, and that they are not bound to conduct costly experiments for the benefit of the pursuers in regard to a matter with respect to which the pursuers are as yet unable to satisfy the conditions expressed in section 7 of the Act of 1876. The Sheriff-substitute says in his note, "I certainly think the defenders have succeeded in shewing that hitherto no local authority in Scotland (excluding those who have facilities for putting distillery refuse into the sea) has succeeded in disposing of it by purification. But where they fail is in not satisfying me that it is scientifically impossible to purify it, seeing that from its inherent nature it is not destructive, but may be positively beneficial to land; or that the difficulties they find in the solution of the problem are greater than those that have been successfully surmounted in England, when dealing with far more virulent trade effluents, for which I refer to the evidence of Mr Thudichum." I am, however, of opinion, that the defenders are not bound to prove the negative proposition that it is "scientifically impossible" to treat sewage containing burnt ale so as to render it innocuous to land. The question is a practical one, and for the reasons already given, I think it is proved that no method has as yet been devised by which such a continuous application of sewage containing large quantities of burnt ale to land as would be necessary in the present case could be prevented from being prejudicial in the sense of section 7 of the Act of 1876. It does not appear to me that the defenders are bound to embark upon a course of scientific experiment or invention, but that it is enough for them to shew that, in the present state of knowledge, burnt ale in such quantities as the pursuers claim right to discharge into their sewers, cannot be continuously applied to land without material injury and prejudice to the land.

The Sheriff-substitute refers to Mr Thudichum's very interesting evidence as to the possibility of treating distillery effluents, or sewage containing them, by bacterial or biological methods, but that highly skilled witness did not mention any case in which these methods had been so applied—indeed the idea of such an application seems to have first occurred to him when preparing to give evidence in this case. I understand that the bacterial or biological method has been applied to ordinary sewage with more or less success, and that by it the injurious and putrescent substances in the sewage are not merely separated or disposed of but destroyed, this being accomplished not by adding anything, but by the organisms normally present in the sewage, or in the land as the filtering agent, upon which the sewage is treated. Evidence was, however, given on behalf of the defenders, to the effect that the bacterial or biological method could not be successfully applied to distillery refuse, and especially to burnt ale, because the burnt ale would choke the filters, and prevent the aeration, which is an essential part of the system. I do not think that the defenders are, in the present state of knowledge, bound to establish experimental bacterial beds and embark upon an attempt at discovery, with all the risks of failure incident to a process new in this application. If the pursuers have confidence in Mr Thudichum's suggestions, it is, of course, open to them to act upon these suggestions before presenting their effluents for admission into the defenders' sewers.

The pursuers relied upon the case of Guthrie, Craig, Peter, & Co. v. The Magistrates of Brechin,[1] but the decision in that case does not appear to me to be at all at variance with the views now expressed. The petition was at the instance of a firm of papermakers, and it was proved that three liquids which issued from their works were severally objectionable, but that they became harmless when they were mixed together, and exposed to the action of the air in settling-ponds. The experts reported that in their opinion the resultant fluid or effluent issuing from the pursuers' tanks into the public sewers of Brechin was not of such a character, so long as it was maintained in its then condition of practical neutrality, as to produce any injurious effect on the sewer pipes or on the crops or soil of the sewage farm, but that the larger volume of liquid to be dealt with necessitated a different mode of working the sewage farm to effect proper purification of the combined discharges from the sewer before they reached the river South Esk. It could only be alleged that the effluent was prejudicial "in its application to land" because the then existing sewage farm was too small for the reasonable treatment of the quantity which would be discharged. The present case, however, is very different, inasmuch as a question not merely of quantity but of quality is involved, and it appears to me to be established that the introduction of the pursuers' burnt ale into the defenders' sewers would prejudicially affect the application of the sewage to land in the sense of section 7 of the Act of 1876.

[1] 15 R. 385.

Cowie & Son v. Commissioners of Dufftown.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute of 28th July 1899 and 21st February 1900 should be recalled, and that the prayer of the pursuers' petition should be refused, with expenses.

LORD ADAM.—The pursuers do not, as I understand, maintain that the liquid proceeding from their manufacturing premises, and which they desire to have admitted to the defenders' sewers, is, in the condition in which it leaves their works, so innocuous in its character or quality that in an undiluted state they are entitled to have it admitted to the sewers. What they do maintain is that, after being mixed with the other contents of the sewers, its condition is such that it would not prejudicially affect either the sewers, or the disposal of the sewage matter by sale, or its application to land, or otherwise, and therefore that the defenders are bound under the 7th section of the Rivers Pollution Act to give them facilities for carrying the liquid in question into their sewers.

That contention necessarily leads to the consideration of the state of matters at the outfall of the sewers, and raises the question of fact whether the sewage matter as it issues from the sewers complies with the conditions specified in the Act, compliance with which entitles the pursuers to demand that the defenders shall give them facilities to enable them to carry the liquid coming from their works to the defenders' sewers. The defenders say that the sewage matter in question will, in consequence of the addition of the liquid proceeding from the pursuers' manufacturing processes, prejudicially affect the land to which it is applied, and will, therefore, prejudicially affect its disposal in that way, and that, I think, is the question at issue in this case.

Of the various liquids produced in the pursuers' works which go to the composition of the liquid in question, the one to the presence of which the defenders particularly object is burnt ale, which they say is prejudicial to the land to which it is applied.

The pursuers, on the other hand, maintain that burnt ale is not in its nature or quality prejudicial to land—that, on the contrary, it has been, and is, applied to land with beneficial results. That would appear to be true, but it is only true when it is applied to land in small quantities and at intermittent periods of longer or shorter duration. That, however, is not the question. The question is whether it would prejudicially affect the land if applied in the quantity, and continuously, as the defenders would be bound to receive it, as it issues from the sewers. I agree with your Lordship that the evidence clearly shews that it would. Burnt ale seems to contain a glutinous substance, which, when so applied, would destroy the property of the soil, and render it unfit for filtration and agricultural purposes. Burnt ale may be beneficial to land when applied in small quantities, but I certainly think that it would poison any land when applied in the quantity in which in this case it would necessarily have to be applied. If that be so, I think it is sufficient for the decision of the case.

But the pursuers further maintain that the liquid coming from their works can by treatment, by means of settling ponds or otherwise, be rendered perfectly innocuous in its application to land,—and, if that be so, that the defenders are bound to receive into their sewers and themselves apply the treatment requisite to produce that result.

Your Lordship has pointed out that no one has as yet succeeded in rendering the liquid innocuous in practice; and that success, if at all, has so far only been obtained in the laboratory. But, however that may be, I fail to see that the defenders are under any obligation of the kind. No doubt, if there was an absolute obligation on the defenders to receive into their sewers all liquids whether innocuous or otherwise, then, of course, they would have to dispose of the sewage thence resulting by treatment or otherwise as might seem to them best. But they are under no such obligation. Their obligation is to receive only innocuous liquids—such as fulfil the conditions specified in section 7 of the Act. If the resulting sewage matter, as it issues from the sewers, does not fulfil these conditions, as in this case, then the defenders are not bound to give facilities for the admission of the offending liquid, the admixture with which produces that result.

In the Brechin case,[1] when the local authority were finally ordained to admit the liquid proceeding from the manufacturing processes into the sewers, it had been ascertained, not merely by laboratory experiment, but by actual experience, that the liquid had been rendered innocuous, and fulfilled all the conditions specified in the 7th section of the Act. But it had been rendered innocuous by treatment in the manufacturers' own works. If the pursuers follow a similar course in this case, and offer an innocuous liquid for admission to the sewers, then, no doubt, the defenders will give them the necessary facilities.

Lord M'Laren.—I was not a member of the Court at the time when the case of Brechin[1] was decided, and do not feel called upon to examine the principle of construction of the statute which I find in the report of that case. I shall only say that, from the report itself, and from the explanations made to us at the bar, the case appears to have been presented under conditions depending upon the state of the record and the previous evidence, which somewhat limited the field of inquiry, and I do not gather that the Court was so free in that case to consider the pure question of liability under the statute as we are in the present case. But I am perfectly clear in my own mind that in this case it would not be in accordance with the statute to compel the burgh authority of Dufftown to receive the distillery effluent in the condition in which it is offered for their disposal. I do not enter into the facts of the case, or the scientific evidence, because I accept your Lordship's reasoning and conclusions in all particulars.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion with your Lordships. I think the Sheriff-substitute was probably right in declining to be convinced that it is impossible to purify the distillery effluent, but there is no onus on the defenders to shew that no effective method of purifying such refuse can be discovered by proper experimentation. They are bound to take the pursuers' liquid as it is, if they are bound to take it at all, and the question that they have to consider is whether, if it were admitted, it would prejudicially affect the disposal of the sewage in its application to land, and therefore they must consider what is the character and condition of the liquid when it is presented to them for admission to their sewers; and again they must consider what will probably be the character of the discharge which issues from the sewers after the pursuers' liquid has been carried through them along with the ordinary sewage matter which they are designed to carry. If it appears that the matter issuing from their sewers at the outfall will be injurious provided they are required to receive the liquids in question continuously and in the quantities which the pursuers call upon them to receive, then that shews that the admission of this liquid will prejudicially affect the disposal of the sewage matter by application to land, and there is nothing in the statute which requires them to go further and shew that it is not within the resources of science to discover any effective method of treatment which will render the liquid innocuous. If that be practicable, there is nothing to prevent the pursuers discovering, in the first place, and then applying such method of treatment and so presenting a harmless liquid for admission to the defenders' sewers. The true question comes to be, whether distillers are entitled to impose upon the local authority, or, in other words, upon the ratepayers, the cost and pains first of discovering, and then of effectively applying a method of treatment of distillery refuse which will render it innocuous, or whether they must not undertake that task themselves if they desire that it shall be admitted into the sewers of the local authority. It appears to me to be quite obvious that they cannot impose any such burden upon the community unless the Legislature has so enacted, and I find nothing in the statute which confers upon them any such right. I quite agree with what your Lordship has said with reference to the details of the Brechin[1] case. I think it is distinguishable from the present case. In the first place, it was found in that case that certain factory refuse was not open to the charge that it would either injure sewers or prejudicially affect the disposal of sewage matter in its application to land, and so far the decision is only a decision upon a question of fact which can afford no aid or guidance to us in determining a different question of fact with reference to a totally different subject. The only other point, as I read the case, which was decided was that the local authority, not having been able to shew that the liquid offered to them transgressed any of the conditions laid down in the 7th section of the statute, and not being able to find any other statutory condition which entitled them to exclude the refuse in question, the section compelled them to admit it. It was simply a decision that there were no conditions of the statute which would entitle the local authority to refuse liquid which had been offered to them, and that having been offered it, they were bound by the main enactment of the section, because they could not shelter themselves under any of its provisos. It appears to me, therefore, that that is no real authority for the decision of the present case.

Cowie & Son v. Commissioners of Dufftown.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute dated 28th July 1899 and 21st February 1900: Find in fact (1) that Dufftown is a police burgh, and that the defenders are the Commissioners and the Local Authority of it; (2) that in or about 1881 the defenders established a sewerage system in the burgh, consisting of glazed fireclay spigot and faucet pipes by which the sewage was discharged into the River Fiddich; (3) that in consequence of the County Council having complained of the sewage being discharged into the Fiddich, the defenders intend to dispose of it in future by filtration and irrigation; (4) that the pursuers are the owners and occupiers of Mortlach Distillery, which is situated in the burgh; (5) that the pursuers demand that the defenders shall admit the liquid refuse from their distillery into the defenders' sewers, and that the defenders shall allow them to make all necessary communications between their (the pursuers') drains and the Dufftown sewers for the purpose of admitting the said liquid refuse, and that the defenders decline to do so; (6) that it is not proved (1) that the defenders' sewers are not of adequate capacity to receive and convey the said liquid refuse; or (2) that the said liquid refuse would injure the defenders' sewers in consequence of the acid which it contains acting upon the lime in the cement at the joints of their sewer pipes; or (3) that the said liquid refuse would be injurious to the public health; but that it is proved that the admission of the said liquid refuse into the said sewers would prejudicially affect the disposal by application to land of the sewage matter conveyed along the said sewers: Therefore find in law that the defenders are not bound to admit the said liquid refuse into the said sewers: Refuse the prayer of the petition: Find the pursuers liable to the defenders in expenses, both in this Court and in the Sheriff Court, those in the Sheriff Court being on the higher scale, and remit," &c.

Reparation—Negligence—Precautions for safety of public—Safety of Children—Street—Deposit of building materials against wall separating street from pond.—In an action for damages on account of the death of a child seven years of age, the pursuer averred that the defender was engaged in building operations adjoining a public street; that the street on one side was separated from a mill pond ten feet deep by a stone wall eight feet high; that the defender deposited a large heap of building materials close to this wall and reaching to within thirty inches from its top; that the child, while playing with other children on the top of this heap, fell over the wall into the pond and was drowned; that the defender in heaping up the material close to the wall made the pond a practically unprotected source of danger to the public; that he knew that children were in the habit of playing on the top of the heap; and that in depositing the heap and failing to take precautions for the safety of children playing on it, the defender was guilty of gross negligence, in consequence of which the child lost its life.

The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Forfarshire.

IN May 1900 Andrew Horsburgh, carter, Dundee, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Dundee for £200, as damages on account of the death of his son William, a child aged seven years, against Robert Sheach junior, builder and contractor, Dundee.

The pursuer averred;—That (Cond. 2) in March last 1900 the defender was engaged in making extensions to certain works in Cunningham Street, Dundee, and in so doing had to make use of considerable quantities of sand, coping stone, &c.; that (Cond. 3) Cunningham Street was bounded on one side by a mill-pond between which and the street there was a stone wall of eight feet in height; that (Cond. 4) while engaged in the extensions the defender or his servants deposited a large quantity of coping, sand, gravel, &c., close to this wall; that at the date of the accident after mentioned the heap of coping, &c. had been accumulated to such an extent that its top was within thirty inches or so from the top of the wall. (Cond. 5) "On or about the 15th day of March last the pursuer's eldest son, William (aged seven years), was playing along with other children on top of the said heap of coping, &c. when he fell over the wall on to a ledge surrounding the pond, and from there fell into the pond itself, which is ten feet deep, and was drowned." (Cond. 6) "The wall situated between the pond and Cunningham Street already mentioned is so situated for the purpose of protecting persons using said street against the dangers of an unfenced pond, and in heaping up said sand, coping, &c. almost to the top of the wall, the defender or his servants, for whom he is responsible, practically did away with the effect of the wall, and rendered the pond an open and unprotected source of danger to the public." (Cond. 7) "The children living in the vicinity of Cunningham Street were in the habit of playing upon the top of the said heap of coping, &c., yet, although the defender or his servants were aware of this, they took no steps to prevent the children from falling over into the pond, and this it was their duty to have done, either by removing the heap altogether, by erecting some fence or other protection between it and the pond, or by having someone stationed to keep children away from the pond." (Cond. 8) "In erecting the said heap of coping, &c., and in failing to remove it or to take precautions for the safety of the children playing about it, the defender or his servants acted with gross and culpable negligence, and with a careless disregard for the safety of their fellow-beings, through which the pursuer's son lost his life, and for which the defender is responsible."

The defender pleaded, inter alia,—(1) The action is irrelevant.

On 4th July 1900 the Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) repelled the first plea in law for the defender and allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial.

On the pursuer's motion to approve of an issue the defender was heard in support of his first plea in law.[1]

In reply the pursuer distinguished the case of Thomson[1] referred to by the defender from the present on the ground that there the boy was ten years old, while here he was only seven. In support of this distinction the pursuer referred to the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk in Forbes v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners.[2] [On the question of age Lord Moncreiff referred to Fraser v. Edinburgh Street Tramways.[1]]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think that the present case presents any practical difficulty. The defender is said to have piled up on the public road close to one of the walls bounding the road a quantity of sand and gravel. It is not averred that this was done without the consent of the road authorities, and it must be assumed that where a building is being erected, and for the purposes of its construction the builder puts down a pile of material upon the public road, he has got the permission of the public authority to do so. On the pursuer's own statement this pile of material reached, not to the top of the wall but only to thirty inches from the top. That appears to me a perfectly safe distance to prevent any person falling over the wall, unless indeed such person climbs, not only on to the top of the pile, but also on to the wall. That is, I think, not a thing which anyone is bound to contemplate. If the deceased had been a grown-up person or a child of ten years, I do not think that there would have been a shadow of doubt that the defender was not responsible. The deceased was a child of seven, but even in such a case I do not think that the defender was bound to contemplate that a child of seven would climb on to the wall from a pile of gravel the top of which was thirty inches below the level of the wall.

I am therefore of opinion that this action falls to be dismissed as irrelevant.

LORD YOUNG.—I am clearly of opinion that there are no facts averred here indicating fault, or a shadow of fault, on the part of the defender.

LORD TRAYNER.—I cannot distinguish this case from the case of Thomson.[2] I therefore think that it falls to be dismissed.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion.

THE COURT sustained the first plea in law for the defender and dismissed the action.

Chivas' Trustees v. Douglas.

In 1864 the Diocese of Orkney in the Scottish Episcopal Church was united with the Diocese of Aberdeen, and the two sees were thereafter known as the United Diocese of Aberdeen and Orkney. The United Diocese was ruled by one bishop, and its affairs were managed by one set of officials. All the congregations within the United Diocese were assessed for diocesan expenses on the same basis.

Held that the bequest included the clergy of the original Diocese of Orkney as well as those of the original Diocese of Aberdeen.

Held further (1) that the bishop, clergymen instituted to regularly constituted incumbencies, clergymen holding the licence of the bishop and appointed to independent mission charges, curates or assistants to regularly instituted clergymen, and the "supernumerary clergyman," i.e., a clergyman who performed clerical duties when required on behalf of other clergymen of the Diocese, were "clergy" of the Diocese within the meaning of the bequest, and entitled to participate in the income thereof; but (2) that clergymen formerly officiating within the Diocese who had retired, and were on the Aged and Infirm Clergy Fund, but who still held the licence of the bishop, were not entitled to participate, in respect that they had no stipends, and were under no obligation to perform any clerical duties.

2D DIVISION.

MRS CHRISTIAN CHIVAS, widow of Alexander Chivas, advocate in Aberdeen, died there on 14th November 1878. She left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 28th June 1872, and a number of codicils thereto of various dates.

By the trust-disposition and settlement the testatrix disponed her whole means and estates, heritable and moveable, real and personal, to George Collie, advocate in Aberdeen, in trust for the purposes mentioned. Among the purposes was the following:—"And I further direct the said George Collie to lay out and invest on good security in his own name, as trustee foresaid, the following sums of money, and that at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas happening six months after my death, for the purposes following," inter alia,—"(Fifth) The sum of £2000 sterling, the interest or revenue whereof shall be divided and paid half-yearly and termly equally between the Right Reverend Bishop Thomas Suther, of St Andrew's Church, Aberdeen, and the Reverend Macleod, of the Episcopal Church at Ellon, during all the days of their lives, and on the death of the predeceaser the whole interest or revenue shall be paid wholly to the survivor during all the days of his life, and on the death of the last survivor the said principal sum of £2000 shall be paid to the Episcopal Fund in connection with the St Andrew's Church, Aberdeen, the said last-mentioned bequest being made by me in name of and as a memorial of my husband, who was much attached to his church."

By one of the codicils, dated 6th November 1872, the testatrix recalled the legacy above quoted, "and in lieu thereof I do hereby direct my executor to invest the sum of £4000 on good security, and pay the annual income therefrom equally between Bishop Suther and the said Mr M'Leod during all the days of their life, and wholly to the survivor, and after the death of the survivor of them to hold the said fund and divide the annual income derived therefrom among the clergy of the Diocese of Aberdeen in supplement of their stipends."

Bishop Suther and Mr Macleod survived the testatrix, and received

No. 43.

Dec. 12, 1900. Chivas' Trustees v. Douglas.

the income of the above-mentioned fund in terms of the bequest. Mr Macleod survived Bishop Suther and died on 3d October 1898.

The whole purposes of the trust having been by that date fulfilled, with the exception of the bequest of the income to the clergy of the Diocese of Aberdeen under the provision above quoted, Mr Collie, as trustee, on 27th March 1899, assumed as trustees the Right Reverend Dr Arthur Gascoigne Douglas, bishop of the United Diocese of Aberdeen and Orkney in the Episcopal Church in Scotland, and certain other officials of that Diocese. Mr Collie then, on 11th May 1899, resigned office as trustee.

In July 1900 a special case was presented for the determination of questions (a) as to the classes of clergy entitled to share in the above bequest, and (b) as to the meaning of the term "the Diocese of Aberdeen" as used therein.

The case stated that in 1864 the Diocese of Orkney in the Episcopal Church in Scotland was united with the Diocese of Aberdeen in that Church, "and the two sees have ever since been known and referred to as the United Diocese of Aberdeen and Orkney. Before the union the said Diocese of Aberdeen included the whole county of Aberdeen and a portion of the county of Banff. The said United Diocese is ruled by one bishop, and the affairs of the United Diocese are regulated and managed by one set of officials. The diocesan expenses of the United Diocese are annually ascertained by the Diocesan Council, and the whole congregations, including missions, within the United Diocese are assessed in respect thereof upon the same basis."*

The first parties to the case were the trustees.

The second party was Dr Douglas, the bishop.

The third parties were the Reverend Dr James M. Danson and thirty-seven other clergymen, all being "clergymen instituted to constitutionally governed charges called incumbencies," situated within the portion of the United Diocese of Aberdeen and Orkney at one time known as the Diocese of Aberdeen. The case further stated that such clergymen "are appointed to their incumbencies by the members of the congregation, unless the appointment happens to be within the patronage of one or more private individuals."

The fourth parties were the Reverend Robert C. Ross and two other clergymen, being "clergymen holding the licence of the bishop of the said United Diocese, and appointed to the charge of independent missions, i.e., congregations not yet constituted into incumbencies," within the same portion of the United Diocese. The mode of appointment of the fourth parties was similar to that of the third parties.

The fifth parties were the Reverend James C. Smith and another, being "clergymen holding licences of the said bishop, and acting as curates or assistants to instituted clergymen within" the same portion of the United Diocese. Such clergymen "are generally appointed by

* The following letter by the testatrix to her trustee, Mr Collie, was produced with the special case:—"My dear Mr Collie,—I wish the sum of £500 to be set apart for a memorial window to Mr Chivas in our Church of St Andrews as it now is, or in a church that may be built hereafter. I may not look to see this, but the sum on demand must be paid to Dr Suther, the Rt. Revd. Bishop of Aberdeen and Orkney. Should he also have pass'd away ere the work is completed, you will please pay the said sum for the above-ment'd purpose to the Rt. Revd. the Bishop of Aberdeen in the Scottish Episcopal Church for the time being.—I remain, ever yours truly," &c.

the instituted clergymen, whom they assist, and are paid by them or by their congregations as may be arranged."

The sixth parties were the Reverend John Comper and two others, being clergymen "formerly officiating regularly within the said United Diocese, now retired, and on the Aged and Infirm Clergy Fund of the Representative Church Council in connection with the Episcopal Church in Scotland, but still holding the bishop's licence, and entitled under said licence to officiate within the Diocese."

The seventh party was the bishop, "as representing a clergyman performing clerical duties when required on behalf of other clergymen of the said [United] Diocese happening to be temporarily unable to fulfil the same, and known as the supernumerary clergyman of said diocese. At the present date the office of supernumerary clergyman happens to be temporarily vacant, and the parties agree that for the purposes of this case he shall be held as represented by the said bishop."

The eighth parties (the Reverend James B. Craven and another) and the ninth parties (the Reverend Alfred Bromley and another) occupied positions identical with that of the third and the fourth parties respectively, except that the incumbencies of the eighth parties and the charges of the ninth parties were situated within the portion of the United Diocese formerly known as the Diocese of Orkney.

The bishop, as second party, maintained that he was entitled to share in the income of the bequest with such of the clergy as might be found entitled to participate.

The third parties maintained that only the bishop and clergy instituted to incumbencies were entitled to share in the bequest.

The fourth parties maintained that the income fell to be divided among the bishop and such of the clergy as were licensed to the charge of independent congregations.

The third and fourth parties further maintained that only clergy of the original diocese of Aberdeen were entitled to share.

The fifth, sixth, and seventh parties maintained that they were entitled to participate, in respect that they "hold the licence of the bishop of the diocese and have the full status of clergy therein."

The eighth and ninth parties maintained that the clergy of the district which formed the original diocese of Orkney were entitled to share along with the clergy of the district which formed the original diocese of Aberdeen. Quoad ultra the eighth and ninth parties adopted the position of the third and fourth parties respectively.

The question of law was:—"Are the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth parties, or any and which of them, entitled under said bequest to participate in the annual income to be derived from the said trust fund?"

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—What the testatrix in the present case desired was that the proceeds of this fund should be divided among the clergy of the diocese in supplement of their stipends. I am of opinion that this term is wide enough to include the bishop, clergy having incumbencies, those appointed to independent missions, curates or assistants to instituted clergy, and the person holding the office of supernumerary clergyman. But the sixth parties are in a different position. They formerly officiated within the diocese, but they have now retired on pensions, and although they still hold licences they have no stipends. They have no rights or obligations as acting clergymen, and I therefore think that the sixth parties are not entitled to share in the proceeds of the legacy.

The only question remaining is, whether the clergymen within that portion of the United Diocese of Aberdeen and Orkney, at one time known as the Diocese of Orkney are entitled to share in the bequest. It appears that in 1864 it was thought advisable to amalgamate the Diocese of Orkney and the Diocese of Aberdeen, and ever since they have been known as the United Diocese of Aberdeen and Orkney. They are under one bishop, whose official title is the Bishop of the United Diocese of Aberdeen and Orkney. But it seems quite plain that the United Diocese is popularly described as the Diocese of Aberdeen, and the bishop as the Bishop of Aberdeen. Aberdeen is the seat of the bishop. I am of opinion that the testator used the words Diocese of Aberdeen in that sense, and intended all the clergy of the United Diocese to have a share in the bequest. I am confirmed in this view by her letter of 12th September 1874, in which the testatrix uses the terms "Bishop of Aberdeen and Orkney" and "Bishop of Aberdeen" as synonymous.

LORD YOUNG, LORD TRAYNER, and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT answered the question of law by declaring that the second, third, fourth, fifth, seventh, eighth, and ninth parties were those entitled under the bequest to participate in the annual income to be derived from the fund.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Pearson.

MISS AGNES WILSON YOUNG, Edinburgh, died on 29th January 1900, leaving a last will and settlement dated 5th December 1898, and a codicil thereto of the same date.

By the last will and settlement the testatrix appointed John Blair, Writer to the Signet, to be her sole executor and trustee, and conveyed to him her whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, for the purposes specified. The third purpose was in these terms:—"Thirdly, I leave the Residue of my Estate to my brothers, Archibald Young, Advocate, and the Reverend James Gerard Young, Doctor of Divinity, equally between them, and if either predecease me, and one survives, then I leave the whole to such survivor."

The codicil was in the following terms:—"Referring to the Will which I have signed to-day, I direct that in the event of either of my brothers predeceasing me, the half of the Residue, and in the event of both predeceasing me, the whole of the Residue, shall be applied for such charitable or public purposes as my trustee thinks proper."

James Gerard Young predeceased the testatrix, and Archibald Young survived her. Archibald Young was her heir-at-law and sole next of kin.

Mr Blair accepted office as trustee.

On 20th March 1900 Archibald Young brought an action against the trustee, concluding, first, for declarator that the direction in the codicil was void, invalid, and ineffectual, and that the whole residue of the means and estate of Miss Young belonged to the pursuer; secondly, for declarator that the pursuer, as heir-at-law and sole next of kin of Miss Young, or otherwise as residuary legatee under her last will and settlement, was entitled and had right to the whole of the residue. Then followed conclusions for count, reckoning, and payment. The amount of the residue was stated to be about £18,000.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The direction as to the application of the residue of her estate contained in the holograph codicil of the said Miss Agnes Wilson Young being invalid on the ground of vagueness and uncertainty, the one-half of the residue falls to be dealt with as intestate succession, and to be paid over to the pursuer as heir-at-law and sole next of kin. (2) Or otherwise, the direction as to the application of the residue of the said estate contained in the said codicil being invalid on the ground of vagueness and uncertainty, the pursuer is entitled to the whole residue as sole residuary legatee under the trust-disposition and settlement. (3) The pursuer being the sole residuary legatee and heir-at-law and sole next of kin of the said Miss Agnes Wilson Young, is entitled to decree of declarator and decree for production of accounts and payment, in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defender admitted that the pursuer as one of the residuary legatees was entitled to one half of the residue, but with respect to the other half the defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The bequest of one-half of the residue for such charitable or public purposes as the late Miss Agnes Wilson Young's trustee shall think proper is valid, and the said one-half of the residue falls to be administered by the defender in terms of the said trust direction.

The pursuer having died on 8th May 1900, his trustees were, on 29th May, sisted as pursuers in his place.

On 19th July the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the legacy in favour of the defender is not void from uncertainty; therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses out of the said legacy," &c.*

* "OPINION.—This question arises on the construction of one of the testamentary writings of the late Miss Agnes Young. She had two brothers, one of whom predeceased her. In that event she had provided by a codicil that one-half of her residue should be applied 'for such charitable or public purposes as my trustee thinks proper.' The half residue is said to amount to about £9000.

"The trustee named in the will accepted office, and is the defender in this action.

"The representatives of the surviving brother now claim that the bequest

The pursuers reclaimed.

The nature of the arguments sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Court.[1]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I find myself quite unable to read this bequest so as to bring it under the class of charitable bequests. The codicil directs that in the event of either of the brothers of the testatrix predeceasing her, is void through uncertainty and vagueness, and that they are entitled to the fund.

"It is not disputed that but for the words 'or public' the bequest would be good, as being a bequest for charitable purposes to be selected by a person named. On the other hand it seems to be settled, that if the class of objects named alternatively is too vague and uncertain to receive effect, the otherwise good bequest to charitable purposes will also fail.

"I set on one side those cases of which Low's Trustees (11 Macph. 744) is an example where a legacy is left to a class of objects so wide that it requires a power of selection to make it definite, and where either no power of selection is given, or the trustees to whom it is given fail.

"Nor do I think much if any light is to be obtained from English authorities on this matter. The view taken by the English Courts is entirely different from ours, as is well explained by Lord Stormonth-Darling in his opinion in the case of Cobb (21 R. 638).

"In our law it is settled that a bequest for charitable purposes to be selected by trustees is valid, even where the purposes are not defined by a reference to locality, or to specific objects, or otherwise than by the word 'charitable.'

"If this be so, I profess myself unable to see any reason why the substitution of the term 'public purposes' for 'charitable purposes' should make all the difference in the validity of the bequest, and why the one bequest should be bad and the other good. Both terms are in a sense vague, not only as including a very large class, but as presenting difficulty in fixing the precise boundary of the class. It would be almost impossible to frame an exhaustive list either of charitable purposes or of public purposes; and possibly there would be a large difference of opinion, in the case of each list, as to whether certain objects fell within the description or not. But that observation seems to me quite as applicable to charitable as to public purposes.

"As to the absence of any geographical limit within which the bequest is to be applied, I do not find that this has been accepted as a ground for refusing effect to a bequest for 'charitable purposes' generally. It is not necessary to limit the scope of the bequest by any reference to a locality. Provided someone is appointed to make the selection of individual objects, the charitable purposes may be world-wide; and it has not, so far as I am aware, been suggested that the bequest must fail because the selection may be of foreign charities. It is true a distinction may here be suggested. For while charitable purposes, being founded on the needs of humanity, are much the same in scope and object wherever they are promoted, the promotion of public purposes is a very different matter when it is not confined to the testator's own people and nation. But if 'public purposes within Scotland' would do, as I think it clearly would, I see no sufficient reason for holding that this bequest by a Scotswoman is to fail because she has not confined the selection to her own country. That is a matter she left to her trustee; and in my opinion she was entitled to do so."

the half of the residue, and in the event of both predeceasing her, the whole of the residue "shall be applied for such charitable or public purposes as my trustee thinks proper." Whatever might be the result of an attempt, where two or more expressive adjectives are joined by the copulative word "and," to read the one as exegetical of the other, it would be a quite improper stretch of language, in such a sentence as we are now construing, to read "charitable" as being interpreted by the word "public." There is nothing in the bequest to lead us to any interpretation, and we are obliged to take the words as we find them. I think the plain reading of these words is that the trustee may apply the fund to "charitable" purposes, or, if he thinks proper, may apply it to "public" purposes not included in that word. And that being the view I take of the reading of the words, I differ from the judgment which the Lord Ordinary has given.

LORD YOUNG.—Had the codicil in question directed the residue of the testator's property to be applied "for such charitable purposes as my trustee thinks proper," I should have thought it valid, and indeed this, I understand, is not disputed. The question in the case is whether the direction that the residue shall be applied "for such charitable or public purposes as my trustee thinks proper," is valid; and agreeing with your Lordship, but differing from the Lord Ordinary, I am of opinion that it is not. "Public purposes" is a very wide and indefinite expression, quite as wide and indefinite as the expression "private purposes"—both and either so much so that I could not on authority or principle sustain either or both as a valid direction to a testamentary trustee. Nor can I hold that a direction to apply money to "charitable purposes" chosen by the trustee can be sustained if followed by words which extend his powers so that he may decline "charitable purposes" altogether, and choose any other he thinks proper, whether "public" or "private"—or either exclusive of the other. To hold otherwise would be to hold that a testamentary trustee may be validly empowered to apply the testamentary funds to any purpose he thinks proper, charitable or not, provided only that it is public or private, and of course lawful.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. The language of this deed is not ambiguous. It is simply this, that the trustee or executor should apply the half of the residue for such charitable or public purposes as the trustee or the executor should think proper. Now, there is no doubt that if the direction had been to divide among "charitable purposes," or anything which could have been brought within the category of "charitable," it would have been a good bequest according to the decisions both in England and Scotland. But I think it is also settled by authority that any disposition of an estate to a trustee to be disposed of, according to his discretion, for "public purposes," is too vague, and must be held to be ineffectual through uncertainty.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion, and I have nothing to add on the merits; but I think that the pursuers take under the will, the codicil being bad. Mr Archibald Young, the surviving brother and original pursuer, became, as the sole residuary legatee under the will, entitled to the whole of the residue; and accordingly the pursuers, as his trustees and executors, are entitled to decree on that footing in terms of their second plea in law.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, sustained the second plea in law for the pursuers, decerned, and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

A brickmaker who wished to replace the engine at his works with one of greater power, to be connected, with the existing boiler received a letter dated 1st October 1898 from a firm of engineers enclosing a specification and estimate of an engine which they described as the most economical engine in the market. The letter stated,—"Assuming the steam pressure to be 110/120 lbs., the consumption will be as follows:—

The brickmaker by letter gave the order "as per your specification . . . subject to your guarantee of fuel consumption being fulfilled." The engine when delivered was found to be capable of developing, as estimated, 1 horse-power from 15 lbs. of steam, but the amount of coal at 4s. per ton required to raise this quantity of steam by the brickmaker's boiler was more than double that stated. The discrepancy was due to the engineer's representative having taken from a text-book the formula 1½ lbs. of coal develop 15 lbs. of steam, without adverting to the fact that the coal referred to was best Welsh coal (costing over £1 per ton) while the coal used by the defenders was Scots dross, costing 4s. per ton. In an action for the price, the purchaser contended that the letter of 1st October contained a guarantee that with the engine he would be able to produce 30,000 bricks at a cost of 4s. 4d., and that the damage sustained by him through the pursuers' breach of contract exceeded the price. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Low) that in view of the subject-matter of the contract—the sale of an engine—the letter could not be construed as containing a warranty as to the cost of producing the steam to be supplied to the engine, or as to the total cost of producing bricks, in which the cost of steam production was an element.

Opinion (per Lord M'Laren) that the statement "15 lbs. of steam develop one horse power per hour," was a material term of the contract, and a warranty in the sense of section 62 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Low.

ON 19th July 1899 Robey & Company, engineers, Lincoln, raised an action against John G. Stein & Co., Fireclay Works, Bonnyridge, concluding for payment of £955, 7s. 7d. The pursuers averred that they had conform to contract supplied an engine to the defenders, the price of which, less a small amount paid to account, was the sum sued for.

The defenders, who were brickmakers, admitted receiving an engine from the pursuers, but denied that it was conform to contract.

They stated that in May 1898 they contemplated replacing the engine at their Denny Works with one of greater power, and had entered into negotiations with the pursuers in the course of which they had received from Mr Dunkerton, the pursuers' Glasgow representative, a letter dated 7th June 1898 (quoted infra, note * p. 280), "in which he stated that the defenders appeared to have been working their plant at great expense and also loss of power, and he informed the defenders that in the event of their ordering an engine from the pursuers he guaranteed to prove this in a practical manner, viz., by a reduction in their coal bill and more work done."

(Stat. 3) "Proceeding on the guarantee mentioned in the preceding article, and with a view to placing an order with pursuers, the defenders asked pursuers to ascertain for themselves what power defenders were using. Mr Dunkerton accordingly called at defenders' work, examined the existing plant, and obtained data and information which enabled him to write to the defenders instructing them as to the power they were using, and setting forth the economy in fuel consumption they would obtain by purchasing an engine from the pursuers. Accompanying the letter were specifications and estimates of two engines, either of which the pursuers recommended."

(Stat. 4) "The pursuers' letter [dated 1st October 1898], mentioned in the preceding statement, is in the following terms:—'Dear Sirs,—We now have pleasure in enclosing herewith specification and estimate of our coupled compound condensing engine, Class E, having cylinders 13½ in. and 21½ in. by 30 in. stroke, and, as an alternative, one of the same type, but having cylinders 15 in. and 23½ in. by 33 in. stroke. The former running at 100 revolutions per min., the latter running at 90 revolutions per min. This type of engine has now stood the test of many years, and is, we have not the least hesitation in saying, the most economical and most efficient engine in the market at the present time. The smaller engine of the two will give 165 i.h.p. at its most economical working point, but is capable of developing 230 i.h.p. The larger one will give about 230 i.h.p. most economically, but is capable of working to 300 i.h.p. Assuming the steam pressure to be 110/120 lbs., the consumption will be as follows:—

"'The foregoing calculations are based on the most economical working load of the smaller engine driving three sets of machines. If you intend to put down three new machines—making four in all—we should recommend the larger engine, which would prove proportionately economical.'"

(Stat. 5) " . . . Relying entirely on pursuers' representations and guarantees as to the great saving which one of their engines would effect, defenders, by letter of 12th October 1898, gave pursuers an order for a coupled compound horizontal condensing engine . . . This order expressly bore that it was given subject to pursuers' guarantee of fuel consumption being fulfilled. The said letter is produced and referred to. By letter of 14th October 1898 pursuers accepted this order." (Stat. 7) "The engine was not ready to start work until the middle of April 1899, and when at length it did start, it was found to be quite incapable of accomplishing the saving in fuel which the pursuers had guaranteed it would effect. After being fairly and fully tried, the coal consumed for 10,000 bricks manufactured was found to be 1 ton (= 2240 lbs.), whereas the pursuers' guarantee was that the coal consumed would be for 30,000 bricks, 1 ton 2 cwt. 0 qrs. 4 lbs.; or for 10,000 bricks, 7 cwt. 1 qr. 13 lbs. (= 825 lbs.). The actual coal consumpt is thus about $2\frac{3}{4}$ times that of the pursuers' guarantee, on the faith of which the defenders gave the order for the engine. The defenders have suffered very serious loss in consequence of the pursuers' failure to fulfil their guarantee above mentioned, relative to the fuel consumpt of the said engine. The said loss amounts to a sum not less than the sum sued for."

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The pursuers having committed a breach of contract as condescended on, the defenders, having suffered loss and damage thereby, are entitled to set off that loss and damage against the pursuers' claim. (3) The pursuers having committed a breach of warranty as condescended on, the defenders are entitled to set up the same in extinction of the price of the engine sued for.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof.

From the evidence, it appeared that Mr Dunkerton had had several meetings with the defenders, and that the letters quoted below, inter alia, had passed between the parties.*

It also appeared that the figures (in the letter of 1st October 1898) "1½ lbs. of coal develop 15 lbs. steam," were got by Mr Dunkerton from a text-book on steam, and that the formula was based on the assumption that the best Welsh coal was being used. The defenders, in fact, used Scots dross, the price of which at 1st October 1898 was 4s. a ton. The price of Welsh coal at that date was 25s. a ton.

having the pleasure of booking your order, we guarantee to shew you in a practical manner, viz., reduction in coal bill, and more work done."

Robey & Co. (Dunkerton) to Stein & Co., 1st October 1898 (quoted ante, Stat. 4).

Stein & Co. to Robey & Co., 4th October 1898.—"Yours of 1st. The price you quote is certainly a stiff one. We presume it includes the erection and starting of the engine, and is also dependent on the fuel consumption turning out as you calculate. We note your calculations are based on one mill, elevators, screen, and machine requiring only 55 i.h.p., notwithstanding that your diagram of our present engine indicated about 100 i.h.p., and we understand that you are satisfied that this is so, and accept the responsibility of same. We understand that you guaranteed the same steam consumption to Messrs Dobbie, Forbes, & Co., although their engine is non-condensing. Is this so, and if so, what further advantage is the condenser?"

Stein & Co. to Robey & Co., 12th October 1898.—"We confirm order for coupled compound horizontal condensing engine cylinder, 15 in. and 23½ in. by 33 in. stroke, . . . as per your specification, for the sum of £960 sterling. Cash in three months, or £935 cash in one month, subject to your guarantees of fuel consumption being fulfilled."

Robey and Co. to Stein & Co., 14th October 1898.—"We have received per our Mr Dunkerton your esteemed favour of the 12th inst. confirming the order for coupled compound class E horizontal condensing engine. . . .

"With regard to the steam consumption, we have to state that one of our engines, slightly larger than the above, was lately tested by the authorities of Durham University, and came to somewhat less than the figure you gave, viz., about 17 lbs.; but to carry out tests to prove this at your works means running to a considerable expense, which, however, we shall be glad to do on your agreeing to pay for the skilled men. . . ."

Stein & Co. to Robey & Co., 15th October 1898.—"Yours of yesterday. It is not necessary to send skilled men from Lincoln at considerable expense, as on 1st inst. you gave us the fuel per 10,000 bricks, and it will be easily ascertained without expense."

Robey & Co. to Stein & Co., 17th October 1898.—"We are in receipt of your favour of the 15th inst. and note contents.

"We are not quite clear what is meant by the fuel for 10,000 bricks, but this probably refers to some conversation between you and our Mr Dunkerton.

"We have referred this matter to him, and assuring you of our best attention."

Stein & Co. to Robey & Co., 18th October 1898.—"Yours of yesterday. We note you have referred the matter to Mr Dunkerton, whose letter of 1st inst. goes fully into the fuel consumption, and on which our decision was based."

* "OPINION.—In this action the pursuers sue for the price of a steam-engine which they supplied to the defenders for their brick manufactory at Bonnybridge.

"In defence the defenders aver that the pursuers guaranteed that the

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The guarantee was that 1½ lbs. of coal would produce 15 lbs. of steam, and that for an expenditure of 22 cwt. 4 lbs. of coal the engine would turn out 30,000 bricks. It might be that that had proved to be a guarantee impossible of fulfilment. Parties did not think so at the time of the contract, and in any case it was no answer to the defenders' plea of breach of warranty.[1] The object of getting a new engine was to economise fuel consumption, and accordingly the defenders insisted on getting a guarantee of fuel consumption. The pursuers said that the guarantee—if any—was of steam consumption, but the terms of the letters were entirely against that view. The correspondence, it was to be noted, closed by the pursuers saying that they would refer the matter of fuel to Dunkerton. They afterwards, without again communicating on the matter with the defenders, delivered the engine, and it must be taken, therefore, that they had referred to Dunkerton, and were satisfied that the defenders were right in what they said about a guarantee having been given, or that they had waived their right to refer to Dunkerton, and had accepted the defenders' statement. If the guarantee was given it was very clear that it had not fuel required to drive the engine would not exceed a certain amount, and that in fact a much larger amount is required. The defenders accordingly claim damages to an amount which entirely extinguishes the price.

"The defenders found upon the 53d section of the Sale of Goods Act, which provides that 'where there is a breach of warranty by the seller, the buyer may set up against the seller the breach of warranty in diminution or extinction of the price.'

"By the 62d section of the Act, it is provided that 'as regards Scotland, a breach of warranty shall be deemed to be a failure to perform a material part of the contract.'

"Now, if it was part of the contract that the amount of fuel required to drive the engine should not exceed a specified quantity, I think that there is no doubt that that would be a material part of the contract. The first question therefore is whether a condition as to the amount of fuel required was part of the contract.

"The negotiations with the defenders were conducted by Mr Dunkerton, the pursuers' agent in Glasgow. After a considerable amount of correspondence, to which I need not refer, Dunkerton, on 1st October 1898, wrote a letter to the defenders enclosing a specification and estimate which had been prepared by the pursuers for two engines of the same type, the one somewhat larger than the other. That letter is quoted at length in Article 3 of the defenders' statement, and upon it their case chiefly depends.

"The defenders, however, also found upon a letter which Dunkerton wrote to them on 7th June 1898, in which he said: 'You appear to have been working your plant at great expense and also loss of power, which in event of having the pleasure of booking your order we guarantee to shew you in a practical manner, by reduction of coal bill and more work done.'

"The defenders' reason for founding upon that letter is, I suppose, that the letter of 1st October does not in terms bear to be a guarantee, and accordingly they argued that the letter of 1st October contained the guarantee which was promised in the letter of 7th June. I do not think that there was any connection whatever between the two letters, and I do not regard the letter of 7th June as containing a guarantee in the proper sense of the term, or as a promise to give a guarantee. It was merely a representation that the pursuers' engine would consume less fuel and do more work than the engine which the defenders were then using, and, as matter of

been implemented. Rejection by the defenders was out of the question, for their whole premises had been rearranged at great expense to suit the new engine; and their only remedy, therefore, was to claim damages in extinction of the price.[1] The Sale of Goods Act, 1893, contemplated that damages for breach of warranty might exceed the price of the article purchased, and here the difference between the coal actually consumed and the coal consumpt which was guaranteed would, if capitalised over the life of the engine, exceed in value the price of the engine.

Argued for the respondents;—The construction put upon the letters by the Lord Ordinary was right. The guarantee claimed by the defenders was of a most extraordinary character. There was no precise statement of it on record. The inherent improbability of its having been given was an important factor in the construction of the letters which were alleged to instruct it. What the pursuers had warranted, if, indeed, they had warranted anything, was that the engine—given a certain number of lbs. of steam—would produce a certain amount of horse power. That was a warranty of steam con-fact, the engine which the pursuers supplied has justified that representation.

"If, therefore, the pursuers gave a guarantee in regard to the consumption of fuel, it is contained in the letter of 1st October.

"It is said that the calculations in regard to the consumption of fuel in the latter letter were not intended to be a guarantee, that Dunkerton had no authority to give a guarantee, and that owing to the calculations being based upon erroneous assumptions, the result brought out is an impossible one.

"Upon that view of the case I would only remark (1) that whether there was a guarantee or not depends upon the construction of the letters which passed between the parties; (2) that although Dunkerton had not authority to give a guarantee, or indeed to conclude a contract, he was introduced to the defenders as being the pursuers' representative, and in particular the defenders were referred to him in regard to the question of consumption of fuel; and (3) if it was a term of the contract that not more than a specified amount of fuel should be required to work the engine, the fact that it was impossible for the pursuers to fulfil that part of the contract will not save them from a claim of damages for breach of contract.

"I shall therefore turn to the letter of 1st October and consider whether it contains a guarantee, or, in other words, whether the pursuers therein contracted to supply an engine which would consume a certain amount of fuel and no more.

"The guarantee which the letter of 1st October is said to contain is that the engine would produce 30,000 bricks, with an expenditure of 1 ton 2 cwt. 4 lbs. of coal of a kind which at the date of the letter could be purchased for 4s. per ton. I think that that is a fair enough summary of the result of the statements in the letter, but it is to be observed that the calculations refer to the smaller engine, and are based upon the assumption of its being worked with the most economical load. Now, the defenders took the larger engine, and the actual consumption of coal upon which they base their claim was not taken when the engine was working with the most economical load. There was therefore in no view a definite guarantee applicable to the engine which the defenders elected to take, nor to the conditions under which the engine has been worked. It was, however, said in the letter that the larger engine would 'prove proportionately economical.' Now, although no sumption, not fuel consumption. The latter would have been a warranty having reference to no part or quality of the thing purchased and delivered, but to something entirely outside of and apart from it, viz., the calorific power of Scots dross. Fuel consumption, where that expression occurred in the correspondence, meant steam consumption. An engine consumed steam, not coal. If the subject of the sale had been a boiler, then it would have meant coal consumption. The letter of 1st October merely set out a series of calculations. The figures given by Dunkerton in reference to coal consumption were text-book figures. He had never examined the coal used by the defenders, or their boilers, and he had not, in fact, the materials wherewith to give the warranty claimed. In point of fact, a very large economy was effected by the engine supplied by the pursuers.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is a case which is important in its legal relations, and if I had been considering it in the first instance, I should have wished to take more time to study the case; but we have the advantage of a very one was able to say with precision what the consumption of coal of the engine supplied to the defenders, when worked as they work it, should be, if calculated upon the same basis as the calculations in the letter, it is not disputed that the amount would be considerably less than that actually consumed.

"If, therefore, the letter of 1st October is to be read as a guarantee, I think that it is plain enough that the engine supplied has not fulfilled the guarantee. In my judgment, however, the letter does not amount to a guarantee. The occasion of the letter being written was that the pursuers had made out a detailed specification and estimate for an engine of the kind in regard to which there had been previous negotiations with the defenders. The contract which the pursuers offered to make with the defenders was a contract to supply an engine in terms of the specification and at the estimated price. All that was said in the letter about the consumption of coal appears to me to have been merely representations as to the capacity of the engine. These representations were no doubt made for the purpose of inducing the defenders to enter into a contract for the purchase of an engine, and I accept Mr Stein's word that they did induce him to enter into the contract; but that does not make the representations part of the contract. It would have been a different matter if the defenders had been seeking to set aside the contract on the ground that they had been induced to enter into it by representations which, however honestly made, were in fact false, but that is not the position taken up by the defenders at all. They are holding by their contract, and they maintain that a material term of the contract has not been fulfilled, and that accordingly they are entitled to keep the engine (which, I may say, is admittedly a first-class engine, and consumes less fuel and does more work than the engine which the defenders formerly used) without paying any part of the price, which, they say, has been more than extinguished by the loss which they have sustained through the contract not having been fulfilled.

"On receiving the letter of 1st October the defenders did not at once give the pursuers an order for an engine, but on 4th October wrote a letter which, although addressed to the pursuers, was intended for Dunkerton, and was sent to him.

"In that letter the defenders say,—'The price is certainly a stiff one. We presume it includes the erection and starting of the engine? and is also dependent upon the fuel consumption turning out as you calculate.' The defenders then draw attention to the estimate of the power required to drive a brick-making machine, upon which Dunkerton's calculations in the instructive and very full opinion by the Lord Ordinary, in which I concur, in common, I believe, with your Lordships, and what I shall say will be supplementary to his Lordship's opinion rather than an independent and complete examination of the whole case.

The question is whether, in the sale of a steam-engine, a guarantee of a very peculiar nature was given—a guarantee which I shall consider more fully, but which, in the meantime, I may say shortly is to the effect that the engine, when applied to driving brick-making machinery, is guaranteed to turn out so many bricks per working day—I think 30,000 bricks per day of ten hours. Whatever view may be taken of the merits of the case, this guarantee or warranty, if given, is undoubtedly an undertaking in writing, because the contract was begun and completed by correspondence. The most important letter is a letter dated 1st October 1898, written by the travelling agent of the makers to the defender, Mr Stein, who was looking out for a new and more powerful engine for the purpose of driving his brick-making machinery. That is the first and important letter.

letter of 1st October had been based. The estimate evidently struck the defenders as being too low, and it was in fact too low. They then proceed, —'We understand you guaranteed the same steam consumption to Messrs Dobbie, Forbes, & Company. . . . We are strongly disposed towards the larger engine.'

"Dobbie, Forbes, & Company were a firm to whom the pursuers had supplied an engine which Mr Stein had seen. It appears that the pursuers had given a guarantee in regard to that engine that it would develop one indicated horse-power for a certain number of pounds of steam per hour. That is a kind of guarantee which the pursuers are willing to give, and are in the habit of giving; but they never give a guarantee in regard to the amount of fuel which will be required, because that is a matter which does not depend only upon the engine, but upon other things over which they have no control, such as the character of the boiler and of the work to be performed.

"Whether the defenders were or were not aware of that I do not know, but it is to be noticed that in their letter of 4th October they used the word 'guarantee' in reference to steam, and only refer to what was said in the letter of 1st October about the consumption of fuel as calculations. Further, the natural inference, from the way in which the steam guarantee to Dobbie & Company is referred to, is that the guarantee which the defenders wanted, and understood that Dunkerton was giving to them, was of the same character. Mr Stein said that the word 'steam' must have been written by mistake instead of 'fuel,' because he did not know anything about a guarantee of steam. I cannot accept that explanation, but I think that at that time Mr Stein was under the impression that if the amount of steam was guaranteed, that necessarily involved a guarantee of the amount of fuel required. What Mr Stein did not then know, or did not take into consideration, was that that depended upon whether the coal actually used was the same as that upon which the calculation of steam had proceeded, because of course a given quantity of dross will not produce so much steam as the same quantity of best Welsh coal. That misapprehension on Mr Stein's part seems to me to explain a good deal of the misunderstanding which has arisen between him and the pursuers.

"Dunkerton answered the defenders' letter of the 4th October upon the 7th. That letter is very long, and is directed chiefly to setting out the merits of the pursuers' engines, and there are only one or two passages which have any bearing on the present case.

"In regard to the power which he had assumed in his letter of the

Robey & Co. Limited, v. Stein & Co.

And then on 12th October there comes a letter from Mr Stein in which he says that he is prepared to order an engine of one of the two classes specified "subject to the guarantees of coal consumption being fulfilled." Now, there was some little correspondence following the letter of 12th October, but the end of it was that Messrs Robey, the pursuers, said they would inquire at Mr Dunkerton, their representative, who had initiated the bargain, and we know from the evidence that no inquiry was made—the matter was overlooked—and so the obligation of the pursuers must be found in the writings which I have referred to.

Now, a noticeable feature in the case is that while the case has been argued to us by the defenders as a claim founded on the Sale of Goods Act, which says that a warranty, or, as it is interpreted, a material condition of the contract of sale may be set up in diminution or extinction of the price, there is in this record no reference to the Sale of Goods Act that I can discover either in the condescendence or in the pleas, and no statement there of any warranty such as would satisfy the descriptive words of 1st October as being required to drive a brick-making machine, Dunkerton said that he had taken the figure given by the makers of the machine, which he thought more reliable than diagrams which he had taken himself. He then wrote: 'We wish further to say that our calculations were based upon a 40 h.p. nominal engine' (that is the smaller engine), 'but noticing that you are thinking of adopting the 50 h.p. engine, it is only fair on our part to point out that with the increase of power the consumpt will also increase slightly, and instead of 15 lbs. of steam per i.h.p., it will be 17 lbs. Again, working at half-load will of course not be quite so economical, and the steam consumpt will then be approximately 22 lbs. So, assuming you work at first with about three-quarter-load, the consumpt will be about 19 lbs.'

"It is plain that Dunkerton is there speaking of the amount of steam required and not of the consumption of coal, but I do not think that the pursuers can take much benefit from that fact, because it is not at all inconsistent with the letter of 1st October. In the latter letter, Dunkerton's calculation is that 1½ lbs. of coal will develop 15 lbs. of steam, and that 15 lbs. of steam will develop 1 i.h.p. per hour, and that accordingly 1½ lbs. of coal will develop 1 i.h.p. per hour. Now, all that he says in the letter of the 7th October is that with the larger engine, 17 to 22 lbs. instead of 15 lbs. of steam will be required to develop one indicated horse power, and therefore Mr Stein was entitled to assume that the only alteration which required to be made upon the calculations of the letter of the 1st, in order to make them applicable to the larger engine, was to increase the 1½ lbs. of coal in proportion to the difference between 15 and 17, or 22.

"The next letter was written by the defenders on 12th October, and was sent to the pursuers at Lincoln. Whether it was sent there directly by the defenders or through Dunkerton, I do not know, but the defenders were aware that it was being sent to Lincoln to be dealt with at the head office of the company. In that letter the defenders confirmed the order for an engine of the larger type, in terms of the specification and estimate, and then they added, 'subject to your guarantees of fuel consumption being fulfilled.'

"The pursuers at that time did not know that Dunkerton had written the letter of 1st October, or that he had made any representations as to the consumption of fuel. Dunkerton, however, had communicated with them in regard to the steam required, and they had told him that 17 lbs. of steam would be required for one horse power, and had apparently intimated their

the statute, or which would at common law amount to an independent undertaking. Perhaps on a strict construction of this record it might be held that there was no relevant defence to the action for the price, but as the case has been argued and advised in the Outer-House on the basis of an averment of such a warranty—which certainly was made clear in the argument—I propose to follow the Lord Ordinary in considering the question whether such a guarantee or warranty was given.

It is to be observed that the defenders' letter of 12th October speaks of an existing guarantee contained in the letter of 1st October from Robey & Company, which I may describe generally as a specification of the engine which they proposed to furnish. It is not said in the defenders' letter, "I agree to take an engine on the basis of your letter, provided you guarantee all the representations which are made in that letter." Nothing approaching to that is suggested. What is said is, "We give the order subject to something which we call your guarantee of coal consumption." And therefore it seems to me that the question to be considered is whether there is in willingness to give a guarantee to that effect. Mr Richardson (the managing director of the pursuers' company), accordingly assumed that the reference in the defenders' letter to a guarantee of fuel consumption really referred to steam consumption. He therefore wrote a letter to the defenders on 14th October, in which, after accepting the order, he said: 'With regard to the steam consumption, we have to state that one of our engines, slightly larger than the above, was lately tested by the authorities of Durham University, and came to somewhat less than the figure you give, viz., about 17 lbs., but to carry out the tests to prove this at your works means running to a considerable expense, which, however, we shall be glad to do on your agreeing to pay for the skilled men and apparatus we should have to send up to Bonnybridge for that purpose. It would be approximately £50.'

"In that letter Mr Richardson was in error in saying that 17 lbs. of steam had been given by the defenders. He understood, however, from communications which he had received from Dunkerton that the figure which the defenders wanted was 17 lbs.

"On the 15th October the defenders wrote to the pursuers: 'It is not necessary to send skilled men from Lincoln at considerable expense, as on the 1st inst. you gave us the fuel per 10,000 bricks, and it will be easily ascertained without expense.'

"On the 17th the pursuers replied:—'We are not quite clear what is meant by the fuel for 10,000 bricks, but this probably refers to some conversation between you and our Mr Dunkerton. We have referred the matter to him.'

"That letter shewed the defenders quite clearly that the pursuers did not know of the letter of 1st October, and were not aware of any guarantee of fuel consumption having been given. I think, however, that the reference to Dunkerton justified the defenders in assuming that the latter had full authority to deal with the matter.

"There is only one more letter to which it is necessary to refer. On the 18th October the defenders replied to the pursuers' letter of the 17th: 'Yours of yesterday. We note you have referred the matter to Mr Dunkerton, whose letter of 1st inst. goes fully into the fuel consumption, and on which our decision was based.'

"That letter concluded the correspondence as regarded the question of fuel consumption, which was not again brought up until the engine had been fitted up and was working in the defenders' works.

"The defenders did not after their letter of 18th October again specially the pursuers' letter of 1st October any guarantee which can be represented in a reasonable sense as a guarantee of coal consumption.

Now, the part of the letter of 1st October which is founded on may be described as an argumentative statement of the merits of the pursuers' engine based on calculations, and with an invitation to the intending purchaser to apply the same method of calculation to determine the efficiency of an inferior engine—I presume such an engine as he had at that time in use, but an engine of greater horse-power. And then it is said, "You will see that by taking our engine you will effect such a saving of coal as will speedily compensate you for the larger price." The exact words are—"You will find that the difference of cost between this and an inferior type of engine will be made up in a very short time." Among the data of calculation we have this line—"Fifteen pounds of steam develop one horse-power per hour." Now that, I take it, was a representation as to the efficiency or performance of the engine to be supplied, because it is common ground that the test of efficiency of a steam-engine is the quantity of power communicate with Dunkerton upon the subject, but apparently rested satisfied with the letter of 1st October.

"It seems to me that both parties were somewhat negligent in allowing the question of the consumption of coal to remain in such a vague position. When they were informed by the defenders that they were relying upon a letter from Dunkerton, the natural thing for the pursuers to have done would have been to get a copy of Dunkerton's letter. Why they did not do so appears to have been that Mr Richardson having told Dunkerton that the pursuers would guarantee 17 lbs. of steam, it never occurred to him that Dunkerton could have given any other guarantee. Further, a guarantee of steam is in a certain sense a guarantee of coal consumption, because the person working the engine can ascertain what amount of the coal which he uses is required to produce a given amount of steam, and that is what the pursuers understood the defenders to refer to in their letter of 15th October when they said that it was not necessary to send a skilled man to their works, 'as it will be easily ascertained without expense.' The chief mistake which Dunkerton had made in his calculations was that he assumed that dross at 4s. a ton would produce as much steam as the best Welsh coal. Naturally it never occurred to the pursuers that Dunkerton could have made such an obvious mistake, and if he had not done so his calculations would not have been far from the truth.

"On the other hand, the defenders saw from the pursuers' letters that they had never heard of a guarantee of coal consumption being given, and that what they were willing to give was a guarantee of steam, of the amount (17 lbs.) mentioned in Dunkerton's letter of the 7th October. The defenders must also have gathered that up to the date of the pursuers' letter of 17th October the latter had not seen Dunkerton's letter of 1st October. In these circumstances it would have been prudent and reasonable for the defenders either to send to the pursuers a copy of Dunkerton's letter, or to state specifically what was the guarantee which they considered that they had received, and which they now say they regarded as essential. That such a course would have been a proper one is, I think, the more apparent when it is considered that the letter of 1st October contained no specification as to the amount of coal required for the engine which the defenders had actually ordered.

"While therefore both parties seem to me to have been to blame for the misunderstanding which arose, I think that the result of the letters of 17th and 18th October was just to leave the matter upon the letter of 1st October for what it was worth, because the pursuers referred the defenders which it will develop upon being supplied with a given quantity of steam. I may observe that it is undisputed that the pursuers had nothing to do with the steam production. It was not intended that a new boiler should be furnished; the steam production was such as the defenders' existing boiler enabled them to produce. But I think it must be taken that when the pursuers' representative says—"Fifteen pounds of steam develop one horse-power per hour," that is a representation as to the efficiency of the engine which they were to furnish, and like all the parts of the specification—the double cylinder, the valves, and all the rest of it—is a thing that they intended to be bound by. It is no doubt a material term of the contract, and therefore this particular statement appears to me to satisfy the description of a warranty in the Sale of Goods Act, and to be binding on the pursuers.

I think it was not disputed by their counsel that they were bound in terms of that representation; but then they say—and I do not think this is open to doubt—that the expectation held out by these words has been completely fulfilled, and that the engine supplied does develop one horse-power per fifteen pounds of steam supplied to it. That, of course, does not satisfy the defender's case, and while I should desire, perhaps, greater definiteness in the statement of the guarantee which, they say, was granted, and especially that it should have been put definitely on the record, I understand them to say that the result of this letter is that Messrs Robey guaranteed that, with the defenders' boiler and the pursuers' engine and the defenders' brick-making machinery all working in an efficient manner, there would be an output of 30,000 bricks per day at a cost of 4s. 4d. in coal. Now, if such a guarantee was given or was intended, it was certainly not given in direct words, but it is said to be given as the result of certain statements, certain data, and calculations founded on these data. Now, as the guarantee is an inference from an argumentative statement, it follows, in my opinion, that in order to arrive at such a guarantee we must hold that the pursuers guaranteed all the facts on which their calculation was based, and from which it is said that this result was undertaken by the pursuers. Of course the pursuers were dependent on the defenders for information as to the efficiency of their boiler. They were also dependent on them, not only as to the capacity of the brick-making machines for turning out 30,000 bricks a day, but also as to the estimated horse-power which would be necessary to drive the brick-making machinery. This, I see, is stated in the letter of 1st October at 135 horse-power, and therefore as this is a guarantee which is to be constructed by the Court out of the materials in this letter, we must hold that the pursuers' representative not only guaranteed the accuracy of the assumptions which they made as to the amount of to Dunkerton, and the defenders were content to rest upon the letter which they had already received from him. Now, I have already expressed my opinion upon the construction of that letter, namely, that the calculations as to the amount of coal required did not amount to a guarantee, but were merely representations as to the capacity of the engines, made for the purpose of inducing the defenders to give the pursuers an order.

"I am therefore of opinion that there was no warranty, and that accordingly there has been no breach of warranty, and that the defender is liable in payment of the price of the engine. . . ."

steam which would be produced from one pound of coal, depending partly on unknown data and partly on the efficiency of the boiler, but that they also guaranteed the performance of the brick-making machines which were at work in the defenders' establishment, and the number of units of horse-power that were necessary to drive them. But as to the letter, I think it was conceded by Mr Ure, and necessarily conceded, that it was quite impossible to read the letter of 1st October as containing any such guarantee. It was conceded that these were data supplied by the defenders themselves; that Mr Dunkerton, the pursuers' representative, was dependent on that information for the statement which forms one of the elements of the calculation; and therefore that that was not one of the things which entered into the guarantee. But then, if by such reasoning we are to arrive at the conclusion that the brick-making machines were not guaranteed, just as little can I suppose that the steam production was guaranteed, because that was not a thing entering into the contract of sale, nor a thing over which the pursuers had any control. They were dependent either on the information which they got from the defenders, or upon data in books of reference. It appears that the item, "1½ lbs. of coal develop 15 lbs. of steam," was taken from a text-book. It was certainly untrue in fact as applied to engine coal. But if the purpose of the letter was only to furnish a comparison between the work that might be got out of one of Messrs Robey's engines and the work that could be got out of an inferior engine—and certainly that is what the words of the letter seem to indicate—then the element of the amount of coal necessary to produce fifteen pounds of steam became very unimportant, because, as observed by your Lordship in the chair in the course of the argument, it was just the same as if an unknown quantity, x, were introduced into both branches of the calculation, and then, when one result is divided by the other, to see what the amount of saving will be, this quantity disappears from the calculation. In any view this warranty, which would not be a warranty under the Sale of Goods Act, but a warranty of a collateral matter altogether, must be considered in conformity with a rule very well established—though there are perhaps more illustrations of it in the English Reports than in ours—that a question whether a collateral representation amounts to a warranty or not is a question of intention to be deduced from the language used, and the facts of the case with reference to which the representation was made. Now, when that test is applied, we find, in the first place, that the purpose of the representation was a comparison of the efficiency of two engines. Then the representation, though it is not said from where it came, was in its nature one which Mr Dunkerton could not be held as stating from his own knowledge. Lastly—and I think this is really the determining consideration—there are no words of undertaking used; and therefore I come to the conclusion that we have here an entire absence of all the elements which would go to make up a warranty, or collateral representation having the effect of a warranty, regarding the production of steam from coal. But if that datum, which is the basis of the whole calculation, is not guaranteed, it follows, in my opinion, that the result is not guaranteed, because it is admitted also that the other elements—the efficiency of the brick-making machines and the power necessary to drive them—were no part of the alleged undertaking.

No. 45.

Dec. 14, 1900.
Robey & Co., Limited, v. Stein & Co.

In what I have said I do not mean to express any doubt that if proper words of undertaking had been used in the concluding part of the letter—if it had been said: "We guarantee that with the engine described you will be able to produce with your existing machinery and appliances thirty thousand bricks a day of ten hours"—that would have been binding on the pursuers, however absurd, however foolish the conduct of their representative might be in giving it. But it is a very different case when the question is not whether a guarantee in certain words is to be enforced, but whether you are to spell such a very improbable and unusual undertaking out of a letter which purports to be something quite different. Then, I say, the rule must be applied that it is a question of intention whether the words used amounted to a warranty or not; and on such question I have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that no such warranty was in fact given.

It is right to notice that while I think the purpose of the letter was comparison, it must be conceded to the defenders that a statement beginning "1½ lbs. coal develop 15 lbs. of steam" amounts to a representation which was part of a set of representations intended to induce a contract. It is admitted, or at any rate it is quite clear, that it was an innocent misrepresentation founded on a misunderstanding of the data contained in a text-book. The misunderstanding was in applying to engine coal a statement of the productiveness of standard coal. Now, if this had been discovered in time, I do not doubt that relief in another form might have been obtained by the defenders. In other words, they might have rescinded the contract on the ground of error induced by the act of the pursuers' agent. But the defenders are no longer in a position to rescind the contract, and they are not claiming to rescind the contract; and in the absence of fraud, I cannot hold that such a misrepresentation will furnish any legal foundation for a claim of damages.

These are the leading points in the case, and I have only to add, as I said at the beginning, that I also concur in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Dec. 20, 1900. Whyte v. Glass.

1ST DIVISION. Dean of Guild Court, Glasgow.

ON 31st March 1900 Peter Glass, builder, Glasgow, presented a petition to the Glasgow Dean of Guild Court for a warrant to erect certain buildings on ground fronting Rutherglen Road, Glasgow. The petitioner stated that he intended to take down the existing buildings occupying the ground in question, and to erect in their place the new buildings for which a lining was craved. The new buildings were to be two tenements of shops and dwelling-houses, three storeys in height, as shewn on the plans produced.

The petition was opposed by John Whyte, Master of Works for the City of Glasgow, who stated that the buildings proposed would be only 16 feet from the centre of Rutherglen Road, which was a turnpike road, "whereas said buildings should be erected 25 feet from the centre of said road in terms of the Turnpike Roads Act, 1831, section 91, and the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, section 366."*

The petitioner in his answer to these objections admitted that the Rutherglen Road was a turnpike road, and that the new buildings would be 16 feet from the centre of the road. He averred:—"(1) That there are presently existing on the petitioner's ground old buildings which were erected long before the Turnpike Roads Act, 1831; (2) that the petitioner proposes to take down these buildings and erect in their place the buildings for which a lining is asked; and (3) that the proposed new buildings will not be nearer the centre of Rutherglen Road than the existing buildings, but will be on the same building line. Section 91 of the Turnpike Roads Act, 1831, and section 366 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, founded on by the objector, only apply to sites which have never been built upon, and have no application in the present case."

The Dean of Guild on 7th August 1900 pronounced an interlocutor, finding "that section 91 of the Turnpike Act of 1831, founded on by the objector, does not apply to the erection of new buildings on the site of buildings presently existing and erected before the passing of the said Act," and granting warrant to erect the proposed tenements.†

The Master of Works appealed to the First Division.

Argued for the appellant;—This was a case of the erection of a new building, not the alteration of an old one. It was thus distinguished from Bruce v. Whyte.[1] The admission of counsel in the

* Section 91 of the Turnpike Roads Act, 1831, is quoted in the rubric.

The Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), enacts, sec. 366,—"The Dean of Guild shall not grant a warrant to erect any building except a stone wall not exceeding six feet in height . . . within thirty feet of the centre of any portion of a turnpike road within the city, which is relinquished by the trustees thereof, and is assumed by [the Magistrates and Council] as a public street under the powers of this Act, unless the said building could have been erected within a less distance of the centre of the road without contravention of the Acts relating to the said road."

† "NOTE.—The petitioner proposes to take down his existing buildings and to erect new tenements in their place. He avers that the existing buildings were erected before the passing of the Turnpike Roads Act, 1831. The Master of Works has not denied this, but maintains that section 91 of the said Act applies to the erection of new buildings, even though in place of existing buildings, and on the same site. The decision in Macdonald v. Commissioners of Fort-William, 22 R. 551, seems conclusive in favour of the petitioner's construction of the section."

Dec. 20, 1900.
Whyte v. Glass.

Fort-William case[1] deprived it of any value as a precedent on the point now raised. There was no reason why the prohibition should be confined to buildings on new or previously unbuilt on sites; the policy of the Act was as seriously invaded when a one storey tenement was replaced by one of three storeys as when the latter had been erected on a new site; its effect in both cases was to prevent the free access of air and light to the road.

Argued for the respondent;—The statute was not intended to apply when there were buildings lawfully on the ground before it came into operation, otherwise the words "building, wall, &c." would cover alterations and additions. The contention now advanced if sound, and if taken along with the case of Bruce v. Whyte,[2] would involve the drawing of a distinction between building on the line of a front wall after its total demolition and building on the wall after partial demolition, e.g., after it had been reduced to a height of one foot or one inch from the ground. The appellant's view was thus logically inconsistent with the case of Bruce v. Whyte.[2] The true view was that an owner was not restricted while operating within old building lines, lawfully adopted before the Act was in existence. Within these lines he might not only alter but reconstruct. The judgment in the Fort-William case[1] could not fairly be inferred to have proceeded entirely on the admission made by counsel. It was a direct authority in the respondent's favour. Acts like the present presumably made regulations for building on new sites only.[3]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After stating the facts)—The provision of section 91 of the Turnpike Roads Act, 1831, is that "no houses, walls, or other buildings above 7 feet high shall be erected without the consent of the trustees previously obtained in writing, and no new enclosures or plantations shall be made within the distance of 25 feet from the centre of any turnpike road," and the important general question now raised is whether that section only prohibits the erection of buildings within the specified distance from the centre of a turnpike road where no buildings existed on the ground at the time when the Act of 1831 was passed, and does not apply to any case in which buildings existed on the ground at that date, but have been subsequently removed.

The prohibition in section 91 is expressed as a universal negative, no such restriction of its scope as is contended for by the respondent is to be found in it, and I am unable to see any sufficient reason for holding such a restriction to be implied. The section does not require that buildings already existing within the specified distance of the centre of the road shall be removed, but its prohibitory words appear to me to apply universally where there is no building on the ground at the time when the question arises and it is proposed to build, whether there has or has not previously been a building there. All the reasons which have been suggested for the prohibition appear to me to apply as strongly to ground on which there were buildings in 1831 as to ground which was then unbuilt upon, whether it was subsequently built upon or not.

In this connection it is to be observed that while the words "enclosures and plantations" in section 91 are qualified by the adjective "new," no such qualification is attached to the words "no houses, walls, or other buildings above 7 feet high," a difference which seems to me to emphasise the universality of the words last quoted.

The Dean of Guild's judgment appears to have been founded mainly, if not solely, upon the decision in the case of Macdonald v. Commissioners of Fort-William,[1] which, he says, seems conclusive in favour of the respondent's construction of the section. Upon referring to that case, however, it will be seen that the question upon which I have just expressed an opinion was not raised in it. The Lord Justice-Clerk said in his judgment,—"Mr Thomson has argued the case upon the footing that the section would not apply supposing that buildings were taken down and rebuilt immediately for the purpose of improvement and renewal. He maintained, however, that according to the 'rules of good sense,' as he phrased it, the section would apply to cases where there had been an interval between the demolition and reconstruction of buildings,—what interval he did not specify." The decision was that section 91 did not apply to the site of a house which had been demolished thirty years before. As the point upon which the determination of the question in this case should, in my judgment, turn, was not raised, or, if raised, was given up, in that case, the decision pronounced in it cannot be an authority upon that point. The respondent also relied upon the case of Pitman v. Burnett's Trustees.[2] The question in that case, however, turned upon a different statutory enactment, viz., section 127 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, upon the terms of which the Court considered it to be clear that it was intended to apply only to the case of streets and courts referred to in the three preceding sections,—that is to say, new streets and courts. The decision has not, in my judgment, any bearing on the present case. The respondent also founded upon the recent decision in Bruce v. Whyte[3] as supporting his contention, but that decision is not in point, inasmuch as it related not to the "erection" of new buildings (i.e. to building from the ground) but to the "alteration" within the meaning of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, of existing buildings.

Another example of the kind of policy which appears to have dictated section 91 of the Turnpike Roads Act of 1831, in its application to such a case as the present, is to be found in section 162 of the General Police and Improvement Act of 1862, and section 158 of the General Police Act of 1892, which requires that when a house projecting beyond the line of a street is pulled down with a view to its being rebuilt, the proprietor shall set the new buildings back as specified in these sections.

If the views now expressed in regard to the construction and effect of section 91 of the Turnpike Roads Act of 1831 are correct, it follows that section 366 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, prohibited the Dean of Guild from granting warrant to erect any building except a stone wall not exceeding 6 feet in height within 25 feet from the centre of Rutherglen Road, and that his interlocutor of 7th August 1900 should be recalled, and the cause remitted to him to give effect to the restrictive provision contained in section 91 of the Turnpike Roads Act of 1831. The distance mentioned in section 366, as applicable to the case of turnpike roads, is 30 feet, but it concludes with the words "unless the said building could have been erected within a less distance of the centre of such turnpike road without contravention of the Acts relating to the said road," and a building could have been erected 25 feet from the centre of the road in question without contravening section 91 of the Turnpike Roads Act, 1831, which applied to it.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur, and have very little to add.

According to the plain and literal meaning of the General Road Act, referred to in the Glasgow local statute, there is an unqualified prohibition against the erection of buildings within a certain distance of the centre of a turnpike road, unless where the consent of the road authority has previously been obtained. In this proceeding it is sought to put a qualification on the enactment, to the effect that it is not to apply to buildings erected on sites which have previously been built over. It is a safe rule in the interpretation of statutes that an artificial construction or limitation is never to be introduced except to avoid inconsistency or ambiguity in relation to other provisions of the same statute. If that rule is applied to this case, the plain meaning of this provision must receive effect.

There is one other observation which I desire to make, although I do not rest my opinion on it. If the motive of the enactment be the convenience of giving access of light and air to the road by prohibiting the erection of structures which would exclude them, then this motive must apply equally to old sites as to new. It would be a strange method of carrying out the object of the statute to allow a building of one storey to be pulled down and replaced by one of three or five storeys, while the erection of high buildings on new ground is prohibited.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have had the advantage of reading your Lordship's opinion, and I entirely concur.

The LORD PRESIDENT.—Lord Adam, who is engaged in another Court, asks me to say that he has also read my opinion, and entirely concurs in it.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild, dated 7th August 1900: Find (1) . . . (2) that Rutherglen Road is a turnpike road, and that the buildings which the respondent proposes to erect would be only 16 feet or thereby from the centre of that road; (3) that the buildings at present on the respondent's said ground were erected prior to the passing of the Turnpike Roads Act, 1831, and that the proposed new buildings would not be nearer to the centre of Rutherglen Road than the existing buildings; (4) that section 91 of the Turnpike Roads Act, 1831, and section 366 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, apply to the case, and that in respect of the provisions contained in the said sections the respondent is not entitled to erect any buildings above 7 feet high within a distance of 25 feet from the centre of Rutherglen Road without the consent of the Magistrates and Council of the city of Glasgow as coming in place of the trustees of the said road previously obtained; (5) that no such consent has been obtained: Remit to the Dean of Guild to refuse the prayer of the petition in so far as it craves authority to erect buildings on the respondent's said ground within 25 feet of the centre of Rutherglen Road, and to decern; and thereafter, to proceed as accords: Find the appellant entitled to expenses."

Expenses—Several Defenders—Joint trial of two actions for reparation against different Defenders—Verdict for Pursuer in one action and for Defender in the other—Defenders represented by same counsel and agent.—Crawford, founding upon statements in letters written by Dunlop, a law-agent, on the instructions of Adams, Dunlop's client, sued Adams and Dunlop in separate actions of damages for slander. The actions were sent to trial together. The verdict was for the pursuer in the action against Adams, and for Dunlop in the action in which he was the defender. Adams and Dunlop were represented at the trial by the same counsel and agent, and their expenses were, quoad the trial, in all respects joint. The successful party in each action was found entitled to expenses.

Held, approving of the Auditor's reports, (1) that the pursuer, as the successful party in the action against Adams, was entitled to the whole expenses incurred by him, including his whole expenses at the trial, in respect these expenses were the expenses to which the pursuer would have been entitled had Adams been the only defender; and (2) that Dunlop was entitled to recover from the pursuer his whole expenses down to the trial, and to one-half only of the expenses incurred by the defenders at the trial, this being the amount of his outlay.

2D DIVISION. (SEE 2 F. 987.)

These were two actions of damages for slander brought by Andrew Rennie Crawford, architect, 101 West Nile Street, Glasgow, respectively against John K. Adams, joiner, Westmuir Street, Glasgow, and R. Murray Dunlop, writer, 136 Wellington Street, Glasgow. Dunlop was Adams' law-agent, and the actions were founded on statements in certain letters written by Dunlop on the instructions of Adams, but containing expressions which, according to the pursuer, shewed that Dunlop adopted the statements as his own.

The Court allowed an issue in each action (2 F. 987), and the actions were tried together before the Lord Justice-Clerk and a jury at the sittings in July 1900.

In the action against Adams the pursuer obtained a verdict with £50 as damages; in that against Dunlop the verdict was for the defender.

When, on 20th October, the cases came before the Court on the motions to apply the verdicts, questions were raised as to how far either of the successful parties was entitled to full expenses, looking to the circumstances that the pursuer had succeeded in one only of the actions and that the defenders had been represented by the same counsel and agents. The Court intimated that these questions might conveniently be settled upon a consideration of the Auditor's reports. The following interlocutors were then pronounced:—

In the action against Adams:—"Apply the verdict against the defender for payment to the pursuer of £50 sterling, and decern: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same and to report."

In the action against Dunlop:—"Apply the verdict; assoilzie the defender: Find him entitled to expenses, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same and to report."

The Auditor dealt with the accounts of expenses thus:

The pursuer's account of expenses in the action against Adams:—In this action the pursuer, inter alia, charged the whole expenses incurred by him in connection with the preparation for and the conducting of the trial. The Auditor taxed the account in the ordinary way and allowed the whole amount of the account so taxed. At the discussion upon the Auditor's reports the defenders did not maintain that the amount so allowed was greater than it would have been had Adams been the only defender.

Dunlop's account of expenses in the action in which he was the successful defender:—The defenders were represented at the trial by the same counsel and agent, and their expenses were, quoad the preparation for and the conducting of the trial, entirely joint expenses. Dunlop included the whole of the defenders' expenses at the trial in his account. The Auditor in the first place taxed Dunlop's account in the ordinary way as if Dunlop had been the only defender; he then ascertained the total amount of the expenses connected with the trial, i.e. from the allowance of issues until the motion to apply the verdict. The total of these expenses, as already taxed, was £82, 19s. 8d. The Auditor then deducted £41, 9s. 10d. (being one-half of that amount) from the total amount of Dunlop's account as already taxed, and allowed the balance.*

The defenders objected to the Auditor's reports. They maintained that if the pursuer got the whole expenses incurred by him at the trial, Dunlop was entitled to the whole expenses of the defence at the trial; that if Dunlop got a half only of the expenses of the defence at the trial, the pursuer was entitled to half only of his expenses at the trial. The defenders admitted that Dunlop had paid only one-half of the expenses of the trial, Adams having paid the other half.

LORD TRAYNER.—The pursuer raised two actions of damages for slander, one against the defender Adams as having authorised and instructed the other defender (who was his law-agent) to write the letters complained of, and the other against the law-agent on account of statements in one of the letters made as of his own knowledge, and not merely as the agent of

* The Auditor appended the following note to his report on Dunlop's account:—"NOTE.—The circumstances of the present case seem to bring it under the rule laid down in Robertson v. Stewart, 15th July 1875, 2 R. 970, which the Auditor has therefore endeavoured to apply in the taxation of this account, and, as will be seen, a sum of £41, 9s. 10d. taxed off the account represents the extent to which the rule has been applied."

Adams. Separate issues were adjusted, but the trials were taken together. In the case against Adams the pursuer was successful; in the other case the verdict was for the defender.

In taxing the account of the pursuer's expenses in the case against Adams the Auditor has allowed the whole expenses; but in taxing the account for Dunlop he has allowed the full expenses down to the trial, but only half of the expenses after that date. The defenders object to this mode of dealing with the accounts, and maintain either that only one-half of the expense of the trial should be allowed to the pursuer, or that the whole expense of the trial should be allowed to Dunlop. I think that the Auditor is right in what he has done, and that the objection to his report should be repelled. It is the fact, not disputed, that the expense allowed to the pursuer by the Auditor is just what it would have been had there been only one defender. That expense is what Adams has been found liable for, and for that expense accordingly the pursuer is now entitled to decree. On the other hand, Dunlop, being associated in his defence with Adams, had to pay, and did pay, only one-half of the amount of counsel's fees and other expenses of the trial. If he gets that half of these expenses, he gets all he expended, and all that the pursuer occasioned by his action in which he was unsuccessful. If the whole of Dunlop's account as stated by him was allowed, that would be giving him more by one-half than the expense he has incurred, or if he shared the surplus with Adams, that would be in effect giving decree in favour of Adams for one-half of the expense of the trial, to which he is not and has not been found entitled. The Auditor has given the pursuer the whole expense to which he was put by having to proceed against Adams—nothing more. He has given Dunlop the whole expense to which he was put, and which he disbursed, in the action in which he was successful—nothing less. The result, in my opinion, is that the Auditor has carried out exactly what we determined in the matter of expenses, and that the principle on which he has proceeded is right.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT approved of the Auditor's reports.

THE RIGHT HON THE EARL OF ROSSLYN AND OTHERS (Rosslyn's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers).—Dundas, Q.C.—Clyde.

Trust—Trust-deed granted by solvent proprietor to prevent dilapidation of family estates—Bankruptcy—Voluntary Trust-deed—Supervening Bankruptcy.—In 1893 a Scotch Earl, on the narrative that he had contracted large debts, and that V, his father-in-law, had agreed to lend him £40,000 in order to pay off certain unsecured debts, on the express condition that he should grant a trust-disposition of his whole estates for the purposes after written, and that he had agreed to do so, disponed to himself, his father-in-law, and another person, his whole heritable and moveable estates acquisita et acquirenda, with power to sell, in trust for the following purposes:—(1) For payment of the £40,000 advanced, and of future advances; (2) for payment of debts then due by the granter; (3) for such alimentary payments as the trustees should see fit to make to the granter and his family; (4) on the granter's death to convey the residue to the granter's widow and children, subject to his appointment, and failing appointment, to the child succeeding to the title. The trust was declared to be irrevocable by the granter unless with the consent and concurrence of the trustees, but it was declared that with such consent and concurrence it might be brought to an end, and the residue reconveyed to the Earl subject to the debts and liabilities then affecting it.

The trustees at once entered into possession, and recorded the disposition in the Register of Sasines.

In 1898, the Earl having, on his own petition, been adjudicated bankrupt in England, a trustee in bankruptcy was appointed upon his estates.

The trustee in bankruptcy then sued the trustees under the trust-disposition (1) for declarator that the estates comprehended in the trust-disposition had vested in the pursuer; (2) for decree ordaining the defenders to denude in his favour to such extent at least as would enable the pursuer to meet the liabilities of the bankrupt out of the estates; and (3) for an accounting by the defenders.

The trustees in their defences stated that all the unsecured debts incurred prior to the date of the trust-deed had been paid out of V's advances.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Pearson) that the trust-disposition had in hoc statu been superseded by the bankruptcy, that the trustees were bound to denude of the estate and effects, subject to any valid securities over the estate and effects, and on satisfaction of such rights of lien or indemnity as they might have, in favour of the trustee in bankruptcy, and that they were bound to count and reckon with him for their intromissions,—diss. Lord Young, who held (1) that the truster being solvent when he granted the disposition, was entitled to divest himself absolutely of his estates, and create a trust for behoof of his family, and had effectually done so to the exclusion of claims by future creditors, but that the disposition of acquirenda was invalid; and (2) that V had right, as matter of contract, to have the trust executed by the trustees according to the law of Scotland till its termination.

Averments which held not relevant to support a conclusion for reduction of the trust-disposition.

2D DIVISION. Lord Pearson.

THE EARL OF ROSSLYN in September 1890 succeeded to the title and estates pertaining to the Earldom of Rosslyn. In July of the same year he had married the daughter of Robert Charles De Grey Vyner of Fairfield House, York.

On 25th July 1893 he executed a disposition of his whole heritable and moveable estates then belonging to him or which he might acquire during his life in favour of himself and his father-in-law, Mr Vyner, and Mr Bennett, solicitor in London, in trust for certain purposes after mentioned. The disposition was recorded in the Register of Sasines on 3d August 1893, and subsequently the trustees entered into the possession and management of the estates. Mr Bennett having resigned in September 1896, was succeeded by Mr Cullimore, solicitor in Chester; and in 1898 Lord Alwyne Compton was assumed into the trust.

In the autumn of 1897 Lord Rosslyn filed a petition in bankruptcy in London, the receiving order in which was pronounced on 11th November 1897. The adjudication in bankruptcy followed on 8th June 1898, on which date Frederick Seymour Salaman was "duly appointed and approved as trustee of the property of the Earl of Rosslyn" under the Bankruptcy Acts, 1883 and 1890.

On 30th December 1898, Mr Salaman, as trustee in the bankruptcy, raised the present action in the Court of Session against the trustees acting under the trust-disposition, concluding (1) for reduction of the trust-disposition, "at least to the extent to which said pretended disposition exists or is pleaded as a bar to the satisfaction of the pursuer's rights in or claims to the property and estate of the" Earl; (2) whether decree of reduction was granted or not, for declarator "that the means and estates, heritable and moveable, conveyed by the said pretended disposition are now, so far as unaffected by valid securities, vested in the pursuer as trustee foresaid, unencumbered by any trust in the person of the defenders created by said pretended disposition"; (3) for decree ordaining the defenders "to denude and divest themselves of the said means and estate, and to convey the same to the pursuer" "to such extent at least as may be necessary to enable him to pay the just creditors of the" Earl of Rosslyn; (4) for an accounting by the defenders of their intromissions with the trust-estate, and for payment of the true balance in their hands to the pursuer, "or at least of so much thereof as may be required to satisfy the claims of the just creditors of the" Earl, or failing such accounting, for payment of £10,000, which should in that case be held to be the true balance, or at anyrate of such sum as might be required to satisfy the creditors; (5) and alternatively to the foregoing conclusions, for payment of £10,000, or such sum as might be required to satisfy the claims of the just creditors of Lord Rosslyn.

The trust-disposition was in the following terms:—"I, the Right Honourable James Francis Harry St Clair Erskine, Earl of Rosslyn, considering that I have contracted debts and liabilities to a large amount, part of which is secured over my landed estates of Ravenscraig, Dysart, Roslin, Tyrie, and others, in the counties of Fife and Edinburgh, and upon other assets and funds belonging to me, and part of which is unsecured; and that in order to pay off certain unsecured debts I arranged to borrow a sum of £40,000, less or more, from Robert Charles De Grey Vyner, of Fairfield, in the county of York, Esquire, my father-in-law, who agreed to lend the same to me upon my granting in his favour a bond and assignation and disposition in security, or bonds and assignations and dispositions in security, over my said landed estates and certain policies of insurance on my life and other funds and assets, and upon the express condition that I should also grant a trust-disposition in manner and for the purposes underwritten, which I have agreed to do; and further, considering that the said Robert Charles De Grey Vyner has already advanced to me sums amounting to upwards of £16,000 to account of the said sum of £40,000, and that I have at or previous to the date hereof granted and delivered to him a bond and disposition and assignation in security for the said sum of £16,000, and that he agreed to advance to the trustees under these presents, for the purposes of the trust hereby created, such further sums as may be necessary for the payment of my debts, but not exceeding (along with the said sum of £16,000 already advanced), the said sum of £40,000 in all, unless the said Robert Charles De Grey Vyner shall be willing to make advances to the trustees in excess of that sum,—upon the said trustees, with or without my concurrence, granting in his favour a bond or bonds and dispositions and assignations in security for the sums so to be advanced: Therefore, in pursuance of the said arrangement, I do hereby dispone, convey, assign, transfer, and make over to and in favour of the said Robert Charles De Grey Vyner, Rowland Nevitt Bennett, Esquire, of Number 2 New Square, Lincoln's Inn, London, and subject to the fulfilment of the foregoing purposes, the trustees shall hold the whole residue of the trust-estate under their management for the uses and purposes after mentioned: (In the second place), While the said lands and others, or any other part or parts of the trust-estate, shall remain unsold, the trustees shall manage and administer the same in such way and manner as they in their uncontrolled discretion shall think proper; and in particular, and without prejudice to the foregoing general power of management and administration, the trustees shall (First) pay the expenses of these presents," and of the management of the trust; (Second) payment of the expenses incidental to the management of the estates, premiums on policies of insurance, &c., "and generally, all charges and expenditure which the said trustees shall in their uncontrolled discretion judge it necessary or expedient to incur, and may incur, in the management and preservation of the trust-estate while unsold as aforesaid; and with regard to Rosslyn Chapel, the trustees shall keep a separate account of the whole revenues that may be received or drawn by them in connection therewith, and shall apply the whole of the said revenues, if required by me, in the keeping up of the services in the said chapel and the payment of the incumbent, or for other purposes in connection with the said chapel, in such manner as I shall from time to time direct; . . . title and dignity of Earl of Rosslyn, and his heirs and assignees; and upon the termination of the trust, in the terms before referred to, the trustees shall denude of the residue of the trust-estate, and pay over, dispone, reconvey, and deliver the same to the person or persons entitled thereto, under the burden of all debts and charges then affecting the trust-estate, provided always that before denuding the trustees or any of them shall be entitled to obtain a full and complete discharge."

Power was given to the trustees to work all minerals in the estates, and full and uncontrolled power to sell and dispose of any part of the trust-estate, without prejudice to any of the powers before mentioned. The trust-disposition contained this provision,—"And I declare these presents to be irrevocable by me unless with the consent and concurrence of the trustees acting under these presents for the time; but it is hereby expressly declared that, with such consent and concurrence, this trust may at any time be brought to a close, and the residue of the trust-estate then in the hands or under the control of the trustees may be conveyed and made over to me, if the trustees shall think that proper or desirable in the circumstances, but subject always to the burden of all debts and liabilities then affecting the same: . . . And I consent to registration hereof for preservation and execution."

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 5) "The said Earl continued his course of reckless extravagance and gambling, and by the month of July 1893 he became still further involved in gambling and kindred debts to the amount of over £40,000. In the course of the period between his succession to the said estates and July 1893, it became manifest to the defenders, the said Earl and the said Mr Vyner and their advisers, and the friends and relations of the Rosslyn family, that measures would have to be concerted for protecting the said Earl and his family against his extravagance, and for saving any part of the estates that remained from the diligence of creditors, present and future. . . . The defenders thereupon, in contemplation of the bankruptcy of the said Earl, devised a scheme by which they intended to secure the defender Vyner against the advances he had made or might make to the said Earl, and at the same time prevent the general body of creditors of the said Earl from receiving payment out of his estate by diligence or otherwise in the future, but preserve said estates so far as not dilapidated for the benefit of the said Earl and his family." (Cond. 6) "In pursuance of said design the said Earl, on or about 25th July 1893, executed the deed or disposition under reduction, . . . conveying his whole estate to himself, his said father-in-law, and the latter's solicitor, Bennett, in trust for his own behoof and for behoof of his family."

(Cond. 7) " . . . The only consideration given by the defender Vyner was a loan of £16,000, and a promise of a future loan, both of which have been paid or are amply secured. The other defenders gave no consideration. . . . The pursuer believes and avers that the said estates were sufficient, if they had been properly managed or managed in the interests of all creditors, to meet all claims against them." (Cond. 10) "Said deed remained a latent deed until it was disclosed in the said Earl's bankruptcy proceedings. The creditors represented by the pursuer contracted with the said Earl on the faith of his being and remaining absolute owner of his whole means and estate. Under the said deed, however, but unknown to the creditors whom the pursuer represents, the defenders entered upon the possession and management of the Rosslyn estates, and they have continued said possession and management ever since." (Cond. 12) " . . . The unsecured creditors are chiefly tradesmen, and their debts, along with claims lodged by some moneylenders, amount to about £10,000, none of which have been paid or are secured. These claims extend in date from the year 1891 down to the date of the receiving order. . . ." (Cond. 13) " The said deed was a fraudulent device concerted between the bankrupt and his father-in-law and his father-in-law's agents, in contemplation of the said Earl's bankruptcy, for the purpose, or at all events with the effect, of screening the bankrupt's estate and reserving it for the bankrupt and his family's behoof, and of excluding the true and just creditors of the bankrupt from any estate left over after satisfying his father-in-law's advances. . . . The said deed was executed in the circumstances condescended on, and at a time when the said Earl was insolvent, and known by the defenders to be so." (Cond. 16) " . . . The defenders, through their agents, who also act for the Earl, have intimated that the said deed is a bar to the pursuer recovering even the reversion of the said Earl's estate after satisfying the secured creditors. The said Earl himself founds upon said deed as evidence of his having no estate available for his creditors. But for the carrying out of said scheme as condescended on, the pursuer believes and avers that the Rosslyn estates are even now sufficient to meet the claims of the creditors represented by the pursuer. . . ."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The said deed being a fraudulent conveyance and alienation of the whole of the said Earl's estate, executed when insolvent, or so as to create insolvency, and being to the prejudice of his just and lawful creditors, it ought to be reduced as concluded for. (2) The said conveyance and alienation being to conjunct and confident persons, without true, just, and necessary causes, and without a just price really paid and granted after or in contemplation of contracting lawful debts from true creditors, it is void and null under the Act 1621, cap. 18, or the common law, and should be reduced in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (3) Separatim, the said deed falls to be reduced in so far as it conveys and alienates estates belonging to the bankrupt beyond the amount of advances made at its date. (4) The said conveyance and alienation being in contravention of the Act 1696, cap. 5, it ought to be reduced. (5) The said deed having been a fraudulent device for relieving the bankrupt of his financial embarrassments and preserving his estate for his wife and children to the exclusion of lawful creditors, it ought to be reduced and decree pronounced in terms of the declaratory conclusions. (6) The said deed being a mere security writ in favour of the defender Vyner, and separatim having been granted without any onerous consideration, except to the extent of £16,000, it ought to be reduced quoad excessum and decree pronounced in favour of the pursuer in terms of the declaratory conclusions. (7) Esto that the bankrupt was solvent at the date of the deed challenged, its effect being to create insolvency as regards unsecured creditors, it ought to be reduced. (8) The defender, the said Earl of Rosslyn, having been adjudged bankrupt, and the pursuer being vested in his estate for the benefit of his creditors, the defenders are bound to denude thereof in his favour, and to count and reckon with him in respect of the estate alienated as aforesaid. No. 48.

Dec. 21, 1900. Salaman v. Rosslyn's Trustees.

The defenders averred;—(Ans. 7) "Explained that the consideration given by the defender Mr Vyner amounted to £45,000 (inclusive of the said loan of £16,000), together with such other sum or sums as might be advanced by him. Explained further that said loan of £16,000 and the further advances made by him, amounting in all to the said sum of £45,000, have not been paid off, and are not amply or sufficiently secured, and that there is a large arrear of interest thereon. Explained further that Mr Vyner has had to make further advances to meet deficiency of revenue. The total sum now due to Mr Vyner, including arrears of interest, amounts to £58,000 or thereby. Mr Vyner has been paid no interest on any part of the sums due to him since Martinmas 1895." (Ans. 12) "Denied that the claims of the creditors represented by the pursuer extend in date from 1891. Explained that all unsecured debts incurred prior to the date of the trust-deed were paid out of the funds advanced by Mr Vyner."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed. (4) The deed under reduction having been granted for full consideration and in bona fide, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (5) The said deed not being gratuitous, but having been granted in respect of obligations imposed on and undertaken by the Earl of Rosslyn as a condition of the advances made to him by the defender Vyner, is not reducible on the grounds contended for by the pursuer. (6) The said trust-deed having been granted by the Earl of Rosslyn when solvent, and for full consideration, and the said Earl being completely divested thereby of his estates, the defenders should be assoilzied. (7) The said deed, in so far as the same confers right or benefit on Lady Rosslyn, being truly the deed of the defender Mr Vyner and not of the Earl of Rosslyn, the same is not reducible at the pursuer's instance. (8) The said deed having been duly delivered to the trustees, and infeftment having been taken thereon years prior to the Earl of Rosslyn's sequestration, the defenders should be assoilzied. (9) In any view, until the advances made by the defender Mr Vyner on the security of, inter alia, the said trust-deed, and all interest thereon, and all expenses of carrying on the trust, are repaid, the defenders are entitled and bound to continue to administer the estate conveyed thereby, and the said advances, interest, and expenses being still due and unpaid, the present action is premature, and should be dismissed.

Having heard parties in the Procedure-roll, the Lord Ordinary (Pearson), on 19th April 1900, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has set forth a sufficient title to sue this action: Finds that no relevant or sufficient grounds are averred for reducing the trust-deed libelled, but that the same has been superseded by the bankruptcy of the Earl of Rosslyn, and that the trustees are bound to denude of the estate and effects thereby conveyed by him, and to make over the same to the pursuer for the purposes of the said bankruptcy, subject to any valid securities over the same, and to such rights of lien or indemnity as the trustees may have, and that they are bound to count and reckon with the pursuer for their intromissions as trustees foresaid with the said estate and effects: And before further answer appoints the defenders, by the third sederunt day in May next, to lodge (first) a minute condescending on the trust-estate presently vested in them or under their control as trustees foresaid; and (second) an account of their intromissions as trustees with the said estate and effects; and thereupon appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure: Reserves all questions of expenses, and grants leave to reclaim."*

* "OPINION.— . . . The defenders challenge the pursuer's title to sue. In my opinion his formal title is sufficiently instructed by the documents produced, taken in connection with the English Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and particularly sections 56, 57, and 134, and sections 44, 54, and 168 thereof.

"No question was argued before me as to which law was to be applied in dealing with the merits of the case on the assumption that the formal title was sustained. It was assumed that the pursuer's position as trustee in an English bankruptcy is analogous to that of a trustee in a Scottish sequestration, and the questions of relevancy, and also those relating to the position of the various parties interested under the trust-deed as affected by the supervening bankruptcy, were dealt with as questions of Scots law to be determined by reference to our own authorities.

"The trust-deed sought to be reduced, while it is a unilateral deed, bears to be granted in pursuance of an arrangement between the Earl and Mr Vyner."—(His Lordship narrated the provisions of the trust-disposition.)

"Of this trust-deed the pursuer now seeks reduction—either total reduction, or alternatively and at least 'to the extent to which said pretended disposition exists or is pleaded as a bar to the satisfaction of the pursuer's rights in or claims to the property and estate' of Lord Rosslyn. Secondly, and whether reduction is granted or not, there is a conclusion for declarator and denuding;—for declarator that the trust-estate is now, so far as unaffected by valid securities, vested in the pursuer as trustee, unencumbered by any trust in the person of the defenders, and for denuding thereof 'to such extent at least as may be necessary to enable him to pay the just creditors' of the Earl. Thirdly comes a conclusion for count and reckoning, and for payment of £10,000 or such other sum as may be the true balance of the trust-estate, 'or at least of so much thereof as may be required to satisfy the claims of the just creditors' of the Earl.

"These conclusions are, upon the statement of them, peculiar and unusual, so far as regards the lesser alternative which appears in each. But they are so framed in order to meet the alternatives (1) of the deed being reduced absolutely at common law or under the statutes, which would be followed by an accounting for the trustees' whole intromissions and payment to the pursuer of the whole balance; and (2) of the deed being held to be merely superseded by the English bankruptcy, so that the estate must be made available to the trustee for the purposes of that bankruptcy, but may revert to the trustees when these purposes are served.

"In considering, first, the relevancy of the statements made in support of the reductive conclusions, I observe that the case for insolvency presented by the pursuer discloses quite clearly a case of practical insolvency or present inability to meet current obligations, and not of absolute or ultimate insolvency. This is plain from the averments contained in the seventh and sixteenth articles of the condescendence, which indeed amount to an affirmation of solvency in the absolute sense of that term. Then again, this is not a deed which operates to make a solvent person insolvent, or makes any disposition of the estate to the prejudice of the then lawful creditors. On the contrary, its primary purpose is for payment of such creditors, and there is no residue unless and until they are all paid in full with interest. To that extent this is a deed which an insolvent person is quite entitled to grant, and mere insolvency is no bar to the efficacy of it (2 Bell's Comm. 387). These considerations are of themselves sufficient to exclude the remedy of total reduction which the pursuer seeks. Both under the Statute 1621 and at common law, the insolvency which must be

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong in holding that the trust-deed was superseded by the bankruptcy. This was not a trust-deed for creditors. The deed of 1893 placed the trustees in funds provided by Mr Vyner for the purpose of paying off Lord Rosslyn's creditors. But it conveyed Lord Rosslyn's estates to the trustees in security of the advances by Mr Vyner, and not for behoof of the creditors. The conveyance of the estates was part of the bargain on which the advances were made, and did not constitute a trust for creditors at all. This conveyance, with its absolute powers of administration and realisation, constituted an absolute security in favour of Mr Vyner, preferable to any sequestration, and there was nothing to prevent a man making a good security by way of trust.[1] The defenders were trustees in an onerous contract with Mr Vyner, and could not denude till the debt to him was paid. It was part and parcel of the consideration given for the advances that Mr Vyner should have the nursing of the security. It averred and proved in order to a successful challenge is absolute insolvency. In addition there must be a relevant averment of fraud; and although the word is used, in describing what is said to have been a fraudulent device to disappoint just creditors, I am unable to hold that fraud is relevantly averred. It is indeed alleged that the intention was to secure Mr Vyner in his advances, and at the same time prevent the general body of creditors from receiving payment out of the estate by diligence or otherwise in the future. But this is negatived by the terms of the trust-deed itself. Again, the thirteenth article of the condescendence, which summarises the matter, describes the deed as a fraudulent device concocted in contemplation of bankruptcy 'for the purpose or at all events with the effect' of screening the bankrupt's estate and reserving it for him and his family. Then the deed is said to have remained a latent deed. Yet it is not disputed that it was recorded in the Register of Sasines within a few days after its execution; and the pursuer himself avers that the trustees entered upon the possession and management of the estates, and have so continued ever since. The only other ground of reduction suggested is under the second part of the Act 1696, regarding undue preferences by way of infeftment for future debts. But the advances which the pursuer founds on in this part of his argument are, as I understand it, advances to the trustees for creditors, and not to the bankrupt; and to these the statute seems to have no application. I therefore hold that the pursuer's averments are not relevant to infer total reduction of the trust-deed on any of the grounds pleaded.

"As to the lesser alternative, of reduction of the trust-deed so far as it constitutes a bar to the pursuer's rights, it appears to me to be quite unnecessary. A supervening sequestration—and I assume that the same effect must be attributed to an English bankruptcy—completely supersedes a private trust, and the trustees are bound forthwith instantly to denude in favour of the trustee named in the sequestration (2 Bell's Comm. 391). I am not aware that in practice it has ever been held necessary in such a case to reduce the trust-deed. On the contrary, I apprehend that, according to the statement of the rule, the supervening sequestration does not extinguish the trust, but suspends it; and that after the purposes of the sequestration have been served, the trust may revive for the attainment of its ulterior purposes. The trust-estate will be made accessible to the trustee in bankruptcy, and he will take it subject to all valid securities, constituted either prior to the trust or by virtue of the provisions of the trust-deed itself and the infeftment of the trustees, or by the trustees themselves in the exercise was a further consideration stipulated for by Mr Vyner that there should be a provision for his daughter and her children, though the question whether the reversion in their favour was good was merely academic, seeing that the estate was insufficient to pay off the advances, and there could be no denuding till they were repaid. But the provision in favour of the wife and children was not a voluntary and non-onerous one by a husband stante matrimonio; it was part of the contract with Mr Vyner, and was therefore good. Further, Lord Rosslyn being solvent in 1893, and there being then no provision for his eldest son owing to the disentail of the estates, the provision which he then made for him, from which he would take no benefit till after Lord Rosslyn's death, was good. The trustees, without admitting any obligation, were quite willing to exhibit their accounts.

Argued for the respondent;—The trust-deed was an attempt to vest voluntarily the estate without consideration in conjunct and confident persons, and as such was reducible, but it was sufficient to plead that it was no bar to the trustee in bankruptcy assuming control of the estate. This was a deed for behoof of creditors, for the payment of the powers conferred on them. In this view, it does not appear to me to be material whether the pursuer in fact represents creditors whose debts were prior to the trust-deed. He represents subsequent creditors, and their interests are not provided for under any of the provisions of the deed, but must be vindicated in the bankruptcy proceedings. I do not know whether there will ultimately be a conflict between their interests and the interests of the bankrupt's wife and children under the residuary purpose of the trust. But I see nothing to prevent that question being worked out in the bankruptcy, for existing preferences will be saved, and, in so far as the wife and children have a valid security by reason of the trust, it will be available to them. At all events, I do not think that question could be properly tried in this action, to which they are not parties. If it were to be tried it would, I suppose, turn on the onerosity of the reversionary provision regarded either in itself or as the consideration stipulated for by Mr Vyner in favour of his daughter and her issue, as the counterpart of his obligation to advance the £40,000. But even in the latter view I do not see that this would entitle Mr Vyner to have the trust maintained as against a trustee in bankruptcy. Still less can he take up this position in the character of a legally secured creditor, as apparently the defenders do for him in their ninth plea. His preference will be preserved to him so far as it is a legal preference, and he cannot contend that because he stipulated for security, the trust must stand until he gets payment. His rights as creditor will be unimpaired; though no doubt in his character of trustee his intromissions with and administration of the money borrowed may, like all other acts of the trustees, be examinable. This, however, is appropriate to an accounting.

"The difficulty presented by the conclusions for count and reckoning is this—that the pursuer does not particularly disclose the extent of his pecuniary interest. He desires to recover such a sum as may be required to satisfy the claims of the Earl's just creditors. But if his right to denuding is absolute, as I think it is, it follows that there must be a general accounting, and if it should turn out that the creditors ranked in the bankruptcy are paid in full, he will hold the reversion for behoof of whom it may concern. That question is not hujus loci, as there may be no reversion. Nor do I consider it a good answer to the demand for an accounting to say that the secured debts will in all probability exhaust the estate. If he has a title to sue a count and reckoning, I do not think it is incumbent on him to shew beforehand that there will be a balance in his favour.

"I have pronounced findings giving effect to the above views. I would of debts, and, sequestration supervening, the trustee in bankruptcy superseded the trustees under the deed.[1] The fact that the deed was granted on the conditions contained in it did not make it the less a trust-deed for creditors. No contract with Mr Vyner could exclude the statutory right of the trustee in bankruptcy to administer. Mr Vyner was merely a heritable creditor, and could foreclose if he liked, but the deed gave him no right as against the trustee in bankruptcy to perpetuate the trust. The estate being handed over to the trustee in bankruptcy, could not affect Mr Vyner's interests; all valid securities under the deed would be protected. Nothing that the trustees had done up to now, intra vires of the deed, was challenged. The deed ceased to be a contract with Mr Vyner and became a provision by Lord Rosslyn for himself, his wife, and children, at the point where it provided them with a home. It was simply thereafter a settlement in trust by Lord Rosslyn for himself and family. There was a distinct severance between the provisions and machinery for payment of debts and the provisions for disposal of residue. A man could not put his estate extra commercium unless he actually alienated it, and a spendthrift could not be put under trust to the effect of putting his estate beyond the reach of his future creditors unless he was absolutely divested. No doubt his estate might be put under trust to work off his debts and to provide an alimentary provision for himself and family, but the trust would be good only so long as not interfered with by sequestration. The question whether the reversion in favour of the widow and children was good against creditors could be worked out in the bankruptcy.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Earl of Rosslyn being embarrassed in consequence of the contraction of debt, in 1893 conveyed his whole estates to trustees in consideration of an advance made to him by his father-in-law, Mr Vyner, of £40,000, for the purpose of meeting his then existing liabilities. Under the conveyance, when the debts were paid the trustees were to hold "the whole residue of the trust-estate which may then remain under their management for behoof of my widow and children, or such one or more of my widow and children exclusive of the others or other, in such shares and proportions, and subject to such trusts and provisions, limitations and conditions as to vesting, payment, or otherwise, as I shall appoint have dismissed the reductive conclusions, but for a suggestion on the part of the pursuer that they may prove to be incidentally useful in the accounting, and I am willing to leave that chance open. I am not sure that I appreciate the view so put forward, and I rather think it was based on the possibility of objections to the acts and deeds of the trustees, which, however, would furnish no good ground for reducing the trust-deed in whole or in part.

"As to the matter of procedure, it seems to me the proper course is to ascertain the amount and particulars of the estate held by the defenders. A proof will, of course, not be excluded if the accounting should raise disputed questions of fact."

by any writing under my hand or by my last will, but not in contravention of any obligations undertaken by me in the settlements made on the occasion of my marriage, or in any relative deed or deeds, and failing such appointment, or in so far as the same shall not extend, then for such one of my issue as shall on my death succeed to the title and dignity of Earl of Rosslyn, and his heirs and assignees."

In 1897, the Earl having again become seriously embarrassed, filed a petition in England under which he was sequestrated, and the present pursuer was appointed trustee on the bankrupt estate. The practical question now at issue is, whether the trustee in bankruptcy is entitled to require the trustees to denude of the estate, so that he may enter into the control and management of the estate in the interest of the creditors whom he represents, and if so on what conditions. On the main question I concur in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, that the Earl's supervening bankruptcy supersedes the private trust established by the unilateral deed of the bankrupt, and that the trustee in bankruptcy is entitled to take possession for the protection and working out of the interests of the creditors who have claims against the Earl. In short, the ingathering of all that can be made available for the creditors is the proper right and duty of the trustee, and a voluntary trust cannot be allowed to stand in the way. The sequestration does not of course destroy the trust created by the trust-deed, nor relieve the bankrupt from his obligations under it. It suspends its operation only, so that the estate may be dealt with now in the interest not only of any person favoured by the deed, if he can maintain in law in the sequestration any right against the estate, but of all persons who have legal claims of debt against the bankrupt. After the trustee has fulfilled the duties incumbent on him under the statute, in adjudicating on claims, and satisfying those that are legally established, he will be of course bound to hold for those who have right thereto any reversion that may remain over, and it may be admitted or decided in the sequestration that he must reconvey to the trustees of the Earl. But that matter is entirely in the future, and does not require to be dealt with now. The bankruptcy trustee is now entitled to the declarator that he asks for, and to decree of denuding, subject to the reservations contained in the summons, and all reservation of proper outlays which the trustees have made in the management of the estate. And he is also entitled to a full accounting, that he may ascertain what, if anything, is available for the creditors now.

All questions of protected security or preferable claim will remain open, and the proper proceeding for having these dealt with is the process of sequestration.

I would move your Lordships to adhere to the decision of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Young.—The pursuer is trustee in the bankruptcy of Lord Rosslyn appointed in June 1898. The defenders are trust disponees under a disposition by Lord Rosslyn executed in July 1893, and which has been acted on ever since. The purpose of the action is to obtain for the pursuer as trustee in bankruptcy possession of the property disponed to and now possessed by the defenders as trustees under the disposition. Whether that purpose can be attained wholly, or to any and what extent, under all or any of the conclusions of the summons, must be the ultimate and only practical question in the case.

The pursuer's title to sue, though objected to in the record, was not disputed in the argument before us. Nor was it, I think, disputed that in so far as we may now consider and dispose of any question in the case, we must do so on the assumption that at the date of the disposition Lord Rosslyn was sui juris and at liberty to dispose of his property as he pleased gratuitously or onerously. If his circumstances at that time were such as to expose his disposition in whole or in part to challenge by his creditors as having been executed to their prejudice in violation of any statute or rule of the common law, the pursuer's title to sue the action of challenge is, as I have said, admitted. He does so challenge the disposition and asks decree of reduction accordingly. The Lord Ordinary, however, has held "that no relevant or sufficient grounds are averred for reducing the trust-deed libelled," thus in effect repelling the first seven pleas in law for the pursuer, and your Lordship having expressed concurrence in this view, I, for reasons which will appear before I conclude, say no more upon it now, only pointing out that taking it along with the finding, in which your Lordship also concurs, that the defenders "are bound to denude of the estate and effects thereby conveyed by him, and to make over the same to the pursuer for the purposes of the said bankruptcy, subject to any valid securities over the same, and to such rights of lien or indemnity as the trustees may have," the result seems prima facie to be that the trust-deed challenged must stand unreduced, but with the pursuer—the trustee in bankruptcy—substituted for the trustees therein named, who must denude in his favour. If the trust purposes expressed in the deed are reduced, the deed is reduced, and if the purposes (or any of them) are to stand unreduced—that is, are to subsist in force, there must be a trustee to execute them.

In the course of the hearing it occurred to me that it would have been more regular if the Lord Ordinary had refrained from pronouncing judgment on the legal merits of the case under any of the conclusions of the summons until the facts had been judicially ascertained. Towards the conclusion of the hearing I ventured to express the impression which I had that it would at least be more satisfactory that before pronouncing any decision under the conclusion for an order to denude, we should have distinct information regarding the trust property which the defenders received under the disposition, what at the date of the bankruptcy was and what is now in their possession, and also regarding the trust purposes which have been completely (or partially) executed by them. The Lord Ordinary, indeed, desired this information, as appears from the order with which his interlocutor concludes. It occurred to me that this order ought to have preceded a finding on the legal question whether or not the defenders are bound to denude of the trust property in their possession, and transfer it to the pursuer with (or without) the trust duties committed to them, and for the performance of which they received it. The impression remains, although understanding that none of your Lordships share it with me, I do not press it or say more about it, but proceed to state my opinion on the legal findings in the Lord Ordinary's judgment necessarily on the footing and in the view that we may, and indeed must, give our decision upon them, looking only to the terms of the trust-disposition, and the pursuer's averments, in so far as, but only in so far as, admitted by the defenders. We can pronounce judgment now on no other footing.

Salaman v. Rosslyn's Trustees.

1. The first finding is that the pursuer has a good title to sue, and this is, as I have already said, not disputed.

2. The second is that no relevant grounds of reduction are averred, and your Lordships are, I understand, of opinion that this finding is sound. I should, I incline to think, abstain from expressing any opinion upon it, and for this reason, that as we are deciding the case upon the terms of the deed, and on the footing that the facts are as averred or admitted by the defenders, it is unnecessary to decide a question of relevancy of averment, the only facts before us or of which we can now take account being, in my opinion, manifestly insufficient to support the conclusion for reduction.

3. The third is, that the trust-deed libelled "has been superseded by the bankruptcy of the Earl of Rosslyn." His Lordship's reason for this finding is thus expressed in his opinion: "A supervening sequestration—and I assume that the same effect must be attributed to an English bankruptcy—completely supersedes a private trust, and the trustees are bound forthwith instantly to denude in favour of the trustee named in the sequestration—(2 Bell's Comm. 391)." I think his Lordship has misapprehended either the meaning of the passage in Bell's Comm. to which he refers, or the character of the trust-deed in question. The passage in Bell's Comm. occurs in Book VI., part iii., which part iii. is titled "Of extrajudicial settlements between insolvent debtors and their creditors." After referring to two decisions, Mr Bell (Book VI., part iii., cap. 1, sec. 3 (4)) proceeds,—" . . . It is settled by these cases that when sequestration is awarded after a private trust it completely supersedes that trust, and that the trustees are bound forthwith instantly to denude in favour of the trustee named in the sequestration." It is too clear to admit of dispute that the "private trust" there referred to as superseded by sequestration is a private trust by an insolvent debtor to realise his estate and divide the proceeds among his creditors. The instances of such trusts are numerous, and the law applicable to them familiar, and indeed trite. That with which we have now to deal is of a different character—so different that I should characterise it, not as an arrangement between an insolvent and his creditors, but as a family trust created by the head of a family for the purpose of preserving the family estates from dilapidation to which they were exposed, and the reasonably founded apprehension of which had caused alarm to himself and all who were interested in the welfare of the family. The circumstances may be taken from the pursuer's averments on record, particularly in condescendences 5 and 6, of course rejecting or disregarding any allegation of fraud or deceit. They amount to this, that Lord Rosslyn was a spendthrift, with a propensity, which in the past he had found irresistible, to gambling and costly sports, which had put him into the power of money-lenders, one of whom he had satisfied with a mortgage of family property for over £100,000, leaving others with unsecured claims upon him for over £40,000. Notwithstanding his weaknesses, I should be disposed to credit him with sufficient sense to perceive and realise the pecuniary results of the life which he had been leading for the three preceding years, and to understand and appreciate (at least when pointed out to him) that the continuance of that kind of life for even a brief future, with the family estates left in his hands exposed to attachment for his future debts, might lead to their exhaustion and the family ruin.

Such are the circumstances in which Lord Rosslyn was in July 1893, five years before his bankruptcy, advised to execute, and did execute, the deed which the Lord Ordinary has held to be superseded by his bankruptcy. We must assume that he knew the circumstances, understood the advice which was given to him by his father-in-law and his own family solicitors, and was of sound disposing mind. He was by the deed divested absolutely of the Rosslyn family estates (Ravenscraig, Dysart, &c.), and there is nothing else to take account of; for although there is a general disposition of acquirenda there are none in possession or expectation, and if there were I should hold the disposition of them invalid and inoperative. I was surprised when I read it in the deed. I characterise Lord Rosslyn's divestiture as absolute, for although the corresponding investiture of the defenders is in trust, it is by the deed distinctly provided that it shall subsist during his life, however long he may survive, and that there shall never be restoration to him. The language of the deed convinces me that the complete divestiture of Lord Rosslyn was intended, and it seems to me, as it apparently did to the family solicitors, that the estates could not otherwise be protected against the consequences of a continuance or resumption by the Earl of the habits which I need not again characterise.

The questions then are—(1st) Was the intended protection lawful so as to be capable of accomplishment? and (2d) Is the trust-deed in question fitted and adequate to accomplish it?

1st. On the first of these questions I have already, sufficiently I think, expressed my opinion. Any proprietor who is sui juris and of sound disposing mind may lawfully alienate his whole property, or so much of it as he thinks fit, so that it shall no longer be subject to his debts and deeds. It is of course true that so long and so far as any man's property is left within his power and reach, it is within the power and reach of his creditors, and can be put beyond their reach only by being put beyond his.

2d. If the first question is answered in the affirmative, it follows that the second must also be so answered, unless, indeed, the deed is a very gross conveyancing blunder. If the intended lawful and accomplishable purpose is not effected, the deed has certainly been blundered, even though it should be found to effect some other. No other has been suggested or occurs to me.

In what I have hitherto said I have taken no account of Mr Vyner's part in the deed and of the onerous contract relation between him and Lord Rosslyn thereby constituted. I thought it right to express my opinion that, irrespective of the view of contract and onerosity, and taking the deed as gratuitous on Lord Rosslyn's part, it is valid to divest him of the family estates to the effect which I have pointed out. By "gratuitous" I mean only this, that in executing the deed Lord Rosslyn was influenced only by his own judgment that it was, in the circumstances, a right and becoming thing for him to do. He was in July 1893 as free to place his property, or any portion of it, beyond his own and his creditors' reach by putting it into an irrevocable family trust as by putting it into a similar trust for any lawful purpose—religious, charitable, national or local, or making a direct gift of it to an individual.

But account must be taken of Mr Vyner's position and rights, and the quality of onerosity thereby impressed on the trust in question, with respect not only to his own rights but also to those of the Rosslyn family under it. He was legitimately interested in the family, consisting of his daughter (the Countess) and his grandchildren, and no doubt also in his son-in-law on their account, and possibly his own, notwithstanding his youthful follies which had occasioned so much trouble and alarm. He was willing to advance £40,000 and more if needed to relieve the Earl of the unsecured debts that were pressing upon him, but only on the condition that the Earl should execute the deed which the family solicitors advised for the protection of the family estates against any future indiscretions of his and secure them to his wife and family after his death. It would not be true or just to Mr Vyner to regard him as a party who desired a good investment for £40,000 or £50,000. His desire plainly was to prevent the Earl again resorting to such lenders as he had been in the habit of doing, and even to prevent the estates being burdened to any stranger lender. He could afford and was willing, which a stranger lender would not be, to lie out of the money, and even to allow the interest to run into arrear for years, hopeful that by good management of the estate by selected trustees, economical family expenditure, and protection against freaks of extravagance by the Earl, he, or others for him (probably his Countess daughter or her children), might receive as much as he expected when he advanced the money really on their account and prompted by his affectionate interest in them. Be these views of Mr Vyner's feelings and motives true or imaginary, we must take it as true that he advanced £45,000 on the contract arrangement with Lord Rosslyn expressed in the deed. Of this sum £16,000 was advanced before the deed was executed and £29,000 thereafter. The purpose of the loan is stated in the deed to be "in order to pay off certain unsecured debts" of Lord Rosslyn's.

The pursuer avers (Cond. 7) that "the only consideration given by the defender Vyner was a loan of £16,000 and a promise of a future loan, both of which have been paid or are amply secured." The defenders on the other hand aver (Ans. 7) that Mr Vyner's advances amounted to £45,000, that none of the capital has ever been repaid to him, or any interest since March 1895; and that the amount now due to him (capital and interest together) is £58,000 or thereby. They also explain (Ans. 13) "that the whole of the Earl of Rosslyn's unsecured debts at the date of said deed (1893) were paid off and discharged by means of the advances obtained from Mr Vyner." For the reasons which I have already stated, I think we can pronounce no judgment now except on the footing that the defenders' averments in fact are or may be true. It was stated to us by their counsel at the hearing, and not denied on the part of the pursuer, that the facts I have just referred to as being averred by them appeared on the face of the accounts which they had furnished to the pursuer before this action was raised.

Salaman v. Rosslyn's Trustees.

The question which I desire to consider is this—Is the contract between Lord Rosslyn and Mr Vyner under and in pursuance of which the deed of July 1893 was executed by the former a legitimate and valid contract between borrower and lender? If it be it must be upheld and implemented according to its terms. The pursuer impeaches and asks reduction of it on the seven grounds specified in his first seven pleas in law. In these are embraced I think all the grounds on which creditors can impeach an alienation by their debtor of his property to their prejudice. The Lord Ordinary has, as I have already observed, repelled them all by his finding "that no relevant or sufficient grounds are averred for reducing the trust-deed libelled." I have declined to express an opinion on the relevancy of the pursuer's averments for the reason which I have also already explained viz., that if we are to take the pursuer's case for reduction on the footing that it rests on his averments in so far as admitted by the defenders, and without any evidence beyond the defenders' admissions, it is not even arguable. The result, in my opinion, is that the contract between Lord Rosslyn and Mr Vyner in pursuance of which the deed was executed was legitimate and valid, the terms of it being, of course, taken to be as expressed in the deed.

Then it is a Scotch deed regarding chiefly, if not exclusively, Scotch landed property, and certainly creating a trust to be executed in Scotland, so that in considering its construction and import we are not dealing with anything foreign to our experience and presumed legal knowledge. What, then, in our judgment, is its meaning and import? for the accomplishment of that is the contract on which Lord Rosslyn borrowed and Mr Vyner lent £45,000. I have, I trust, distinctly stated my opinion that it is a Scotch deed, and that construed according to Scotch law it divests Lord Rosslyn absolutely of the whole family estates, so that they were not thereafter subject to his debts and deeds or to attachment by his creditors, and that the defenders cannot terminate the trust, and denude of any property held by them so long as Lord Rosslyn lives, or after his death, unless and until the advances made by Mr Vyner shall have been paid. The language of the deed to this effect is clear. The defenders have informed us that the whole debts due by Lord Rosslyn at the date of the deed—not heritably secured on the estates—were paid—I understood in 1893, and certainly long before the bankruptcy. We have not been distinctly informed regarding the extent to which the defenders have hitherto been able, by sales and judicious or fortunate administration, to pay off and clear the estates of old burdens. That they should, as far as possible, and, in their judgment, judicious, do so is one of the trust duties put upon them by the deed, Mr Vyner's desire (shared by Lord Rosslyn himself) plainly being that after Lord Rosslyn's death his family should have the estates as lightly burdened as the trustees could make them by their management and administration during his life after 1893. I think this is the import of the deed construed according to the law of Scotland, and that we should, if at any time required to judge of the trustees' duties and of their conduct in the performance of them, do so on that construction of the deed.

The residue clause is not as clearly expressed as it might have been, but without deciding any question that may conceivably arise under it when the time arrives,—that is, after Lord Rosslyn's death,—I may say now that I read it as meaning that the residue shall go to Lord Rosslyn's widow and children subject to his power of selection or apportionment by any writing under his hand or by his last will, and failing any such, then to such one of his issue as shall succeed to the earldom. Questions under this clause may arise when the time comes for acting on it, especially if Lord Rosslyn shall make an obscure apportionment by his last will or other writing. But the time cannot come till his death and the payment of Mr Vyner's debt, which is now over £60,000. Suppose there is no one then in existence to claim the residue under the clause except "such one of my issue as shall on my death succeed to the title and dignity of Earl of Rosslyn," no selection or apportionment could be applicable. The Lord Ordinary, if I rightly apprehend his opinion, supposes a possible conflict between the succeeding Earl or any others claiming the residue and money-lenders to whom the deceased Earl was indebted, and then goes on to say,—"I see nothing to prevent that question being worked out in the bankruptcy,"—meaning the existing bankruptcy. He adds,—"At all events I do not think that question could be properly tried in this action, to which they are not parties." In the event which I have supposed, the right of the succeeding Earl would rest on an onerous deed executed in pursuance of a contract between his father and grandfather, which, if lawful, it is the duty of the defenders, as trustees, to protect and satisfy when the time for satisfaction arrives.

The Lord Ordinary has not decided or expressed an opinion on the question whether or not Mr Vyner is entitled as matter of contract right to have the trust continued till the period of termination and denuding specified in the deed, thinking (if I rightly apprehend what he says) that this is a matter for the decision of the pursuer subject to the orders of the English Bankruptcy Court. Should it be held by the proper tribunal having jurisdiction in the matter that it is Mr Vyner's right to have the trust continued while Lord Rosslyn lives and his debt is unpaid, I assume that, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, it is to be administered, not by the trustees named in the deed, acting subject to the jurisdiction and orders of the Court, but by the pursuer as a trustee in bankruptcy, acting subject to the orders of the English Court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy proceedings. Suppose that the Bankruptcy Court should order the pursuer to use the property of which the defenders on our order had denuded in his favour to pay the claims lodged with him, which he says amount to about £10,000 (cond. 12), and restore the remainder (if any) to the defenders to be again held by them under the trust-deed. What then? More debts incurred by Lord Rosslyn to tradesmen and money-lenders, another bankruptcy order, with the pursuer or some other nominated as trustee, and, of course, another order of this Court on the defenders to denude, and so on ad infinitum, or rather ad finitum of the Rosslyn estates. In short, it comes to this, that if the Lord Ordinary's view of the law on which his findings with which I have been dealing proceed be sound, the trust-deed in question is, and was from the first, an absolute nullity, at least as regards its expressed and principal, if not only objects, viz., the protection of the Rosslyn estates, and the security of Mr Vyner for the large advances made by him on contract for that protection.

With respect to the conclusion for accounting, it is perhaps sufficient to say that the defenders have expressed their willingness to lay their accounts before the pursuer, and have indeed done so. But while I approve of their doing so, and indeed should have preferred to see the accounts, and also any objections which the pursuer might think proper to state, before pronouncing any judgment in the case, I am not prepared to hold that the defenders are liable to account to the pursuer. Whatever they received and held as trustees under the deed is, in my opinion, free from liability for the debts of the disponer contracted subsequent to its execution in July 1893, and as administering trustees they are, so far as I can see, under no liability to account to the pursuer. But the defenders, acting as they are, I think very becomingly, doing, in frankly disclosing their accounts, it may be satisfactory to see exactly what they have in possession before deciding whether they are bound to transfer all or any of it to the pursuer. I repeat, however, in conclusion, that assuming the deed of 1893 to stand unreduced, I do not see how they can possibly be possessed of anything of which they are bound to denude in favour of the pursuer.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree practically with the views expressed by the Lord Ordinary, and have little if anything to add. The deed under which the reclaimers derive their title is a conveyance in their favour by Lord Rosslyn of the entirety of his estate, and its purpose, to state it generally, is (1) to secure Mr Vyner's advance of £40,000, and any advance by the trustees; (2) to provide for the payment of creditors of the granter; (3) to provide a certain income (if the trustees think fit) for the benefit of the granter and his family; and (4) to make a provision out of the residue of the estate, if any, for the granter's widow and children, subject to his appointment, and failing such appointment, then for the child succeeding to the title. I make no question at present how far these provisions are good against creditors, considering the circumstances under which the conveyance was made, for none of these are impaired by anything which the Lord Ordinary has done. All legal and valid rights conferred by said conveyance preferable to the general body of creditors have been in the meantime preserved, and may be made good (if they can ever be made good) in the sequestration.

The chief point urged on behalf of the reclaimers was this—that Mr Vyner would not have made the advances he did except on the condition that the whole estate of Lord Rosslyn was handed over to him or the trustees named in order that they might manage it so as to make it reasonably probable that under such management the estate might be made to yield payment of the advances, and probably produce a reversion. They further urge that this was the contract which Lord Rosslyn made for onerous causes, and that with that contract the Court should not interfere. I am unable to accede to that view. So far as the deed is an effectual conveyance—I mean effectual to constitute rights which are preferable to creditors—it will no doubt be sustained. But I know of no authority for the proposition that any contract, whether of the nature of factory or otherwise, made by a bankrupt (I assume during his solvency) can exclude the control and management of a trustee in bankruptcy when bankruptcy has supervened. The trustee represents the rights and interests of the whole body of creditors, and to him alone is entrusted the realisation and distribution of the bankrupt's estate. Every other title to manage the bankrupt's estate is superseded by the title which the law confers on the trustee in bankruptcy. The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor appears to me to be carefully expressed, so as to protect all the legitimate interests of the reclaimers. But in case it might be supposed that the trustees are bound to denude in favour of the pursuer before their legitimate claims have been satisfied, I think the finding of the interlocutor might be varied to the extent of finding that the trustees are bound to denude of the estate, "subject to any valid securities over the same, and on payment or satisfaction of such right or lien or indemnity" as they may have. With this slight variation, which is nothing more than verbal—for I am satisfied it is what the Lord Ordinary meant—I am of opinion that the interlocutor reclaimed against should be affirmed.

LORD MONCREIFF.—The Lord Ordinary has found that there are no relevant or sufficient grounds for reducing the trust-deed libelled, "but that the same has been superseded by the bankruptcy of the Earl of Rosslyn, and that the trustees are bound to denude of the estate and effects thereby conveyed by him, and to make over the same to the pursuer for the purposes of the said bankruptcy, subject to any valid securities over the same, and to such rights of lien and indemnity as the trustees may have."

The Lord Ordinary finds further that the defenders are bound to count and reckon with the pursuer, and orders them to lodge a minute condescending on the trust-estate and an account of their intromissions with it. He has pronounced no order of denuding. Subject to a slight qualification, I substantially concur in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

The trust-deed executed by Lord Rosslyn in 1893 is one of an exceptionally wide character. It is a unilateral deed. By it Lord Rosslyn divests himself absolutely of the universitas of his estates, present and future, in favour of trustees, of whom he himself is one. He conveys not only specified estates, but all lands and heritages "in Scotland, England, or elsewhere, now belonging to me or which shall belong to or be acquired by me during my life so far as not comprehended in the foregoing special conveyance; and also all moveable or personal estate, funds, property, or effects of whatsoever kind or wheresoever situated, now belonging or which shall belong to or be acquired by me during my life." He thus left himself nothing to satisfy any future debts. If not then insolvent, he made himself so by granting the trust. The trust is partly a trust for certain creditors, partly for management and maintenance of Lord Rosslyn himself and his family during his life, and partly for his widow and family after his death. Prima facie it is just such a private trust as is necessarily superseded by sequestration (2 Bell's Comm. 390). The law and reasons for the law are thus stated by Professor Bell:—"A trust-deed completed so as to vest the estate in the trustee beyond the reach of reduction on the bankrupt laws will still be ineffectual to bar those creditors who have not acceded to it from proceeding judicially to have the estate sold and distributed according to the legal rules of ranking and sale or sequestration. The creditors having the radical right under such a trust may not have confidence in the disclosure made or intended, and may think that no means of discovery short of a judicial examination on oath of the bankrupt and his relations and confidants can serve to bring his affairs sufficiently to light; they may not have confidence in the trustee to administer the estate, and above all they may be wearied out by the delay, the expense, and the inefficiency of the ill-adapted processes of the common law for effecting a final distribution of the funds." And again he says—"It is settled that when sequestration is awarded after a private trust it completely supersedes that trust, and that the trustees are bound forthwith instantly to denude in favour of the trustee named in the sequestration." What may have been the inducing cause of granting the deed does not seem to me to affect the question. It is said to be onerous to certain effects. It is not necessary to consider that question at present. If the deed confers any preferential rights on Mr Vyner (who is otherwise secured by heritable bonds for all advances) or others, such rights will receive effect in the sequestration. They are reserved; all that is proposed is to transfer in hoc statu the control and management of the trust-estate to the trustee in the sequestration.

At the same time the trustees cannot be called on to denude until they are reimbursed for outlays and expenses which they have incurred for the benefit of the trust-estate (Bell's Pr. sec. 1998-10 and sec. 1453); and it may be that questions of some difficulty will arise in the accounting as to the payments in respect of which they are entitled to plead retention. I therefore agree that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be affirmed, with a slight variation to the effect that the trustees are only bound to denude after such claims of lien and indemnity as they may succeed in establishing in the accounting have been satisfied.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find that the pursuer has set forth a sufficient title to sue this action: Find that no relevant or sufficient grounds are averred for reducing the trust-deed libelled, but that the same has been superseded by the bankruptcy of the Earl of Rosslyn, and that the trustees are bound to denude of the estate and effects thereby conveyed by him, and to make over the same to the pursuer for the purposes of the said bankruptcy, subject to any valid securities over the same, and on payment or satisfaction of such rights of lien or indemnity as the trustees may have, and that they are bound to count and reckon with the pursuer for their intromissions as trustees foresaid with the said estate and effects; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause," &c.

Contract—Executory Contract—Liquidate Penalty—Work not completed in stipulated time—Alterations on original plan—Alterations ordered after date fixed for completion of work.—A builder, by the terms of his contract with the proprietor of a house for mason-work, undertook to have the whole work contracted for "entirely completed," by the 1st May 1897, under "a penalty of 10s. per day that the mason-work remains unfinished beyond that date." It was a condition of the contract that the proprietor should have power "to make any alteration on, and to increase, lessen, or omit any portion of the work"; and it was also provided that extra work should "form no ground for deviating from the date above fixed for the completion of the . . . work, unless specially certified by the architect at the time."

The work contracted for was not completed till fourteen months later than 1st May 1897. During the progress of the work alterations of the original plan were ordered and carried out to an extent which brought up the price due to the builder from £1491 to about £2500. Part of this extra work was not ordered till after 1st May 1897.

In an action by the builder against the proprietor for a balance of the price due, the defender pleaded that, in virtue of the penalty clause in the contract, the pursuer was liable to him in liquidated damages of 10s. per day from 1st May 1897 till the completion of the work, and that he was entitled to take credit for the amount in settling with the pursuer. The pursuer contended that the alterations ordered rendered it impossible for the work to be completed in time, and that the penalty clause was therefore void.

From the proof it appeared that the pursuer had not applied for and did not produce any certificates from the architect entitling him to an extension of time in respect of alterations, but the defender did not take objection to the pursuer leading evidence of justification for delay. To what extent the alterations were ordered before and after 1st May 1897, or what effect they had in delaying the work, did not appear.

Held (dub. Lord Young) that the onus was on the pursuer to shew that the non-completion of the work within the stipulated period was due to the act or omission of the defender; that he had failed to do so; and that the defender was entitled to enforce the penalty clause.

Sheriff of Roxburgh, Berwick, and Selkirk.

THIS was an action in the Sheriff Court of Roxburgh, Berwick, and Selkirk, at Duns, at the instance of Henry Steel, builder, Greenlaw, Berwickshire, against Robert Fitzroy Bell, of Temple Hall, Berwickshire, concluding for £348, 9s. 3d., as the balance of a sum due to the pursuer under a contract for mason and brick-work in connection with large additions to Temple Hall.

The only question now reported is the defender's claim to deduction of a liquidate penalty alleged to have been incurred by the pursuer's failure to complete the work within the time specified in the contract.

The general conditions and regulations signed by the pursuer as relative to the contract between the parties, of date 13th May 1896, contained the following clauses:—"(14) The work shall be commenced so soon as the contractor shall receive possession of the site or sites for same, and the contractor shall be allowed from the time of receiving possession one week for the delivery and arrangement of his plant and materials, and at or upon the expiration of said period of one week the said works shall be commenced and carried on with all due diligence and in regular progression, so that the following portions of the work may be completed at or before each of the following dates, viz., that the principal wing, namely, that part of house fronting eastwards, have the walls made ready for the roof by the 1st of October next, and the remaining part of the building, viz., that part of the mansion facing northward, be made ready for the roof by the 1st January next, and the whole shall be entirely completed at or before the 1st day of May 1897, failing of which a penalty of 10s. per day that the mason-work remain unfinished beyond that date. Extra work, if any, shall form no ground for deviating from the dates above fixed for the completion of the respective portions of the work, unless specially certified by the architect at the time. (15) The architect shall have power to delay or suspend the work during unsuitable weather, or for any other sufficient reason, but the works shall be recommenced after receiving due notice from the architect. The time lost by such delay shall be added to the time allowed for completion. [Articles 21 and 22 are quoted in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.] (27) Power is reserved to make any alterations on, and to increase, lessen, or omit any portion of the works as may be thought fit, and the value of such alterations, additions, or deductions is to be calculated in strict accordance with the rates in the schedule of measurement signed as relative to the contract, and upon which the original tender is based. Any extras to which the schedule rates cannot be applied will be valued by the architect at current market prices for such work."

The pursuer's offer, as accepted, was to do the excavation, mason, and brick-work in connection with the alterations at the price of £1491, 5s. 10d., but during the progress of the work alterations on the original plans and specifications and additions to the original buildings were ordered by the defender and carried out by the pursuer, with the result that the sum ultimately due to the pursuer admittedly amounted to about £2500.

None of the work was finished at the times stipulated in the contract, and the whole was not completed till July 1899, fourteen months after the stipulated time. The defender averred that this was owing to the dilatoriness of the pursuer, and that he was entitled to claim the penalty for that period; but that he was willing to restrict it to £150, or 10s. per day for 300 days, and he claimed to set off that sum against the sum sued for.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(5) The pursuer having failed to complete his contract within the specified time, he is liable to the defender in the penalty provided therefor by the contract, and the sum claimed by the defender in respect thereof being well within the amount so due, the defender is entitled to take credit for the same in the settlement with the pursuer.

The pursuer averred that the delay in completing the alterations and additions was caused by the repeated alterations of the plans.

Proof was allowed and led, bearing out the facts as already stated. It was proved that additions and alterations to the building were ordered by the defender and made by the pursuer subsequent to 1st May 1897, though it did not appear to what extent. It did not appear how far the delay in giving orders for alterations was caused by the pursuer's delay in executing parts of the work. No certificates by the architect entitling the pursuer to an extension of time in respect of alterations were applied for or produced by him. The further nature of the proof is sufficiently disclosed in the opinions of the Court.

On 16th March 1900, the Sheriff-substitute (Dundas) pronounced an interlocutor, which, so far as bearing on the defender's right to enforce the penalty clause, found that there fell to be deducted from the sum due to the pursuer the sum of £150 in name of penalty for breach of contract.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Vary Campbell), who, on 1st

No. 49.

Steel v. Bell.

June 1900, pronounced an interlocutor, inter alia, finding "in law, and on a construction of the written contract for the mason-work at Temple Hall, that the defender is not entitled to enforce the penalty clause therein contained, by reason of his not having given his full orders for the work before 1st May 1897, being the date for completion of the whole work, and from which the penalty was intended to run." *

The defender appealed, and argued;—By the pursuer's delay he had incurred the stipulated penalty, which was liquidated damages.[1] The onus was on the pursuer to shew that his failure to finish in time was due to extra work or alterations ordered by the defender, and he had not done so. He could not plead extra work in the absence of certificates by the architect authorising an extension of time on that account.[2] Even if it were true, which was not proved, that the alterations ordered had made it impossible to finish in time, it would not avoid the penalty clause.[3] If it had not been for the pursuer's delay —due to failure to begin timeously and want of adequate staff—the work would have been completed by 1st May 1897, and no further orders would have been necessary.

Argued for the pursuer;—There was no case here for stipulated damages, though there might be for common law damages, which was not pleaded. The penalty clause related to the completion of the whole work by 1st May 1897, and if, as here, orders for new work were given after that date, it rendered completion of the whole in time impossible, and the penalty clause flew off. The fact that part of the work was not ordered till afterwards was evidence that the delay was due to the defender, and shifted the onus on to him to shew that the work could have been finished in time, and that he had given the pursuer every facility to do so. The order of extra work beyond the specification in the contract prevented the application of the penalty clause.[2] The only difference between this case and Dodd[2] was the clause as to certifying extra work. But that clause referred only to the work originally contracted for, and not to work ordered afterwards. The clause must be read as if it contained the proviso that such extra work must be ordered in time to enable it to be finished in the stipulated time. This was the case kept open by the case of Jones,[3] where the point reserved was whether an employer who had not done all he could (e.g. had not given his orders in time) to enable the contractor to finish in time could enforce the penalty clause.[3]

* "NOTE.— . . . . It is difficult, if not impossible, for me to find out on the evidence how much new work was ordered after 1st May 1897. It is enough, however, as to the penalty clause, that the pursuer had admittedly not received his full orders by 1st May 1897, and so could not by any possibility have completed the whole work by that date. I think accordingly, that the defender cannot enforce the penalty clause, but I shall reserve to him any claim he may have for damages as for breach of contract by unreasonable delay.—Russell v. Da Bandeira (1862), 32 L. Steel v. Bell.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts which have to be dealt with in deciding this case are not complicated, and may be shortly stated. The pursuer took a contract to erect certain buildings for the defender for a price fixed, But it was part of the agreement (1) that at certain periods named specified portions of the work were to be completed, viz., the principal wing, namely, that part of the house fronting eastwards, to have the walls made ready for the roof by 1st October 1896, and the remaining part of the building, viz., that part of the mansion-house facing northwards, to be made ready for the roof by the 1st of January 1897, and the whole to be entirely completed at or before the 1st day of May 1897, failing which a penalty of 10s. per day that the mason-work remained unfinished beyond that date; (2) that extra work, if any, should form no ground for deviating from the dates above fixed for the completion of the respective portions of the work, unless specially certified by the architect at the time. (3) "Art. 21. The contractor must distinctly understand that in case any detail or other drawing, sketch, written or verbal instruction, be given for any part of the works whatever, and it be found that the proceeding with the works in accordance with such detail or other drawing, sketch, written or verbal instructions, shall cause any additional expense, whether in the particular trade to which the said detail or other drawing more particularly relates, or cause extra work in other trades, then the contractor must immediately intimate the same to the architect and state what extra expense, according to schedule rates, is, in his opinion, involved by proceeding with such works. The contractor must not execute any extra work of any kind whatsoever unless upon the written authority of the architect, or any plan or drawing expressly given or signed by him as an extra." (4) "Art. 22. The contractor shall, for any extra work which cannot from its character be properly measured and priced, render to the architect a weekly statement of such. No payment for day work will be allowed unless supported by such vouchers." (5) "Art. 27. Power is reserved to make any alterations on, and to increase, lessen, or omit, any portion of the works as may be thought fit, and the value of such alterations, additions, or deductions, is to be calculated in strict accordance with the rates in the schedule of measurement signed as relative to the contract, and upon which the original tender is based. Any extras to which the schedule rates cannot be applied will be valued by the architect at current market prices for such work."

Such being the character of the contract, the facts as ascertained by the proof seem to be (1) that the pursuer failed to have the work stipulated for completed at any of the respective dates; (2) that he holds no certificates from the architect sanctioning deviation from any of the dates, no such certificates having been applied for; (3) that during the course of the work the pursuer was repeatedly and strongly remonstrated with by the architect, both verbally and in writing, for delay caused by the pursuer not putting a sufficient working staff on the building; and that it is not shewn that the pursuer made any reply to the architect's remonstrances, although these began ten days after the pursuer got possession of the ground, and were continued throughout the whole course of the work; and, although it was pointed out to him that penalty days were running, no reply was made or excuse offered; (4) that the work was not finished till a very long period after the contract time; (5) that the pursuer was required to do a very large quantity of work both in the way of alterations and additions; (6) that some of this extra work was ordered after the final date when the work should have been finished under the contract; (7) that the defender limits his claim of set off under the penalty clause to three hundred days, which is considerably less than the number of days which passed beyond the stipulated time for completion of the work before the building was handed over.

These seem to me to be all the facts necessary for the consideration of the general question now before the Court, which is whether the defender is entitled as against the balance due to the pursuer to assert his right to £150 as representing three hundred days during which the work remained uncompleted after the date stipulated in the contract.

The pursuer contends against any allowance being made on various grounds. First, he points to the very large extent of the alterations, which he gauges by pointing out that the sum due to the pursuer is increased by the alterations and extras by about 70 per cent. The contention is, that such extensive alterations would make it impossible to complete the work by the time named in the contract. I am not satisfied that this has been proved as matter of fact, but even if it were, the contract provides for definite extension of time, if such extension should be necessary in consequence of the extent of extra work ordered. That contention must therefore, in my opinion, be rejected. If the pursuer required such extension, and did not apply for it, the defender's rights under the contract cannot be curtailed by evidence founded on calculation whether the time necessary for the alterations on the contract work would carry the work beyond the date. The time to be allowed for the work is flexible, if there are alterations ordered, and the equity to which the contracting party is entitled if the work is altered is thereby provided for.

But then it is contended that no extra work could be required of the pursuer after the date when the work was to be completed, on the footing that the penalty clause was to remain in force, unless notice by plans or otherwise was given to the pursuer of all such work before the date for the completion of the contract, and this contention the Sheriff has given effect to. I am unable to agree with the learned Sheriff on this matter. Any such view leads to most anomalous results. The alterations and extras upon a building during erection may become necessary or expedient, or may be found advisable for reasons of appearance, after considerable part of the work has been done, and where the contractor has by delay in the execution of the first portions of the work exhausted the time prescribed while large portions remained undone, he would thereby, if the contention of the pursuer was sound, preclude the person for whom the work was being done from having any alterations made as it advanced at a later date. I cannot hold that the pursuer, by his own default, can place the defender in a less advantageous position as regards extra work than he would have been if the work had been completed in its different stages in accordance with the agreement. If he, without excuse, occupies more time than the contract allows him, he cannot complain if while he is still at work alterations are called for under the contract. He has both as regards the time before the date specified, and as regards the time after, the right to deduction from the running of the penalty days of all days which are certified by the architect as being additional time to which he is entitled in respect of their having been occupied in doing extra work as required by the contract, and therefore he suffers no injury by having to do extras ordered on the parts which have to be done after the specified date for completion.

The pursuer in this case has not been confined in stating his answer to the defender's claim for the contract penalty to proof by certificates of the architects. He has been allowed to prove any case he could make to excuse the non-fulfilment of the work at the specified time. He has, in my opinion, failed to prove any facts to justify his delay. The defender has limited his claim to 300 days, although the actual time was longer, and in my opinion he is entitled in the settlement with the pursuer to have the amount applicable to that number of days, viz., £150, deducted from the amount brought out as due to the pursuer for the work done.

I therefore think that the interlocutor of the Sheriff should be recalled, and judgment pronounced in terms of the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, except in regard to the claim for the making of the reservoir, which has been settled by joint minute of the parties.

LORD YOUNG.—I think that this case is attended with great difficulty, and I am doubtful with regard to the conclusion at which the Sheriff-substitute has arrived, and the opinion which your Lordship has expressed. I cannot, however, say that I am more than doubtful, and as the case is special, and as I understand that my brethren are of the same opinion as your Lordship, I do not dissent.

LORD TRAYNER.—The only question we are asked to determine under this appeal is whether the defender is entitled to set off a sum of £150 claimed by him as incurred and due by the pursuer under the penalty clause in the contract against the balance due to the pursuer under the contract for work done. I have come to be of opinion that he is, but I have not reached that conclusion without considerable hesitation. The proof for the pursuer is not satisfactory, and several points—as I think material points—have not been cleared up as they should and might have been. For example, it is impossible to discover from the proof (1) what extent of the contract work was completed by the 1st May 1897; (2) what orders for alterations on or additions to the work, as set forth in the specification, were given after that date; (3) how far alterations or additions, ordered before 1st May 1897, hindered the pursuer from completing his contract work before that date; and (4) how much time, after 1st May 1897, was occupied with additions or alterations on the specified work. These matters not having been cleared up (as I think it was the pursuer's duty to do), the case appears to me to stand thus:—By the terms of the contract the pursuer undertook to have the principal wing of the building ready for the roof by 1st October 1896, the remaining part of the building ready for the roof by 1st January 1897, and the whole work contracted for "entirely completed" by the 1st of May 1897, under a penalty of 10s. per day that the mason-work remained unfinished beyond that date. Further, by the contract the defender had reserved to him power "to make any alteration on, and to increase, lessen, or omit any portion of the works," while it was provided that extra work, if any, should "form no ground for deviating from the dates above fixed for the completion of the respective portions of the work, unless specially certified by the architect at the time." Now, whether the pursuer was wise to enter into a contract which imposed on him obligations of this stringent character may be a question, but it is not one which we can consider. The fact is, that he made this bargain, and he must fulfil it. That he did not fulfil it is the one fact in the case which is clear beyond doubt on the proof before us. The pursuer himself says,—"I was to have finished the whole job by May 1897. At that time the walls were not all ready for the roof, but shortly afterwards I had the north wall ready for the roof," so that, at each of the three dates fixed by the contract, the pursuer was greatly behind hand with the work which at these respective dates should have been done. The work was not completed until July 1898, some 440 days after the period fixed by the contract for completion. Apparently, therefore, the pursuer incurred, and was liable for, the penalty of 10s. a day for the whole of that time. The only answer which it occurs to me could avoid this result is that the non-completion of the work was due to the defender,—that he, by act or omission, rendered performance impossible. No such answer is put forward in any of the seven pleas in law stated for the pursuer on record, but it was maintained in argument before us. The answer thus stated fails in my opinion upon the fact, and it is with reference to it that I think the pursuer's proof is defective in the particulars I have already enumerated. But there is more in the case against the pursuer on this point than his failure to make his proof as clear and distinct as he should have done. There are some things proved which go to exclude such an answer to the defender's claim. For example, at a very early stage in the pursuer's operations he was blamed by the architect for delay in commencing and pushing forward parts of the work, and to these complaints on the part of the architect there is not one word of reply. Indeed these complaints were reiterated through the whole job, and no reply was ever made by the pursuer, either excusing himself or blaming the defender for the delay. Again, on 2d December 1897, the architect wrote the pursuer notifying that "sixty-eight days' penalty had run," and even when the matter of penalty was thus brought prominently before him the pursuer does not, any more than formerly, suggest that the delay was excusable in itself, or was due to the defender, or that the penalty had not been incurred.

It is quite true that alterations were made by the defender on the original estimate, and that the amount of the contract price was considerably increased. But it appears from the architect's evidence that this was "caused by the use of more expensive work rather than by an additional quantity of work." Again, however, one turns to the contract, and there it is distinctly stipulated that extra work, if any, should not warrant any deviation from the date fixed for completion, unless certified by the architect. As this latter provision (the architect's certificate warranting or granting an extension of time) is not urged by the defender against the pursuer, the effect of the want of such certificate need not be considered. It was open to the pursuer (from the attitude the defender has taken) to prove that he was delayed beyond the contract time by reason of alterations ordered at a time which made fulfilment of his contract impossible. This he has not done.

I cannot assent to the view urged upon us, and which apparently is the view adopted by the Sheriff, that any order or alteration made or given after the 1st May 1897 per se struck the penalty clause out of the contract. As I have said, it is not established how many alterations were ordered after that date, nor what was their character. For anything that appears, any such orders were given after 1st May 1897, because the pursuer was so much behind already with his work that such alterations were necessarily delayed until then. That would not absolve the pursuer, but would rather accentuate his liability.

The result of my consideration of the case, therefore, is that there is a plain obligation imposed on the pursuer by his contract, non-performance of which involved liability for a certain fixed penalty; that non-performance is clearly proved, and, indeed, admitted; that the penalty, therefore, was incurred; and that no relevant or sufficient answer to the defender's demand for the penalty has been established. The defender has restricted his claim for penalty to £150, and for that sum I think he is entitled to credit in his settlement with the pursuer.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I have felt a good deal of difficulty about this case, because undoubtedly considerable alterations were made by the defender upon the original plans, so considerable that I think it is plain that the whole work, inclusive of the alterations and additions, could not have been completed by the 1st of May 1897, the limit named in the contract for the completion of the whole work.

The proof before us does not tell us at what times the various alterations were ordered, or enable us to judge to what extent the execution of the work was delayed by those orders. All we know is that several extensive alterations were made by the defender's orders, and that most of them were made after the 1st of May 1897.

The Sheriff "finds in law, and on a construction of the written contract for the mason-work at Temple Hall, that the defender is not entitled to enforce the penalty clause therein contained, by reason of his not having given his full orders for the work before 1st May 1897, being the date for completion of the whole work, and from which the penalty was intended to run"; and in his note he says,—"It is difficult, if not impossible, for me to find out on the evidence how much new work was ordered after 1st May 1897. It is enough, however, as to the penalty clause that the pursuer had admittedly not received his full orders by 1st May 1897, and so could not by any possibility have completed the whole work by that date."

Steel v. Bell.

I think that the law so laid down by the learned Sheriff proceeds upon a misconstruction of the 14th and 27th conditions of the contract between the pursuer and the defender, and a misapplication of the case of Dodd v. Churton.[1]

By the conditions of the contract in that case the building was to be completed by 1st June 1893 under a penalty of £2 per week for every week that any parts of the works remained unfinished after that date as liquidate damages, and there was a provision that any authority given by the architects for any alteration or addition in or to the works should not vitiate the contract. The defendant, the employer, maintained that that provision meant that, notwithstanding that alterations and additions were ordered, the contractor was bound to complete the whole work within the time named in the contract. The Court of Appeal decided in favour of the contractor, but solely on the ground that the condition to which I have referred, that the contract should not be vitiated by orders for alterations or additions, would not bear the construction which the defendant sought to be put upon it, and that therefore the defendant having given orders which made it impossible for the contractor to complete the work by the time mentioned in the contract, he was thereby disentitled to claim the penalties for non-completion.

The penalty clause in the contract in this case is very different, because it not only contemplates that orders may be given for extra work, but it provides that such orders shall form no ground for deviating from the dates fixed for the completion of the respective portions of the work unless specially certified by the architect at the time. This shews that the contractor undertook to perform any extra work that might be ordered, and that if he thought that such alterations or extra work would prevent his completing the whole work by the specified dates, it lay upon him at the time to obtain from the architect a certificate that he should be entitled to an extension of the time for the work so ordered. It will at once be seen how different this condition is from the condition in Dodd v. Churton.[1]

Now, these being the conditions of the pursuer's contract, I think the burden was upon him to shew that the alterations ordered by the defender were such as to free him from the penalty clause. This he has failed to do. First, he did not apply for, and has not produced, any certificates granted by the architect entitling him to an extension of time in respect of alterations. Secondly, he has not proved at what dates the alterations were ordered, or afforded us any means of judging what effect they had in delaying the work. And thirdly, it is distinctly proved in the case that during the period before the 1st of May 1897, by which time the whole work should have been completed, the pursuer, notwithstanding repeated remonstrances and orders from the architect, obstinately refused to put sufficient men on the work, with the result that, for instance, the north walls, which should have been ready for the roof on 1st January 1897, were not ready until the month of July of the same year, two months after the whole work should have been completed.

The work was not finally completed until upwards of 400 days beyond the time when it should have been completed. The defender restricts his claim for penalties to 300 days, amounting to £150. We have no means of judging whether the allowance made by the defender correctly represents the additional time which was necessarily occupied by the contractor in consequence of the alterations ordered. But the burden being on the pursuer in this matter, and he having entirely failed to shew the extent to which the delay was caused by the alterations, and, in particular, having failed to shew that any alterations were ordered before the 1st of May 1897 which would have prevented him completing the work by that date, I am of opinion that the defender is legally entitled to plead the penalty clause to the extent to which he asks that it should be enforced. Accordingly I am for recalling the judgment of the Sheriff, and reverting to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff, and reverted to that of the Sheriff-substitute of 16th March 1900, finding, inter alia, that from the sum due to the pursuer the sum of £150 fell to be deducted in name of penalty for breach of contract.

Expenses—Abandonment of Appeal after printing by respondents.—An appeal from a Sheriff Court was abandoned before the case appeared on the roll for discussion. The respondents moved for full expenses, stating that they had printed certain correspondence passing between the parties, of importance in the case. This they had done without asking the appellant what he proposed to print. The Court refused to allow the respondents the expenses of printing.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Ayrshire.

JAMES GILCHRIST & COMPANY, salt merchants, Glasgow, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire against Walter Smith, grain merchant, Irvine, in which, after sundry procedure, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor approving of the Auditor's report on expenses, and decerning against the defender therefor. On 12th July 1900 the defender appealed to the Court of Session, and on 16th October the case was sent to the Short-roll.

On 9th January 1901, before the case had been put out for hearing, the appellant enrolled the case in the Single Bills, and moved that the appeal be dismissed, with modified expenses to the respondents.[1]

The respondents moved for full expenses, on the ground that they had incurred expense in printing certain correspondence passing between the parties, which was necessary for their case.[2] They admitted that they had printed without communicating with the appellant.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears to me that no cause has been shewn for departing from the ordinary rule in this case. If a respondent, who is not the party whose duty it is to print the papers, desires to do so at an early stage, he ought to communicate with the appellant and ascertain what he intends to print. Otherwise the result will be—or, in the ordinary course, ought to be—that the appellant will at the proper time print the necessary papers, and there will be double and superfluous printing.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I quite agree. I think that if a respondent prints without notice and without inquiry, he takes the risk of the prints turning out to be useless, and in that case he cannot recover the expense of printing useless prints from his opponent.

MRS AGNES JANE GRANT OR REID, Petitioner.—Crabb Watt.
ALEXANDER REID, Respondent.—Kennedy—M'Clure.

Parent and Child—Custody—Petition for custody pending action of adherence.—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 27), sec. 5.—Circumstances in which the Court, on an application by a wife under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, made an interim order giving her the custody of her three daughters, all under seven years of age, and an infant son, without ordering inquiry into the facts, and while an action at her instance against her husband of adherence, and, alternatively, for separation and aliment, with conclusions for the custody of the children, was pending in the Outer-House.

1ST DIVISION. MRS AGNES JANE GRANT OR REID, wife of Alexander Reid, spirit-merchant, Bearsden, Dumbartonshire, presented a petition, in which she prayed the Court to find her entitled to the custody of her four children—Agnes, aged six; Sarah, aged four; Ethel, aged three years; and Alexander Percy, aged six months—and to make an order decerning and ordaining her husband to deliver the said children to her.

In the petition Mrs Reid averred that she was married to the said Alexander Reid in 1893, and had lived happily with him until August 1900, from which date there had been constant difficulties between them. In December 1900 she received a letter from his law-agent, in which it was stated that her husband insisted on her leaving his house. She obeyed this order, and found a home with her father. She was permitted to take her youngest child with her, but the other three were removed from her custody. She further averred that her husband had an income of £1500 a year, and that his business necessitated his absence from home all day. Her averments concluded with the following statement:—"In these circumstances the petitioner has had to raise an action of adherence, and, alternatively, of separation and aliment, which action also contains a conclusion for the custody of the children of the marriage, and for aliment for them. It will be some months, however, before it is possible to get a decision in said action, and the petitioner is under the necessity of making the present application, which is based upon the common law and the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 27), in order to get an order of the Court for the custody of her children immediately. She is not in a position to make any averments regarding the fitness or unfitness of her husband for their custody. She believes and avers that they are not in his custody. They are very young girls, and are in need of their mother's care, and, it is averred, are unhappy away from her; and the petitioner is entitled in the meantime to have their custody, and their interests demand that they should be with her. The petitioner will give her husband such reasonable access to said children as the Court may think proper." *

Answers were lodged for the husband, in which he made, inter alia, the following statement:—"The respondent had serious differences with the petitioner, and was much dissatisfied with her conduct both as a housekeeper and towards their three elder children, before as well as after August 1900. The respondent disapproved strongly of corporal punishment, and has had cause frequently to remonstrate with the petitioner for thrashing the three elder children. On several occasions he has had to interfere and take them away from her. She has beaten the eldest daughter, who has always been delicate, with special frequency and severity, and without cause. She has disobeyed the respondent's expressed wishes in this respect, and resented his remonstrances and interference on the child's behalf."

Argued for the petitioner;—A sufficient prima facie case had been made out for an order ad interim without inquiry. The petitioner was not bound to wait until her action of adherence was ready for proof.[1] The case of M'Callum v. M'Callum[2] was not in point, because the ground of that decision was that no order could, in the circumstances, be pronounced without inquiry, and it was undesirable to have two inquiries into the same facts. Here the conduct of the husband was obviously unreasonable, and the natural home of young girls under seven was with their mother. An interim order might therefore be pronounced without any proof.

Argued for the respondent;—No order should be pronounced, because the case was before the Lord Ordinary. An order for custody in such circumstances, though competent, would only be pronounced in exceptional cases.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears to me that we are in a position, on the papers before us, to dispose of this case to the only extent to which it is now competent to deal with it—that is, ad interim, until some further order shall be pronounced either here or by the Lord Ordinary.

The spouses apparently lived together until August 1900, when their fourth child was born, and then the husband, for some unexplained reason, took a dislike to his wife, and ordered her to leave his house. She says that she had no option but to comply with that order. But assuming that she was bound to leave, it is a very different question what effect the giving of the order by the husband, and her obeying it, should have on the interim custody of the children. It is stated in the petition that she has raised an action of adherence, and alternatively of separation and aliment, against her husband, with conclusions craving that she should be found entitled to the custody of the children, and if it were necessary for the decision of the present question that there should be an inquiry, there would be great force in the consideration, on which the Court proceeded in the case of M'Callum,[1] that it would be inexpedient to have separate inquiries in the petition for custody and in the action in the Outer-House. That might be a very valid reason, but it does not exist in this case if there is sufficient material in the papers before us to enable us to make what is, after all, only an interim order. There is no allegation, far less any prima facie evidence, of any misconduct on the part of the wife which would render her unfit to have the custody of her children, three of whom are girls of tender years, who should therefore, prima facie, be under the care of their mother, while the fourth is an infant boy. The husband alleges that there was a difference of opinion between himself and his wife as to the chastisement of the eldest girl, but no case involving cruelty to the child is alleged.

* The Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 27), section 5, enacts,—"The Court may, on the application of the mother of any infant, . . . make such order as it may think fit regarding the custody of such infant, and the right of access thereto of either parent, having regard to the welfare of the infant and the conduct of the parents, and the wishes as well of the mother as of the father."

Under these circumstances the first consideration is the welfare of the children, though no doubt the wishes of the spouses are also to be taken into account. I think that the natural place for girls of such tender age is with their mother, especially in a case like this, where the father is engaged in business and away from home for the greater part of the day, so that he could not devote much attention to them.

If a decree of separation is pronounced hereafter, the Lord Ordinary will regulate the custody of the children, and it may be that the proof will put a different complexion on the case. It is, of course, understood that any order which we pronounce now is only ad interim, and does not in any way interfere with the power of the Lord Ordinary to regulate the custody of the children as he may see fit upon the facts proved before him. In the circumstances stated, and on the prima facie aspects of the case, I see no ground for depriving the mother—against whom no allegation of misconduct or unfitness is made—of the custody of her children, and accordingly I am in favour of granting the prayer of the petition, subject to the qualifications which I have just mentioned.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT found the petitioner entitled to the custody of the children until the Court or the Lord Ordinary should otherwise direct.

Pollock v. Mair.

JAMES POLLOCK, yearlyman, Killantrae, Wigtownshire, brought an action of damages in the Sheriff Court at Wigtown, against John Mair, farmer at Killantrae, concluding for payment of £80.

1st DIVISION
Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.

In this action Pollock made the following averments:—That the pursuer had been employed as a yearlyman by defender for some years back, and sometime prior to Whitsunday 1900 he and defender entered into a verbal agreement whereby pursuer was to be engaged by defender as a yearlyman, to do all the work usually performed by yearlymen, from Whitsunday 1900 to Whitsunday 1901, and occupy a house at Killantrae. He was further bound to supply two milkers, viz., Elizabeth Pollock and Janet Pollock. In return for these services, defender bound and obliged himself to pay pursuer at the rate of 12s. 6d. per week, and farther give him three tons of coal and two carts of potatoes. The wages to be given to his milkers were to be 3s. per week for milking, the said Elizabeth Pollock to get 7s. 6d. per week for out-door work, except during harvest, for which she was to get £3, and the said Janet Pollock was to get 1s. 3d. per day for each day she was engaged, except during harvest, for which she was to get £3, 10s. The defender unwarrantably, and in breach of his contract, dismissed the pursuer and the two Pollocks from his services. Although he was thereupon informed that they desired to fulfil their engagement, he persisted in ordering them away and forced them to leave, and they have thus suffered loss and damage to the extent claimed, through loss of wages and loss of character and reputation. Pursuer had always been willing to perform the contract entered into by him with defender. Pursuer is entitled at anyrate under the contract condescended on to the sums in the subjoined account, being the wages payable for the period of engagement and unpaid by defender.—(Here followed a detailed statement of wages still unpaid, amounting in all to £56, 8s. 3d.)

Mair denied that he had dismissed Pollock and his helpers as averred, and stated that they had without excuse left his service and never offered to return, putting him to much inconvenience and expense in finding others to complete his harvest work, milk his cows, and carry on his farm operations, and farther that the pursuer unwarrantably retained possession of a cothouse. Without prejudice to his rights and pleas, he tendered the sum of £9, 12s. 10d., with expenses to date, in full of all claims.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer, having been dismissed by defender from his service without due notice and without justifiable cause, is entitled to decree for the sum craved in name of wages or of damages. (2) Defender having failed to implement the contract entered into by him, and pursuer, and those for whom he was responsible, having suffered loss and damage thereby, defender is liable in the sum craved.

On 20th November 1900 the Sheriff-substitute (Watson) allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and moved for an order for issues. The respondent moved that the case should be sent back to the Sheriff Court for proof, and argued;—The case was specially suited for trial in the Sheriff Court, as the witnesses all belonged to the locality. It was also in substance a claim for the loss of specific wages, not a general claim of damages for injury to character. There was no doubt that the Court had the power to refuse jury trial,[1] and had exercised that power in cases of trifling and local character like the present.[2]

Argued for the appellant;—Issues should be ordered. When an appeal was made from the Sheriff Court for jury trial the case should be considered as if it had been commenced in the Court of Session.[3] If so, then no reason could be suggested for refusing to send the case to a jury, except perhaps that the damages claimed were small, but that was not a sufficient ground.[4]

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is no doubt that this Court has power, when a case is appealed for jury trial, to send it back for proof in the Sheriff Court, if that appears to be the most expedient way of dealing with it, and this certainly does seem, prima facie, to be a case which ought not to be sent to a jury. In one sense it is an action of damages, because it includes a claim for "loss of character and reputation," but there is no separate or specific case of slander or defamation stated, and in substance it is a claim by a servant against his master for loss of wages through wrongful dismissal. The pursuer seems to recognise that the measure of the damages must be the wages which he has lost, because after making a general claim he says, in condescendence 5, that he is in any event entitled to the sums subjoined, being the wages due for the period of his engagement. He is thus really claiming for loss of wages; whether he did obtain work elsewhere, or could have obtained it for the unexpired period of his employment, we of course cannot tell at this stage. The question is eminently suited for trial in the Sheriff Court. The bulk of the evidence will be of local witnesses, and where the gross claim is for £80, and the real damage apparently £56, it would be very inexpedient to allow the case to be tried by a jury, implying the necessity of bringing the local witnesses here. Again, the case may involve the consideration of local customs, of which the Sheriff-substitute is likely to be the best judge. On the whole, I think we should refuse the appeal and send the case back to be tried in the Sheriff Court.

LORD ADAM.—As I understand the law, even in a proper action for damages, that is, in an action for a random sum for injury sustained, the party has not an absolute right to jury trial. The law is that such a case goes before a jury unless the party who objects to that course shews some good reason why it should not. That rule applies to a case of this kind, which is brought here from the Sheriff Court by an appeal for jury trial. I agree that the smallness of the amount claimed as damages is not in itself a sufficient reason for not sending a case before a jury. But that is not the present case. Here there is sufficient reason for not sending it to a jury in the fact that the damages claimed are to be ascertained by calculating the amount of wages which the pursuer would have earned had he remained in the defender's service, and also that the whole evidence will be that of local witnesses.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I adhere to the opinion of this Division as expressed by the Lord President in Tosh v. Ferguson,[1]—"At this time of day it is of course impossible to dispute that the Court has power to send back to the Sheriff Court for trial there a case appealed under the 40th section of the Judicature Act. But then it is necessary to observe that that has only been done when circumstances could be pointed to which rendered the Sheriff Court peculiarly appropriate as a tribunal for ascertaining the facts," and also agree with the remark made by Lord Adam that the smallness of the sum claimed is not a reason for refusing jury trial, because the minimum sum for appeal has been fixed by the Legislature, and we have no power to increase it. The question must depend on the circumstances of the particular case. The appeal will not be refused unless the circumstances render the Sheriff Court a better tribunal than a jury. But I have no doubt that in this case the Sheriff Court will be the better tribunal, and that a proof there will be more satisfactory and less expensive than a jury trial here.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and remitted the case to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed in terms of his interlocutor of 20th November.

Reparation—Negligence—Railway—Failure to fence Siding near Cottages.—An engine-driver, in the course of backing some trucks down a siding, ran over and killed his own son, a child two years old, who was playing with other children in the siding. He brought an action for solatium against his employers, in which he averred fault in respect that they had failed to provide a shunter to assist him in backing the trucks, and had left the siding unfenced, although there were houses belonging to them and let to their workmen immediately adjoining, and the only access to a bleaching-green used in connection with these houses was across the siding. Held that the action was relevant.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Fife and Kinross.

JOHN INNES, engine-driver, Lumphinnans, Fife, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Fife, at Dunfermline, against the Fife Coal Company, Limited, concluding for £250 as solatium for the death of his son.

The pursuer averred that in connection with the defenders' works at Lumphinnans there was a branch line of railway belonging to them running from their No. 1 pit to the North British Railway. Close to the pithead there was a siding off the branch line of railway used by the defenders for shunting operations. Adjoining the siding, and in close proximity to it, were two rows of miners' houses occupied at a rent by the pursuer and other workmen in the employment of defenders. The siding was on a level with the adjoining ground, and was entirely unfenced. On the other side of the siding from the houses was a bleaching-green in connection with the houses, the only access to which was across the siding. The children in the houses were in the habit of playing on the bleaching-green, and on and near the siding, a fact which was known to the defenders and their managers. On 30th March 1900, in accordance with instructions, the pursuer proceeded to make up a race of waggons of double coals, and, in order to do so, ran his locomotive and four waggons of double coal along the siding. No guard or shunter was provided. At the time when the shunting operations were being carried on a number of children belonging to workmen in the employment of the defenders, among them James Innes, aged two years, son of the pursuer, were playing about on the siding. It was impossible, owing to the curve in the siding, and to his view being in consequence obstructed by the waggons in front of him, for the pursuer to see the children who were playing about. James Innes, son of the pursuer, was caught between the upper rail of the siding and the front wheel of the foremost waggon, and was so severely injured that he shortly afterwards died.

"Said accident was caused through the negligence of the defenders in respect that they did not provide a suitable and sufficient fence to said siding. . . . Further, in the absence of a sufficient fence, it was the defenders' duty to have appointed a guard or shunter to superintend or take charge of said shunting operations, and to make certain that the line was clear for the passage of waggons."

The defenders denied fault, and averred that the accident was due to the pursuer's carelessness.

On 6th July 1900 the Sheriff-substitute (Gillespie) allowed a proof.

On appeal the Sheriff (Chisholm) adhered.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and moved for an order for issues.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The action was irrelevant. (2) As the pursuer's own act had caused the accident, he was not entitled to solatium. The maxim volenti non fit injuria applied.[1]

Counsel for the appellant were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The only question which we have at present to decide is whether this case should be dismissed as irrelevant, or whether it should be sent to a jury. We have no right to anticipate what the evidence may be—we can only consider whether a relevant case is stated on the record. The material allegations of the pursuer are that he, being an engine-driver in the employment of the defenders, was shunting his locomotive with four waggons along a siding, which was open and unfenced, that he had no guard or shunter associated with him, that some children were playing on and near the siding, one of them being the pursuer's own son, aged two years, and that this child was caught between a rail and one of the waggons which was being pushed by the engine, and received injuries from which he died. In close proximity to the siding there were certain houses, let by the defenders to their workmen, one of them to the pursuer. It appears to me that the defenders must, in letting these houses to their workmen, be taken to have been aware that the ordinary incidents of occupation by persons of the working class would occur there. The siding was not fenced, and even if there had been nothing more in the case, I think that we could not, in the absence of evidence, have held that the children living in these houses were trespassers when they played on or near to the siding. But the pursuer further avers that there was on the other side of the siding from the houses a bleaching-green used by the persons occupying them, and that the only access to it was across the siding. Under these circumstances, it was not unnatural that the persons living in the houses and their children should frequently cross the siding. I do not think that the parents of the children were chargeable with neglect in not preventing them from playing near to or on the siding, especially as the defenders in letting their houses to their workmen must be taken to have been aware of the ordinary family conditions of persons of that class, who cannot keep servants to look after their children.

Accordingly, if a child of another workman had been killed on the occasion in question, I think the defenders would have had no answer to a claim against them, and if this be so, the only remaining question arising on the pursuer's averments is whether the fact that he is the father of the child who was killed should prevent him from obtaining solatium. Taking the case upon his averments, I do not think that this should debar him from obtaining an issue. It is true that the defenders allege that the pursuer drove his waggons backwards with too great force, and also that a shunter was associated with him, but these allegations cannot affect the relevancy of the pursuer's statements, although if proved at the trial they may have a very material, possibly a determining, effect on the verdict.

On the whole matter, and taking the case as stated by the pursuer on record, I do not think that we would be justified in preventing it from going before a jury.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that, in order to constitute donation mortis causa, it is essential that the gift be made in expectation of death, and that there be delivery or its equivalent.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Ross, Cromarty, and Sutherland.

KENNETH CAMERON, sometime carpenter at Lews Castle, Stornoway, died at Dantryfail, Achterneed, Ross and Cromarty, on 24th October 1899. Dantryfail was the residence of his niece, Mrs May Frank, with whom he had latterly resided. After his death there were found, pinned together, in a desk belonging to the deceased, in the room which he occupied at Dantryfail, three deposit-receipts by the National Bank of Scotland, all dated Stornoway, 10th May 1899, in these terms, viz.:—(1) "Received from Mr Kenneth Cameron, Lews Castle, Stornoway, and Mr John Rose, farmer, Strathpeffer (payable to either or survivor) One thousand pounds sterling to their credit in deposit-receipt with the National Bank of Scotland, Limited." (2) "Received from Mr Kenneth Cameron, Lews Castle, Stornoway, and Mrs May Frank, Strathpeffer (payable to either or survivor) One thousand pounds sterling to their credit in deposit-receipt with the National Bank of Scotland, Limited." (3) "Received from Mr Kenneth Cameron, Lews Castle, Stornoway, and Mr William Cameron, his nephew (payable to either or survivor), Six hundred and fifty pounds sterling to their credit in deposit-receipt with the National Bank of Scotland, Limited." John Rose, Mrs May Frank, and William Cameron were nephews and a niece of the deceased.

In January 1900 the said John Rose, Mrs May Frank, and William Cameron, raised an action of multiplepoinding in the Sheriff Court at Dingwall, the fund in medio being the amount of the deposit-receipts, viz., £2650.

The pursuers claimed the whole fund in medio, averring that the deceased "intended to make, and did in point of fact make, a donation to them of the respective sums represented by the deposit-receipts."

Donald Cameron, Kenneth Cameron's executor-dative, claimed the whole fund in medio for distribution among the deceased's next of kin, averring that the deposit-receipts formed part of his estate at the date of his death.

A proof was led.

It appeared that the deposit-receipts were found in the deceased's repositories, and that they had never been shewn or mentioned to the alleged donees, or to anyone, by the deceased. The receipts had been taken in similar terms by the deceased eight years previously, and renewed annually down to 1899. It did not appear that the deceased, down to his death, was ever otherwise than in good health.

Kenneth Cameron, a brother of Mrs May Frank, deponed that he and the deceased had had a conversation one evening, suggested by a paragraph in a newspaper, as to a disputed will, in the course of which deceased said,—"There are ways of a man leaving his money to whom he likes without making a will; by making a will the Government wants so much duty"; and that on the following morning he said,—"I am leaving your sister Mrs Frank well off. I am leaving my money for your sister, and for John Rose and William Cameron."

The claimant William Cameron deponed that on one occasion the deceased told him,—"I have lots of money, and in different places. I said, 'That was very good.' He said, 'Yes; I am going to leave some money for you.' . . . From what he said I knew he had at least £1000. He did not say how he was leaving it. He did not say he was leaving money to any other body."

Mrs May Frank deponed,—" . . . I have the farm of Dantryfail, and deceased visited me there once before he came to live with me. He wrote me frequently since I went to Dantryfail. He assisted me to rebuild the house. We were on very friendly terms. In July of 1897 he came to live with me permanently from Stornoway. We had repeated conversations about money. . . . My uncle was three or four months with me before he spoke about money. It was I who commenced the conversation. I told him that I thought he should make his will so as to save bother after his death. He said that he did not make a will, but that he had made out three bills in favour of three parties whom he was leaving his money to. He did not mention the names of the parties, but he held up his hands, and pointed and said that there were three, one out of each family of his sisters' and brothers' families. . . . He was about a year in the house before he mentioned their names. He held up his hand and said he made a bill with John Rose's name and his own, and my name and his own, and William Cameron's name and his own, and that we would get possession of it at his decease. . . ." She further deponed that on another occasion she said to him "to make things secure so as not to be a bother after his death, and he said,—'Will you do as I tell you?' I said,—'If I can, I will.' He said,—'Go to your banker for what is left for you, and get your money; and let others do the same, for you don't need to tell anybody what is left for you.'" She further deponed that the deceased had never told her the precise terms or contents of the bills, and had never shewn them to her.

John Rose deponed that the deceased had given him £200 before his death (which, however, he did not claim), and that when he gave it he added,—"I am leaving you a few hundreds more besides that. . . . He said he would leave a few hundreds more than that, but he did not mention the sum. I have no recollection of any other conversation with him about the money. . . ."

On 24th July 1900 the Sheriff-substitute (Shennan) pronounced an interlocutor, which, after finding that the pursuers had failed to prove facts and circumstances shewing on the part of the deceased an intention of direct de præsenti donation, proceeded,—"Finds in law that the sums contained in the said deposit-receipts were in bonis of the deceased at the time of his death, and fall to his executor: Therefore repels the claim for John Rose, Mrs May Frank, and William Cameron, and ranks and prefers the claimant Donald Cameron, deceased's executor, to the whole fund in medio: Finds all parties entitled to their expenses out of the fund in medio."

The pursuers and real raisers appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—Delivery was not essential.[1] Nor was it essential that the gift be made in expectation of death.[2] The evidence, particularly of Kenneth Cameron, shewed that the deceased intended a gift otherwise than by will. The deposit-receipts not being good as wills, the interpretation which gave effect to them as evidence of donation was to be preferred to the interpretation which made them of no effect.

Unless, therefore, delivery was necessary, which it was not, donation had been proved.

Counsel for the defender and respondent were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is unnecessary to go into many of the questions discussed in this Court, especially as to whether delivery is or is not requisite in order to constitute donation mortis causa. This case depends upon the evidence led. The only elements in the case not in dispute are that these deposit-receipts are made out in favour of the pursuers, and that they were not in their possession at the date of the testator's death. Accordingly, it is necessary that the pursuers' case should be supported by evidence of intention on the part of the deceased of de præsenti donation. Without going into the evidence I think that its effect is to shew, not that the deceased intended to make a donation, but that he intended to make a testamentary disposal of parts of his estate in such a way as to evade paying Government duty.

On the whole matter I have come to the same conclusion as the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD YOUNG.—I also concur in the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, which I think clearly right. I have referred to Snell's Principles of Equity, and I find that at the very commencement of his dealing with the subject of donatio mortis causa he says (twelfth edition, p. 197)—"It is essential to the validity of a donatio mortis causa that it should be made 'in the expectation of death'; and such a gift being always made on the condition that the gift shall be absolute only in case of the donor's death, it is revocable during his life—so that, if he recover from the illness or resume possession of the gift, it will be defeated. Also to the validity of a donatio mortis causa there is the further and all essential requisite of delivery; for if the intention be expressed in writing, but no delivery takes place, the document, even though signed by the donor, will be ineffectual as a donatio mortis causa; and although it might possibly be good as a declaration of the trust, still that is not at all likely, at least in the general case; for what is clearly intended to operate in one way, and fails to do so, is not, as a rule, construed by the Court to operate in another way in favour of a volunteer; but if there is an effectual delivery the gift will be good although the writing should not be attested at all, and even although the gift should be unaccompanied with any writing whatever; and an antecedent delivery to the donee, although in the character of bailee and not of donee, will apparently suffice, if the quality of the possession is changed before the death." Now, if we apply this, in my opinion, correct statement of the law to the present case we find that it is not stated that the donor was anticipating death or was ever unwell when the donation was made, and the case as presented is therefore in the same position in point of law as if the granter of the deposit-receipt had been a young and vigorous man. Further, in order to constitute donatio mortis causa I am of opinion that delivery or its equivalent is necessary. Of course, a man may come under an obligation to give by a deed which is enforceable against him in his lifetime or against his executor after his death, and the Court will sustain an action founded on such an obligation, but a verbal statement of intention to give is not a thing which the Court will listen to or enforce. I think abundance of authority to that effect might be cited. Here we have no evidence of donation except that this old gentleman took out three deposit-receipts, each of them in name of himself and one of the pursuers, payable to either or survivor. The deposit-receipt may be a document expressing an intention to give a person a sum of money, but it is not a gift of that sum. The alleged donee is not asking the Court to protect him in anything he has got possession of. He has neither the money nor the document that would enable him to uplift the money. I agree with your Lordship that there is no evidence of any intention to make a donation. I think it plain on the evidence that what the old gentleman had in view was that on his death, if he had not devised the money otherwise, the sums in the deposit-receipts should be taken by the pursuers. But there was nothing to prevent him making a will and providing that the pursuers should not get the sums in question. But a will would not affect a donation mortis causa.

No. 54.

I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute has come to the right conclusion in deciding that there is no evidence on which the Court can find that donation mortis causa or otherwise has been proved.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am also of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute's judgment is right. There have been a good many points treated on by Mr Kennedy on which I do not think it necessary to express any opinion. It is enough for the decision of this case to hold, as I do, that the appellants have failed to shew that the deceased made the donation in their favour on which their claim is based.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute has come to a sound conclusion. I think that it is unnecessary in this case to decide whether delivery is essential in order to constitute donatio mortis causa. The decisions on the point are not uniform, and any judgment in regard to it would require careful consideration. Even assuming that delivery is not necessary, I think it plain that there must be clear and complete evidence that the donor intended to make a donation mortis causa. I am of opinion that the pursuers have entirely failed to make that clear. On the evidence I am inclined to think that the deceased, in acting as he did, intended no more than to make bequests to the pursuers in such a way as to evade the Government duties on the legacies. He failed to carry out his intention, whatever it may have been, in such a way that legal effect can be given to it. He neither made a donation mortis causa, nor bequeathed effectual legacies. The sums in the deposit-receipts must therefore go to his executor.

THE COURT found in fact and in law in terms of the interlocutor appealed against, repelled the claim for John Rose, Mrs Frank, and William Cameron, and ranked and preferred Donald Cameron, as executor of the deceased Kenneth Cameron, to the whole fund in medio.

Administration of Justice—Process—Jury Trial—Motion for new trial—Juryman in employment of successful party—Jury Trials (Scotland) Act, 1815 (55 Geo. III. cap. 42), sec. 6—"Essential to the justice of the case."—In an action of damages brought against the North British Railway Company by the widow of a merchant who had been run over and killed on the line at Slamannan Station, a jury in Edinburgh returned a verdict for the defenders.

The pursuer moved for a new trial, on the ground that one of the jury was an employee of the defenders. The Court refused the motion, holding that the mere fact of one of the jury being an employee of the railway company did not make it "essential to the justice of the case" under section 6 of the Jury Trials (Scotland) Act, 1815, that there should be a new trial.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

MRS HELEN STRANG NASH or WATSON, Slamannan, widow of James M'Ghie Watson, merchant there, and his daughter, brought an action against the North British Railway Company concluding for payment of £2000 as damages for the death of Mr Watson.

The pursuers averred that Mr Watson was run over and killed at Slamannan Station on the defenders' line, and that the accident was due to the defective lighting of the station.

The case was tried before the Lord President and a jury, and resulted in a unanimous verdict for the defenders.

The pursuers afterwards ascertained that George Deans, Wellington Street, Portobello, who had served on the jury, was in the employment of the defenders. This was not known to the pursuers' or to the defenders' agent or counsel at the time of the trial. It appeared that Deans was employed in the engineer's department of the North British Railway, and that his main duties were to check gas and water meters. He had nothing to do with Slamannan Station, which was lighted by oil lamps. The number of persons employed by the North British Railway Company was about 18,500.

The pursuers moved for and obtained a rule for a new trial, on the ground that Deans had served on the jury.*

Argued for the pursuers;—It was essential to the justice of the case that there should be a new trial. The disqualification of one of the jury was a sufficient ground for setting aside a verdict.[1] Here the relationship of master and servant existed, and that was at common law sufficient to disqualify. Thus it was laid down by Lord Coke that that relationship was a ground of challenge propter affectum.[2] The pursuers were not bound to establish that the verdict was contrary to evidence. It was "essential to the justice of the case" that there should be a new trial, not because the verdict was wrong, but because it had been arrived at in an illegal and incompetent manner. Nor were they bound to shew that the mind of the juryman was in fact biassed. Possibility of bias was enough, as in the case of declinature of Judges, or disqualification of Justices of the Peace or county councillors.[1] The English authorities were collected and discussed in the opinion of Lord Stormonth-Darling in Blaik,[1] and established that a decision could not stand where taken part in by any person who was disqualified by interest. [Lord Kinnear referred to Wildridge v. Anderson.[2]]

Argued for the defenders;—The pursuers appealed to the provision authorising a new trial for a cause essential to the justice of the case. They were therefore bound to shew that the justice of the case required a new trial, and they had not done so, because they did not dispute that the verdict was right. Apart from this, the interest alleged on the part of the juryman was merely nominal, and not a disqualification. No case at all approaching the present could be found. The only case in which a verdict had ever been upset on the ground of interest on the part of one of the jury was that of Bailey v. Macaulay and Others.[3] There the juryman was practically trying his own case. The passage by Lord Coke referred to by the pursuers related to the challenge of jurymen—an entirely different matter. Sutherland v. Prestongrange Coal Company[4] did not touch the present case, and the precise limitations of the doctrine on which that case was decided were shewn in Hope v. Gemmell.[5]

LORD PRESIDENT.—This motion for a new trial is made under section 6 of 55 Geo. III. c. 42, which enacts,—"That in all cases in which an issue or issues shall have been directed to be tried by a jury, it shall be lawful and competent for the party who is dissatisfied with the verdict to apply to the Division of the Court of Session which directed the issue for a new trial," upon certain specified grounds which are not applicable to the present case, "or for such other cause as is essential to the justice of the case." I quote the section because it appears to me that the success or failure of the motion must depend upon its provisions. The case might have been different if the objection to this juryman had been stated by way of challenge, but now the sole question is, whether the fact that he was at the time of the trial a servant of the defenders makes it "essential to the justice of the case" that there should be a new trial. The onus of shewing this lies upon the pursuers, and one would expect that persons maintaining such a proposition should be in a position to allege that the verdict was wrong as being contrary to the evidence, but in the present case the pursuers make no such allegation. Accordingly, their contention assumes the somewhat paradoxical form that because a particular juryman served on the jury, it is essential to the justice of the case that a right verdict should be set aside. I should have great difficulty in holding that after a jury trial, when it is admitted, or not disputed, that the verdict was right, it could be challenged on the ground of being contrary to the justice of the case. And I may add that I think the pursuer's counsel exercised a wise discretion in advising that the verdict of the jury could not be assailed as being contrary to the evidence. I presided at the trial, and I have no hesitation in saying that the pursuers entirely failed to establish any fault on the part of the defenders or their servants—a consideration which might of itself be sufficient for the disposal of this motion. But as the case has been fully argued, I may express my opinion on the question raised as to the alleged disqualification of the juryman, keeping in view that the point is, whether his presence on the jury makes it essential to the justice of the case that a right verdict should be set aside. The question comes to be whether the fact that this juryman was in the service of the defenders, i.e., one of an organisation of about 18,500 men, gave him such an interest in the company's success, that he would be likely to endeavour to obtain a verdict in their favour whether they were right or wrong, instead of fairly trying the case as he was sworn to do. It would be a very strong thing to hold that the mere fact of a man being a member of such an organisation, gave him such an interest in the company as would or might lead him to return a verdict contrary to the evidence in order to benefit the company. If the subject-matter of the trial had been one in respect of which the particular servant had a personal duty—if, for instance, in this case the man who was responsible for the lighting of Slamannan Station when the accident occurred, had sat on the jury, it might have been more easy to maintain that he might be biassed by personal interest, but in the present case the juryman had no duties with regard to that station—indeed, he had never seen it.

It appears to me that none of the grounds for a new trial enumerated in section 6 of 55 Geo. III. c. 42, exist in this case, nor do any of the authorities cited support the pursuers' contention. In the English case of the provisional committee man[1] the juryman was substantially sitting as a judge in his own case, because if the defendants, who were also members of the provisional committee, were liable, so was he. Again, the case of Sutherland v. Prestongrange Coal Co.[2] was pressed upon us, but the circumstances of it were entirely different from those of the present case. There a juryman, while sworn to give a verdict according to the evidence led before the jury, went on an intervening day and inspected the colliery at which the accident had taken place, interrogating the persons whom he found there. He conducted a trial on his own account, came back to the Court armed with the results of his inquiry, and in all probability pressed upon the rest of the jury the views which he had formed in that extra-judicial proceeding. The Court considered that there would be a great risk of a failure of justice where the juryman had held what was really a trial within a trial. In contrast to this case is that of Hope v. Gemmell,[3] relative to a right of way over a road near Inveresk, where, on the evening of one of the days of the trial, a juryman walked over and looked at the road, and a motion was made for a new trial on that ground. The Court there, distinguishing the case from that of Sutherland v. Prestongrange Coal Co.,[1] held that the mere fact of a juryman having walked over and looked at the road in question was not likely to bias his judgment, and that it was not essential to the justice of the case that there should be a new trial. Other authorities were referred to in the argument, but they seem to me to be entirely different from the present case.

On these grounds I am of opinion that no sufficient cause has been shewn for setting aside the verdict of the jury, especially as it is not alleged that that verdict was wrong.

Something was said as to the duty of the parties to challenge persons called to serve on a jury who may have an interest in the case. I do not know what the practice is now, but the agents used to make inquiries in regard to the jurymen before the trial, and to instruct counsel to challenge those to whom they objected when they were called to enter the jury-box. I do not wish to make it a ground of judgment that this was not done in the present case, but I think it would be very undesirable to encourage a practice of not making inquiries as to the jurymen summoned with a view to challenging those who might be regarded as objectionable when they were called to serve, and afterwards seeking to have the verdict set aside on the ground that one of them was interested in the case.

LORD ADAM.—I think it is very material to keep in view the stage at which this motion is made. There has been a trial, and a verdict returned, and, as your Lordship has pointed out, certain grounds are set forth in section 6 of 55 George III. cap. 42, on which a new trial may be granted. I need not enumerate the various grounds; they wind up "or for such other cause as is essential to the justice of the case." It is under that clause of the section that this motion is made, and the party making it must shew that it is essential to the justice of the case that there should be a new trial. I do not see how Mr M'Lennan can succeed unless he shews that the presence on the jury of a person employed by one of the parties makes the whole trial incompetent. It may very well be that that might be the result if a juryman sat who was legally disqualified, and the pursuer's case might be different if he could establish that the mere fact of employment, no matter whether the employee be one of a large body or not, makes it incompetent for him to sit on a jury in a case in which his employer is interested. But there is no authority for that; the only authority cited is Lord Coke, who says that it is a competent ground of challenge of a juryman that he is a servant of one of the parties. I should think Lord Coke was speaking of a time when the relationship of master and servant was a very different thing from that which exists between a railway company and its employees. But all he says is that the relationship is a good ground of challenge, and the question whether the fact that the juryman is one of a body of 18,500 railway servants is necessarily of itself a good ground of challenge is a question which will never arise, because such a challenge, if made, would never be disputed.

Watson v. North British Railway Co.

If, then, it was not incompetent that the juryman should sit, in the sense of his presence vitiating the whole proceedings, is a new trial essential to the justice of the case? In the English case of Bailey v. Macaulay and Others[1] the juryman was practically a party to the case, because a verdict against the defendants would have been really a verdict against him. That case comes under the head of a cause essential to the justice of the case. But this is not a case of the same kind; the interest here is of the most shadowy description. What interest has a clerk in a railway company that the company should succeed in an action of damages brought against them? But here comes in the importance, as your Lordship has remarked, of considering the ground on which alone a new trial could here be granted. It must be essential to the justice of the case. Now, the verdict was right; that is not disputed, and it is not said that the presence of Deans on the jury induced a wrong verdict. How can it then be essential to the justice of the case that it should be set aside?

The case of Sutherland v. Prestongrange Coal Company[2] was a case where a juryman failed to fulfil his oath to try the case according to the evidence led, and conducted a trial for himself, and saw how the operations which resulted in the accident were carried out. That was held to justify a new trial, but, in contrast to that case, where in Hope v. Gemmell[3] a juryman went to walk over and look at a road which was in question in a right of way case, the motion for a new trial was refused. I do not think these cases bear out the pursuers' contention, and agree with your Lordship that the rule should be discharged.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordships, and think it is necessary to distinguish two entirely different grounds on which a motion of this kind may be made. If, on the one hand, it is said that the juryman who had sat was disqualified by some statutory enactment or some fixed rule of law, then it might be necessary to set aside the proceedings, even although it were admitted that the jury had arrived at a right verdict. The absolute disqualification of one of the jurymen might possibly vitiate the whole proceedings, and I should be disposed to think that if a juryman had such an interest in the case as to bring him within the rule stated by Lord Stormonth-Darling in Blaik v. Anderson,[4] that no man can be judge in his own cause, or if he had an interest essentially the same as that which he was trying, as in the case of Bailey,[1] it may be that such cases would fall within the same rule. But it is not said, and could not be said, that there is any statutory enactment, or any fixed rule of law, to exclude one out of a body of 18,500 persons in the employment of a railway company from sitting on a jury in a case to which the company is a party. That is not even suggested, and therefore the pursuers have to fall back on the provision of the statute, whereby a new trial may be granted if it is essential to the justice of the case. Now, in considering a motion on that ground, we are in a totally different position, because the first thing the unsuccessful party has to do is to shew that it is essential to the justice of the case that there should be a new trial. Now, on that point there is a difficulty to begin with, because it is not disputed, and is stated by your Lordship as the Judge who presided at the trial, that the verdict was perfectly just. By that I understand not merely that the verdict was one which we would not have upset as contrary to evidence, but that your Lordship concurred in it as the only verdict at which the jury could reasonably have arrived. I share the difficulty expressed by your Lordships in seeing how it can be essential to the justice of any case to set aside a just verdict, and order a new trial which may possibly result in an unjust verdict. But I am not disposed to rest my judgment exclusively upon that. It is quite right that we should consider the general question raised. I have no doubt that an interest less than that of a party to the cause, or one essentially the same, might be sufficient to induce the Court to set aside the verdict if it were shewn that that interest was such as would be likely to bias the mind of the juryman. But it is out of the question to say that in this case there is any interest of that kind. The juryman was one of 18,500 servants of the defenders. He was a clerk, whose duties had nothing to do with the workings which led to this accident, or the place at which it happened. I am quite unable to see that his relation to the defenders was such as necessarily, or even probably, to bias his mind. In all the cases in which the question has been considered whether interest in the cause disqualified persons in a judicial position, it has been held that there must be a real and substantial interest, and that a merely technical and nominal interest will not disqualify. All the authorities on that point are considered in a case to which I referred in the course of the argument, Wildridge v. Anderson.[1] It was there held that a nominal interest, that of an ex officio trustee, was not sufficient to disqualify a magistrate from trying a case of malicious destruction of the trust property. A question of a similar kind was raised in a case between the Lord Advocate and the Commissioners of Supply of Midlothian, in which one of the Judges proposed declinature, on the ground that he was himself a Commissioner, and there the Court held that the interest alleged had no real substance, could not possibly affect the judicial mind, and declined to sustain the declinature.

On the whole question, I agree with your Lordships that there is no technical reason, and there cannot be any just or equitable reason for setting aside a just verdict.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT discharged the rule, and applied the verdict.

Spottiswoode v. Pringle, July 14, 1849 (unreported but noted in Rankine, Land-Ownership (3d ed. p. 400), followed.
Forbes' Trustees v. Davidson, July 14, 1892, 19 R. 1022, distinguished.

THIS was a special case in which the question for the decision of the Court was whether the proprietor of lands who had a title to a thirl mill which had ceased to exist was nevertheless entitled to exact payment of (1) the sums commuted for thirlage by a verdict obtained under the Thirlage Act, 1799 (39 Geo. III. cap. 55),* and (2) dry multures.

The parties to the case were James Porteous of Turfhills in the county of Kinross, first party, and Alexander Price Haig of Blairhill, second party.

The following facts were stated in the case:—

"(1) The first party is heritable proprietor of the lands of Turfhills in the county of Kinross, conform to disposition in his favour, dated 10th and recorded 12th November 1892. Included in the said disposition there is a conveyance of Kinross Mill, which, however, at the date thereof was no longer in existence. The said mill was formerly a thirl mill, and the lands of Carsegour, Middle Tillyochie, and East Tillyochie, of which the second party is proprietor, were formerly astricted thereto. . . .

"(3) In 1806 and 1809 petitions were presented under the said Act [Thirlage Act, 1799] by, inter alios, the proprietors of the lands of Carsegour and the Tillyochies for commutation of their thirlage. The rights of thirlage stated by the applicants consisted principally of multures and knaveships, but also included services in assisting in building and repairing certain parts of the mill house, maintaining the roof, casting the dam, upholding certain parts of the troughs, and driving millstones, which services the applicants had been in the practice of rendering. The whole of these were found by the Sheriff in terms of the statute relevant to pass to the knowledge of the juries. After certain procedure, verdicts were finally pronounced by the juries on 23d November 1807 and 9th January 1810 respectively, commuting the thirlage of, inter alia, the said lands of Carsegour, Middle Tillyochie, and East Tillyochie, and the verdicts were registered as directed by the statute in the Particular Register of Sasines, &c., for Kinross on 3d December 1807 and 11th January 1810 respectively.

"(4) After the commutation had been made as aforesaid, the owners of the said mill, which came to be held along with the estate of Turfhills, received payment from the predecessors of the second party, proprietors of the astricted lands, of the value of the commuted multures in lieu of the old multures, sequels, and services. In or about the year 1884, Kinross Mill was burnt down. In 1890, part of the site thereof was sold by the author of the first party under reservation of all thirlage rights. In 1892, the remainder of the site, along with adjoining mill lands, passed to the first party under the disposition above referred to. The first party had sufficient space on the remaining part of the old site and the adjoining mill lands on which to erect a new mill, but he has at present no intention of doing so. On 10th March 1900, the first party obtained an assignation of the verdicts obtained on 23d November 1807, and 9th January 1810.

"(5) Payment of the commuted multures and services continued to be made by the second party and his predecessors to the owners of the mill and the site thereof up till 1897. Since that time, the second party has refused to make the said payments, on the ground that they are no longer due.

"(6) The second party has also, since the said date, refused to make payment of the sum which was previously paid by the proprietors of Carsegour to the proprietors of Kinross Mill as dry multure. The said dry multure was paid for bear growing on the lands of Carsegour, which were free from ordinary thirlage in regard to the said crop. In respect of the 14th section of the Act 39 Geo. III. c. 55, the said dry multure was not referred to the juries in 1807 and 1810. It consisted of 3 firlots of oats and 2 firlots of bear, and had been paid from time immemorial.

"(7) The second party admits that the first party has a valid progress of titles to the mill and mill lands; and that, as regards his title to demand and receive the commuted payments and dry multure—assuming these to be still exigible—no other exception can be taken to the previous titles than that which arises upon the disposition in favour of the first party.

"(8) The first party contends that he and his assignees and successors in the said commuted payments and dry multures are entitled to exact the same in all time coming, and that such right does not depend upon the existence of the said mill. As regards both the commuted payments and the dry multure, the second party contends that these are of the nature of servitudes, which are necessarily extinguished, or, at anyrate, which cannot be enforced, by reason of the destruction of the mill, which was the dominant tenement. With respect to the commuted payments, the second party further contends that, as these were partly fixed in commutation of the suckener's services in upholding the mill and its appurtenances, the millowner is bound to uphold the mill as a condition of exacting them."

The parties submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court the following question of law:—"Is the first party entitled to exact payment from the second party (1) of the sums commuted in the said verdicts so far as applicable to the second party's lands, and (2) of the dry multure applicable to the said lands?"

Argued for the first party;—(1) The statutory commutation operated a complete extinction of thirlage. There was no condition imposed by the statute that the mill should be maintained, and that was natural, seeing that the commuted annual payments represented the value of the thirlage to the proprietor of the mill, that was, the multures, less the expense of grinding the grain and keeping up the mill—in other words, the net profit made by him. Accordingly, if he had still to keep the mill going—making no gain by doing so—he would clearly be getting less than the statute intended to give him. The language of the statute throughout left no room for doubt that not only multures as such but the servitude of thirlage—for it was to all intents a servitude—was meant to be abolished once and for all by the verdict of the jury. The effect of a verdict having been obtained was to give each suckener the right to grind his corn where he liked, to build a mill for himself if he liked. If he were absolutely free, why should the mill owner not be equally free? The reason of the thing was altogether against the continuance of the mill, which would be of no advantage to anyone. It would be absolutely anomalous to impose or continue on the mill owner an obligation which no one had an interest to enforce. That would be directly contrary to the scope and spirit of the statute, which was a remedial one, and ought to be liberally construed.[1] The case of Spottiswoode,[2] to which the second party had called the attention of the Court, was precisely in point. The case of Forbes,[3] on the other hand, was concerned with the construction of a private contract, not of the statute. (2) In the case of dry multures, the existence of a mill was immaterial. The right to pay and to exact them was founded on prescription, and once established neither party could go back to the right of thirlage. By their actings parties had effected a commutation similar in result and just as permanent as the statutory commutation. There was nothing in reason or equity to suggest that there was any obligation to keep a going mill as a condition of exacting dry multures, a condition which would be barren of benefit to either party.[4]

No. 56.

Jan. 15, 1901. Porteous v. Haig.

Argued for the second party;—(1) It was a question whether thirlage was strictly a servitude,[2] but whatever its proper legal quality might be, it seemed reasonable that before a mill owner could exact mill dues or their equivalent, he should shew that he had a mill to which the suckener could bring his grain. It might be that a suckener could not insist on a mill being built, but it did not follow from that that the mill owner if he sought to exact payment of thirlage or commuted dues was not bound to keep his mill going. The subsumption of the statute appeared to be that a mill should continue in existence. Clearly the commuted payments could not be fixed unless there was a mill going at the time when the jury gave their verdict. There was no provision in the statute relieving the mill owner from continuing to keep it going. The statute did not in terms enact the permanent abolition of the servitude of thirlage. That did not appear to be its object at all, but only the valuation or ascertainment by a jury of the proper amounts to be paid annually by the sucken ers. The servitude remained, but the form in which it was prestable was changed. The statute did not create any new right in its place, or real burden on the thirled lands or otherwise. If the old right still remained, then the old conditions also remained, including that of keeping a mill. The second party had examined the session papers in the case of Spottiswoode,[2] and that decision was undoubtedly against the present contention. On the other hand, the more modern case of Forbes[3] was very clearly in favour of it, for although the question there did not arise directly under the statute, and the decision turned on the terms of a deed of submission, still there was no distinction in principle between the present case and it. (2) Dry multures, again, were founded on the continued payment for the prescriptive period, and obviously if before the forty years expired the mill ceased to exist, the payments would also cease to be made. In the same way after the prescriptive period had passed the continued existence of the mill was a necessary condition of the right to exact them, otherwise there being no dominant tenement, and there being no writing, the party claiming them had no title. Prescription merely fixed the customary amount, being a liquidation by consent of the thirlage dues, but that was on the assumption that something had to be paid. If there was no title, then nothing fell to be paid.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first and most important question is whether a commutation under the Act of 39 Geo. III. cap. 55, such as was effected by the verdicts of 23d November 1807 and 9th January 1810, and the registration of them in the Register of Sasines, operates as an extinction of the servitude of thirlage quoad the lands of the heritors, or merely as a liquidation or ascertainment of the amounts to be paid annually by them in respect of that servitude upon the footing that it still continues to exist? The solution of the question depends upon the terms of the Act, which I shall now consider.

The Act proceeds upon the preamble that it is found by experience that the servitude of thirlage, and right to mill services incident thereto in Scotland, are very unfavourable to the general improvement of the country, by checking the industry of the occupiers of the ground, and by occasioning troublesome and expensive litigation, and that it is highly expedient that it should be allowed to persons subject to such servitude to compensate, or to commute, the same by a fixed annual payment in lieu and satisfaction of the right of thirlage, and of services, prestations, and restrictions thereto incident or pertaining, and in some cases to make an entire and complete purchase of the same for a fair and adequate price. This preamble would lead one to expect that provision would be made by the enacting clauses of the Act for putting an end to a servitude which produced such injurious results, either in consideration of a fixed annual payment, or of a sum down, and this appears to me to be the effect of these clauses.

Section 1 enacts that it shall and may be lawful for the proprietors of any lands or tenements thirled or astricted to any mill in Scotland, or to the proprietor of any mill to which the lands or tenements of any person are thirled or astricted, who shall be desirous to have such thirlage or astriction changed or commuted into an annual payment, to apply to His Majesty's Sheriff or Steward-Depute of the county or stewartry in which such lands or tenements and mills are situated, or to his substitute, by a petition setting forth his or their desire, and specifying the lands and tenements so thirled, which he or they is or are desirous should be freed from such thirlage. The words "changed or commuted into an annual payment," and "should be freed from thirlage," seem to me to point plainly to an extinction of the servitude, not merely to a liquidation of the amount payable upon the footing of its remaining in force.

Provision is made for an assize being summoned after certain preliminary procedure, who shall constitute a jury for the determination of the annual value of the thirlage, services, and prestations, and after hearing evidence, the jury shall by their verdict or determination "fix and ascertain the amount of such annual payment in grain of such kinds and in such quantity and amount as to the said jury shall appear to be a just, fair, an

Administration of Justice—Process—Jury Trial—Motion for new trial—Juryman in employment of successful party—Jury Trials (Scotland) Act, 1815 (55 Geo. III. cap. 42), sec. 6—"Essential to the justice of the case."—In an action of damages brought against the North British Railway Company by the widow of a merchant who had been run over and killed on the line at Slamannan Station, a jury in Edinburgh returned a verdict for the defenders.

The pursuer moved for a new trial, on the ground that one of the jury was an employee of the defenders. The Court refused the motion, holding that the mere fact of one of the jury being an employee of the railway company did not make it "essential to the justice of the case" under section 6 of the Jury Trials (Scotland) Act, 1815, that there should be a new trial.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

MRS HELEN STRANG NASH OR WATSON, Slamannan, widow of James M'Ghie Watson, merchant there, and his daughter, brought an action against the North British Railway Company concluding for payment of £2000 as damages for the death of Mr Watson.

The pursuers averred that Mr Watson was run over and killed at Slamannan Station on the defenders' line, and that the accident was due to the defective lighting of the station.

The case was tried before the Lord President and a jury, and resulted in a unanimous verdict for the defenders.

The pursuers afterwards ascertained that George Deans, Wellington Street, Portobello, who had served on the jury, was in the employment of the defenders. This was not known to the pursuers' or to the defenders' agent or counsel at the time of the trial. It appeared that Deans was employed in the engineer's department of the North British Railway, and that his main duties were to check gas and water meters. He had nothing to do with Slamannan Station, which was lighted by oil lamps. The number of persons employed by the North British Railway Company was about 18,500.

The pursuers moved for and obtained a rule for a new trial, on the ground that Deans had served on the jury.*

Argued for the pursuers;—It was essential to the justice of the case that there should be a new trial. The disqualification of one of the jury was a sufficient ground for setting aside a verdict.[1] Here the relationship of master and servant existed, and that was at common law sufficient to disqualify. Thus it was laid down by Lord Coke that that relationship was a ground of challenge propter affectum.[2] The pursuers were not bound to establish that the verdict was con-same." This again points to an extinction of the thirlage, not merely to the regulation of it, or the ascertainment of the sums payable under it as an existing servitude.

If I be right in thinking that the effect of proceedings being taken under the statute is to extinguish the servitude of thirlage in consideration of money payments in one form or another, it, in my judgment, follows that there can be no obligation upon the millowner to maintain the mill, and that his ceasing to do so cannot have the effect of discharging the liability of the owners of the lands which were formerly astricted, to pay the compensation for the extinction of the servitude ascertained in terms of the statute. If it had been intended that the maintenance of the mill should be a condition of the commutation money being exigible, this would have been expressed in the statute, as there could be no ground for holding such a condition to be implied. The view that the statute did not contemplate that there should be any obligation to maintain the mill after the commutation, is confirmed by the provision in sec. 5, that the jury might fix, as the place of payment of the commutation money, either the mill or some other convenient place.

The question now considered has not, so far as I am aware, been decided in any reported case, but it was decided in terminis by the Second Division of the Court in the unreported case of Spottiswoode v. Pringle (14th July 1849, mentioned in Rankine on "Land-Ownership," 3d edit., p. 400). From the session papers in that case it appears that Mr Sandilands of Couston, in the year 1801, took proceedings under the Act 39 Geo. III. cap. 55, against the joint proprietors of the mill of Torphichen, to which his lands were astricted, for obtaining a commutation of the thirlage by the verdict of a jury, as also that the commutation was duly effected, and the verdict of the jury duly registered in the Register of Sasines. The estates of a successor of Mr Sandilands in the lands of Couston were sequestrated in or about the year 1848, and in the sequestration Mr Pringle "as half proprietor of Torphichen Mill" made a claim for converted multures for crops 1836 to 1844, both inclusive. The trustee in the sequestration at first ranked this claim, but after a dividend had been paid upon it he discovered "that Torphichen Mill has been in ruins for a number of years past, at least during the period for which the said claim is made," and he accordingly repelled the same, "reserving his right to recover payment of the sum he paid to account thereof by mistake while in ignorance of the disability or non-existence of said mill." Mr Pringle appealed to the Sheriff of the county, Linlithgow, against this determination, and the question was fully argued in a minute of debate and answers, and, after considering these, the Sheriff found Mr Pringle entitled, "notwithstanding the destruction of Torphichen Mill, to the converted multures libelled, and to all arrears of the same," therefore recalled the judgment of the trustee appealed against, and sustained the claim of the appellant. The case was brought by appeal before the Second Division of the Court, and they, on 14th July 1849, recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff, and found "that Mr Pringle is to be ranked for the amount of the converted multures for the years contained in the claim," and remitted to the Sheriff to proceed accordingly. The decision of the Second Division on the merits was the same as that of the Sheriff, whose interlocutor appears to have been recalled merely in order that the judgment might be put into a more correct form.

Although the question was not raised for decision in the case of the Duchess of Sutherland v. Reid's Trustees,[1] Lord President Inglis expressed an opinion as to the Act 39 Geo. III. cap. 55, which has an important bearing upon it. His Lordship said,—"It is important, I think, that this is in the highest sense a remedial statute. It is intended to put an end to a highly disadvantageous relation between the owners of a barony mill and of the lands thirled to it. We are therefore bound to give it a liberal interpretation in favour of the object proposed to be obtained by the statute."

The second party founded strongly upon the case of Forbes' Trustees v. Davidson,[1] but the decision in that case proceeded upon very special circumstances, and it does not appear to me to be at variance with the views now expressed. The question arose not under the Act of 39 Geo. III. cap. 55, but under a deed of submission dated in 1814, entered into between "certain proprietors connected with the sucken and thirlage of the meal-mill of Nairn," on the one part, and the proprietors of the mill on the other; and the Court held that upon a sound construction of the submission and decreet-arbitral, it was a condition of the right to exact the payments found due by the arbiter that the mill should be in a working condition, and that, as it was admitted that there was no intention to rebuild the mill, the defender should be assoilzied. The Court were of opinion that, upon a sound construction of the agreement, it provided for the relation of parties under the servitude of thirlage continuing, subject to pactional regulations, not for the termination or extinction of that servitude. I may add, that the case of Spottiswoode v. Pringle[2] does not appear to have been brought under the notice of the Court in that case.

For the reasons now given, I am of opinion that the first party is entitled to exact from the second party payment of the sums commuted in the verdicts in so far as applicable to the second party's lands, although Kinross Mill is no longer in existence.

The second question relates to dry multures, to which the Act of 39 Geo. III. c. 55, does not apply, and which consequently were not dealt with by the juries in 1807 and 1810. Dry multures are duties or money paid to a millowner by the owner or occupier of land at some time astricted to the mill, whether the grain grown on the land is or is not ground at the mill. The right to exact such multures is acquired by payment of them continuously for forty years, implying an agreement to pay and accept them. Dry multures are paid in consideration of the millowner absolving the suckener from the obligation to take his corn to the mill to be ground, and the payment is made and accepted as compensation to the millowner for the loss of profit which he sustains in consequence of the grain not being ground at his mill. The amount of the dry multure would therefore practically correspond to the difference between the insucken and the outsucken rates for grinding. This being so, the question comes to be, whether the proper inference from a course of payment for a period greatly exceeding forty years is not that the agreement to pay and accept the dry multure was a permanent, not a temporary, arrangement, and this seems to me to be the just inference in the circumstances. But if it must now be assumed that the millowner agreed permanently to acquit the landowners from all obligations to the mill in consideration of his undertaking to pay the dry multure in perpetuity, and that the landowner assented to this, the effect was, in my judgment, to make a permanent commutation of the thirlage, resulting like the statutory commutation in the extinction of the servitude, and if the servitude was extinguished there could be no obligation to maintain the mill as a condition of the right to exact the dry multure. The conclusion that the mill was to be kept up notwithstanding the agreement permanently to pay and accept the dry multure could only be reached by supposing that it was an implied condition of the agreement that an efficient mill should be maintained on the dominant estate, and it would be contrary to good sense to read into any agreement by mere implication a condition from which neither of the parties to it could derive any benefit. For these reasons I am of opinion that the second question put in the case should, like the first, be answered in the affirmative.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—"Answer both the questions in the case in the affirmative: Find that the first party is entitled to exact payment from the second party (1) of the sums commuted in the verdicts specified in the lease so far as applicable to the second party's lands; and (2) of the dry multure applicable to the said lands, notwithstanding that Kinross Mill is no longer in existence, and decern."

Expenses—Defenders in conjoined actions—Liability of unsuccessful defender for expenses of successful defender.—When separate actions against independent defenders are conjoined, the Court has power to find one defender liable in expenses to the other.

Question whether this would in any circumstances be competent if the actions were not conjoined.

Opinion in the negative by Lord M'Laren.

Opinion reserved by Lord Kinnear.

A passenger in an excursion coach who was injured in consequence of the coach coming into collision with a tramway car, sued the Tramway Company for damages. In their defences the Tramway Company denied liability, and averred that the accident was caused solely by the fault of the driver of the coach. The pursuer then raised a second action against the owner of the coach, who also denied liability. The actions were conjoined and tried before a jury, who returned a verdict finding the Tramway Company liable in damages, but negativing liability on the part of the owner of the coach.

Held that the Tramway Company were liable in expenses both to the pursuer and to the successful defender.

In November 1900, Miss Nellie Turner Thomson and Margaret Thomson, 21 Parkhurst Road, Holloway, London, raised an action against the Edinburgh and District Tramway Company for damages for personal injuries sustained in a collision between one of the Company's cars and an excursion coach upon which they were passengers.

The Tramway Company lodged defences, in which they denied liability, and averred that "the accident was due solely to the recklessness of the driver of the said coach in attempting to pass in front of the car at the time in question."

Before the record in this action was closed, on 26th November, the pursuers brought a second action against John Kerr, Meadowbank, Edinburgh, the owner of the coach, who also denied liability, and averred that the accident was due to the recklessness of the car-driver in starting the car while the coach was passing in front of it.

On 27th November the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), on the pursuers' motion, conjoined the actions.

The case was tried before the Lord President and a jury. The jury returned a verdict finding the Tramway Company liable in damages to the pursuers, and negativing liability on the part of the defender Kerr.

On 15th January 1901, the pursuers moved the Court to apply the verdict, to find the defenders the Tramway Company liable to them in expenses, and further to find the Tramway Company alternatively either (1) liable to relieve them of their liability for expenses to the defender Kerr, or (2) liable directly to the defender Kerr in expenses.

Argued for the pursuers;—They were entitled by either of the methods proposed to be relieved from liability for expenses to the successful defender. The last alternative was preferable, as it avoided circuity. The case of Brownlie v. Tennant [1] shewed that it was competent to give expenses to one defender against another, a view affirmed by Lord M'Laren in the case of Rooney v. Cormack.[2] The actions were conjoined by Lord Kincairney on the pursuers' motion. The defenders the Tramway Company objected to this, but did not reclaim, and it must now be taken that the Lord Ordinary was right in conjoining the actions, and that the defenders were in the same position as if they had originally been called as defenders in the same action. In Mackintosh v. Galbraith [3] the pursuer concluded against the defenders conjointly and severally. Here the pursuers' case was alternative, and thus fell within the principle of the poor-law cases referred to by Lord Trayner and Lord Moncreiff. The same principle had been applied in less special branches of the law.[4] This case was further distinguished from the case of Mackintosh v. Galbraith,[1] because the defender called in the first action was the defender who was ultimately found liable, and the second action was the result of his trying to throw the responsibility on someone else.

Argued for the Tramway Company;—The present case was ruled by Mackintosh v. Galbraith,[1] which the pursuers had entirely failed to distinguish. The pursuers ought to bear the responsibility of calling a defender who turned out not to be liable, and could not throw responsibility upon the shoulders of another defender who was not the dominus litis. The position of the defenders here was entirely independent. In the case of the Greenock Sacking Co.[2] the defenders were landlord and tenant of the premises which had collapsed, and had a joint interest arising out of contract. In the poor-law cases the defenders necessarily admitted that one or other was liable. In this case there was no such admission, and it might well be that the collision was the result of pure accident, and not of fault, in which case neither defender would be liable.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The circumstances of this case are briefly these:—The pursuers, two ladies, were passengers in a brake, or excursion coach, belonging to the defender John Kerr. While descending the hill on the road past the Braid Hills, near where the tramway line begins, the brake crossed in front of a tramway car, and a collision took place, resulting in the back part of the brake being cut off. By this accident the pursuers were injured, and they brought an action of damages against the Tramway Company. The company did not put forward any defence personal to the pursuers, but they maintained that the pursuers were mistaken in attributing to them the fault which caused the accident, alleging that the fault lay with the driver of the brake in crossing in front of the car, and they accordingly contended that the owner of the brake, John Kerr, was the person liable to make reparation to the pursuers. The pursuers, when challenged by the Tramway Company in this pointed way to raise an action against John Kerr, very properly did so, in order to bring the company and John Kerr, one or other of whom must be liable, into the field together, so that they might fight the matter out between themselves. Thus the second action was raised in consequence of the position taken up by the company. The actions were conjoined and tried together, and the two defenders cross-examined each other's witnesses, and when the cross-examination of a witness by the pursuers' counsel was regarded by counsel for a defender as satisfactory, he adopted it as the cross-examination for his client. Both defenders are thus before the Court in what must now be regarded as one action. I agree with what Lord M'Laren said in the case of Rooney v. Cormack,[3] to the effect that this Court has jurisdiction over the whole subject of expenses in any action before it, and can give decree against one defender in favour of another where the justice of the case demands that this should be done, and, in my opinion, this is as strong a case for the exercise of that power as could well be imagined. I therefore think that the Tramway Company should be found liable in expenses both to the pursuers and to John Kerr.

Thomson v. Edinburgh and District Tramways Co., Limited.

Thomson v. Kerr.

LORD M'LAREN.—I was anxious to hear argument on the question how far the practice had been extended of finding expenses due by one defender to another. It certainly appears from the cases of Rooney v. Cormack[1] and Mackintosh v. Galbraith[2] that where there are two or more necessary defenders, e.g., in an action for the reduction of a deed where it is proper to call the disponee under the deed as well as the party who procured the granting of the deed, the one defender may be entitled to receive his expenses from the other. The same principle applies where a contractual relation exists between the two defenders, as in an action directed against landlord and tenant, e.g., an action to prevent a nuisance. To that extent I am quite of opinion that our jurisdiction exists, and if I were doubtful on the point I should feel bound by the authorities cited.

In the present case there were originally two distinct and independent actions, and if they had continued to be separate I think the present motion could not have been properly made, because the Court cannot in general find a person liable in expenses who is not a party to the cause. I must except the case where the true dominus litis does not appear as a party. But the result of the application to conjoin the actions was to put the two actions into the same position as if they had been originally one, and they are accordingly under similar conditions to those of the cases to which I have referred. At this stage we must assume that the Lord Ordinary had good reasons for conjoining the actions, though, apart from specialties, I should rather deprecate the indiscriminate conjoining of actions raised against separate defenders. But as the Lord Ordinary's judgment was acquiesced in, it must be assumed to be right, and the case must be treated as if it had been originally raised against two defenders called in one summons, who were both bound to appear if they did not wish decree in absence to be pronounced against them. For these reasons I concur with your Lordship.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur. I have no doubt, after hearing the statement of your Lordship in the chair as to the circumstances of the trial and the questions raised, that there would be a grave miscarriage of justice if the pursuers were called upon to pay the expenses of the successful defender, without relief against the unsuccessful defender. I think it would be a grave reproach against our system of procedure if we had not power to obviate this injustice by giving decree for expenses against the party who was really responsible for their being incurred. The authorities, however, shew that we have such power, and there is a long continued course of practice in support of the decision proposed.

I agree with Lord M'Laren in attaching importance to the conjunction of the actions, and also in holding that at this stage we must assume that they were rightly conjoined.

I wish, however, to reserve my opinion on the question whether the same result would not follow without their having been conjoined. The question does not arise, and it is unnecessary to express a definite opinion, but I am not persuaded that the same liability might not have been enforced if the actions had been technically separate. It is not incompetent for the Court to impose liability for the expenses of a case upon a person who is not directly a party to it, and I am not at present prepared to agree that the principle on which that has been done might not be applied to such a case as the present.

Marriage-Contract — Postnuptial provision to wife taking effect stante matrimonio—Donatio inter virum et uxorem—Bankruptcy.—A husband, by deed of assignation dated June 1898, on the narrative that there was no marriage-contract between himself and his wife, and "in order so far to supply that defect and make provision for the said" wife, assigned, in the first place, to her and her heirs and assignees whomsoever the lease of the house which he and she occupied; in the second place, he assigned to her, her executors, administrators, and assigns, a policy of insurance on his life which he had taken out twenty-three years before; and, in the third place, he assigned to her the furniture in the house; declaring that he should have no right or title to the lease, and that neither the lease nor the subjects second and third assigned should be liable to his deeds or subject to the diligence of his creditors, it being further declared that the wife should be entitled to manage the said leasehold subjects in every respect as if she were still unmarried, his jus mariti and right of administration being excluded from these subjects as well as from the subjects second and third assigned. The deed of assignation was registered in the Register of Sasines quoad the leasehold subjects, and the assignation of the policy of insurance was intimated to the insurance company. The subjects assigned, which amounted in value to about £200, constituted the husband's whole property (apart from his annual income, which amounted to £120 a year), with the exception of a sum of £439 in bank, which was held to be his property, and which he uplifted two months after the date of the assignation, and, to the extent of £400, handed over to his wife. The husband's estates were sequestrated in April 1899 in consequence of the failure of a business which he was carrying on as one of a body of testamentary trustees.

In an action by the trustee in the sequestration against the wife and the husband for his interest, concluding for reduction of the assignation, held (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney, diss. Lord Young) that the assignation fell to be reduced as a donatio inter virum et uxorem, Lord Moncreiff also holding that the assignation was reducible as a collusive attempt by the husband to put his whole property beyond the reach of his creditors while he truly retained the control of it.

Robertson's Trustee v. Robertson.
2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

ON 2d June 1898 Donald Robertson, agent for the Highland Railway Company at Portree, executed an assignation in the following terms:—"I, Donald Robertson, railway agent, Portree, for the love, favour, and affection which I bear to Mary Margaret Ferguson or Robertson, my spouse, and residing with me, considering that no regular contract of marriage has been entered into betwixt us; therefore, in order in so far to supply that defect and make provision for the said Mary Margaret Ferguson or Robertson: In the first place, I do hereby assign to the said Mary Margaret Ferguson or Robertson, and her heirs and assignees whomsoever, a lease or tack" for ninety-nine years from Whitsunday 1835 of the house and ground described, being No. 5 Beaumont Crescent, Portree, with entry as at the date of the assignation: "In the second place, I do hereby assign unto the said Mary Margaret Ferguson or Robertson, her executors, administrators, and assigns," a policy of insurance for £100 on his life, taken out by him in 1875 in his own name, "together with the sum assured under the said policy, and all profits and bonuses and other additions accrued or that may accrue thereon: And in the third place, I do hereby assign and convey to the said Mary Margaret Ferguson or Robertson, her executors and assignees whomsoever, the whole household furniture and effects, including," &c., "which are or may be contained in the dwelling-house presently occupied by me in Beaumont Crescent aforesaid; providing and declaring always, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that I shall have no right or title to the lease or tack in the first place hereinbefore assigned, or to the subjects and others contained in the said lease or tack, or the rents, maills, or duties of the same, or to any part thereof, and that neither the same, nor the subjects, property, and effects in the second place and in the third place hereinbefore assigned and conveyed, shall be liable to my deeds or subject to the legal diligence of my creditors; but that notwithstanding such deeds, debts, or diligence, it shall be lawful for the said Mary Margaret Ferguson or Robertson, by herself alone, without my consent, to uplift and discharge the rents of the subjects contained in the said lease or tack, and to apply the same as she shall think proper; with power to the said Mary Margaret Ferguson or Robertson to output and input tenants, set tacks, and do everything in relation to the management of the said subjects as if she were still unmarried, the jus mariti and right of administration and all other right or title on my part being hereby expressly excluded so far as applicable to the said subjects, and also so far as applicable to the whole subjects, property, and effects in the second place and in the third place hereinbefore assigned and conveyed."

The assignation of the policy of insurance was intimated to the insurance company on 4th June, and the deed of assignation was recorded quoad the leasehold subjects in the Register of Sasines on 6th June 1898.

At the date of the assignation Donald Robertson was one of the trustees acting under the trust-disposition and settlement of John Robertson, merchant, Portree, who had died in 1890. By his trust-disposition and settlement John Robertson instructed his trustees to carry on his business, if they considered it advisable, in the interests of his widow and children. The trustees carried on the business accordingly under the style of John Robertson, and were so carrying it on at the date of the assignation.

On 1st April 1899 sequestration was awarded of the estates of the company trading as John Robertson, and also of the estates of John Robertson's trustees (a) as such trustees, (b) as partners of the said company, and (c) as individuals. John M'Bain, C.A., Aberdeen, was appointed trustee on the sequestrated estates.

On 15th November 1899 M'Bain, as trustee, brought an action against Mrs Robertson, wife of Donald Robertson, and against Donald Robertson as her curator and administrator-in-law and for any interest competent to him, concluding for reduction of the assignation, and for decree ordaining Mrs Robertson to deliver to the pursuer the titles of the leasehold property, 5 Beaumont Crescent, Portree, the policy of insurance specified in the assignation, and the furniture in 5 Beaumont Crescent.

The pursuer averred that at the date of the assignation Robertson "was insolvent." He concluded for reduction on the grounds (1st) that the assignation was a donation or gratuitous provision by Robertson to his wife, taking effect stante matrimonio, and therefore revocable by Robertson, and subject to reduction by the pursuer as trustee; and (2d) that the assignation was an alienation by Robertson when he was insolvent in favour of a conjunct and confident person, without true, just, and necessary cause, contrary to the Act 1621, cap. 18.

The defenders denied that Robertson was insolvent when he granted the assignation; averred that it made a moderate and reasonable provision for his wife, for whom no other provision had been made; and pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The assignation sought to be reduced being no more than a reasonable provision to the defender by her husband, and having been granted while he was solvent, is not reducible.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was to the following effect:—

Prior to the assignation under reduction Robertson had not made any provision for his wife by antenuptial contract or otherwise. His salary as agent for the railway company was £120 a year. The subjects carried by the assignation constituted his whole property at its date, apart from a sum of £439 standing in his name in the books of the Highland Railway Provident Savings Bank. On 19th August 1898, two months after the date of the assignation, Robertson uplifted this £439 from the bank, and in the present action, besides the conclusions already mentioned, the pursuer concluded for decree against Mrs Robertson for that sum, on the ground that Robertson, after uplifting the money, had made a donation of it to her. The defenders admitted that Robertson had paid £400 of the £439 to his wife, but they averred that it was her own property, although it had stood in her husband's name in the bank books. The Lord Ordinary sustained this defence, but the Court recalled the judgment, and granted decree for £439. In the report infra of the interlocutors and opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Court the portions dealing with the question regarding this £439 are omitted, as the question came to be purely a question of fact.

Robertson stated that the value of the leasehold subjects was about £150, of the policy of insurance about £37, and of the furniture in 5 Beaumont Crescent about £50. The defenders continued to occupy the house and to use the furniture after the assignation as before. They deponed that many of the articles of furniture belonged to Mrs Robertson irrespective of the assignation.

A large part of the evidence was directed to the question of Robertson's solvency at the date of the assignation. On that question it is sufficient here to say that there was no evidence and no suggestion that he was then personally insolvent; that his solvency depended entirely on the solvency of the business of John Robertson, for which he, along with John Robertson's other trustees, was assumed to be personally responsible; that the balance-sheet of the business of John Robertson, as at 30th April 1898, brought out an apparent surplus of £1966, on the assumption (which was then questioned) that certain heritable properties formed part of the business assets; that in June 1898 the pursuer, as trustee, appeared to be of opinion that the business would pay 20s. in the £1 if the heritage was included (see the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, note on this page); but that on realisation the assets of the business (including the heritage) fell short of the liabilities by £486, 13s. 6d. In August 1896 the trustees had granted a guarantee to the bank for advances to the trust.

On 28th June 1900 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that it has not been established that the assignation sought to be reduced was a gratuitous provision or donation in favour of the female defender, but finds that it was an onerous provision in her favour; (2) that the said assignation is not reducible under the Act 1621, c. 18, in respect that it has not been proved that it was granted without true, just, and necessary cause . . . Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the whole conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—The late John Robertson, sometime merchant in Portree, died in 1890, leaving a trust-deed in which he directed or requested his trustees to continue his business, which they did under the name and style of John Robertson, merchant in Portree. The result was unfortunate, and the estates of the company and of the trustees who carried on the business were sequestrated on 1st August 1899, and the pursuer was appointed trustee on the sequestrated estates. One of John Robertson's trustees, who carried on the business and became involved in the losses incurred, was the defender Donald Robertson, who was no relation of John Robertson, but who seems to have undertaken the trust and the conduct of the business through friendship for John Robertson, and for the benefit of his widow. It is, however, not disputed that he is liable for the whole debts, and his estates are included in the sequestration. The debts which the trustee is in the course of paying were, however, not incurred by the defender Donald Robertson in carrying on business for his own benefit, but in carrying on the business of the trust.

"It appears that for some time after the pursuer was appointed trustee, he was of opinion that the business was solvent. This appears from a memorial which he submitted to counsel in or about June 1899, in which the question asked was whether the heritage which belonged to the deceased John Robertson was embraced in the sequestration, and in which it is stated that, 'if the heritable properties are carried by the sequestration, the estate will be more than sufficient to pay 20s. per £1, while, if the heritable properties are not carried, the dividend from the estates—other than the individual estates of the trustees—cannot, it is thought, exceed 10s. per £1.'

"The answer of counsel was that the heritable properties were included, and the trustee, acting on that opinion, has realised them.

"The result, however, has not been what was anticipated. The price obtained for the heritable properties fell far short of their estimated values, and the stock in trade was sold at a large discount, with the result that a state of affairs made up on 30th May 1900 shewed that the estate of John

The pursuer reclaimed.

The nature of the arguments at the hearing sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Court.[1]

The pursuer intimated that he did not now insist in the conclusion for delivery of the furniture, looking to the evidence as to part of the furniture being the property of Mrs Robertson, and to the trifling value of the furniture.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer M'Bain is trustee on the sequestrated estate of a company trading under the name of John Robertson. The business of this firm was after John Robertson's death taken up by the defender Donald Robertson, who had been appointed trustee by John, and in Donald's hands the business was unsuccessful. The trustee in the sequestration now seeks to reduce an assignation by the defender Donald Robertson in favour of his wife, of certain leasehold property, of a policy of insurance, and certain household furniture. The gift to the wife is an absolute gift, and there is nothing of the nature of a postnuptial contract making provision to take effect at his death. The trustee contends that this gift

Robertson was insolvent, and that there was a deficiency of £486, 13s. 6d." (His Lordship then set forth the nature of the action.)

"It is important to observe that fraud is not alleged; the word fraud is not in the record; neither is it averred that Donald Robertson knew that he was insolvent or contemplated insolvency at the date of the assignation; and it may be as well to say here that, although the circumstances are suspicious, yet it does not appear that fraud is made out, for the reason that Robertson may have thought, as the pursuer himself, after examining into the matter, did think, that the company was perfectly solvent. Erskine speaks of such a deed as sometimes granted by a husband 'under a consciousness of his own insolvency,' but I do not think so much as that can be confidently predicated of Robertson when he executed the assignation. Possibly, however, although he may have thought that the company estate was solvent, still, as the value of the heritable part of it, and also of the stock in trade, was but matter of opinion, he may have feared that his view of the estate might prove too sanguine. But the pursuer makes no such suggestion.

"The pursuer concludes for complete, not partial, reduction, and there are no pleas in support of a partial reduction. . . .

"The first question is—Is the assignation revocable as a donation inter virum et uxorem or a gratuitous provision, or can it be sustained in whole or in part as a provision in her favour, bearing in view that there was no marriage-contract? This question assumes Robertson's solvency at the date of the deed, and is independent of the Statute 1621, c. 18.

"There is no doubt that if the assignation was revocable by the husband, and so far as it was so revocable, it falls to be reduced to that extent at the instance of the trustee. So far as it was not revocable by the husband, it was revocable, and therefore reducible at the trustee's instance, or otherwise that it was an alienation struck at by the Act 1621, cap. 18.

I think that there is great force in the trustee's contention that the gift being to the wife stante matrimonio, so that she could have disposed of everything, it cannot be looked upon as a provision made by the husband, to which the equitable considerations relating to such a provision can apply. To me it appears that the two cases quoted by the Lord Ordinary, viz., Kemp v. Napier[1] and Dunlop v. Johnston,[2] directly apply so far as regards a present gift, while they both recognise the distinction where a provision is made for a benefit to the wife after the dissolution of the marriage. In Dunlop v. Johnston[2] it was held that an annuity to a wife during the subsistence of the marriage was not a natural equivalent for her legal rights as a wife. Here, in this case, what was done was a transference to the wife of the husband's estate to be administered as she should please. That seems to me to be a stronger case than the case of Dunlop,[2] where the procedure was to place money in the hands of trustees to pay an alimentary annuity is not reducible on that ground at the instance of the trustee, although it may be reducible under the Act 1621, cap. 18.

"The assignation professes to be a provision. It proceeds on the consideration that no regular contract of marriage had been entered into between the spouses, and that the deed was 'in so far granted to supply that defect, and make provision for the said Mary Margaret Ferguson or Robertson'; but it does not bear to be in full of her legal rights, nor does it bear a discharge of these rights. It is expressed in language of present gift, and the entry to the leasehold subjects is said to be at its date. The pursuer's argument was that the assignation was nothing but a donation inter virum et uxorem, and as such revocable, and therefore reducible in toto, apart from any question of solvency or insolvency.

"The decisions on this point are conflicting. The pursuer rested his argument almost entirely on the case of Dunlop v. Johnston, 24th March 1865, 3 Macph. 758, aff. 2d April 1867, 5 Macph. (H. L.) 22; a case of great authority, which must be followed if it applies. The point decided was, however, not precisely the same as that which is here raised. There a provision in a postnuptial contract by a husband to his wife of the interest of £5000, to be paid during the life of the husband, was reduced as gratuitous at the instance of his trustee in bankruptcy, but a similar provision in the same deed to take effect after the husband's death was not reduced. Apparently reduction of the whole provision was concluded for, but reduction of the latter provision, namely, that to take effect after the husband's death, was not insisted in; but I think it may be gathered from the opinions that such a provision would, had it been challenged, have been sustained as a reasonable and onerous provision. The judgment did not proceed on the ground that a postnuptial provision for a wife was not effectual in a question with creditors. The opinions, both in the Court of Session and the House of Lords, clearly indicate the opposite view. The ground of jndgment seems to have been that the obligation of the husband to provide for his wife was completely satisfied by the provision to take effect after his death, and that therefore the other provision was wholly gratuitous.

"The case of Kemp v. Napier, 1st February 1842, 4 D. 558, is similar. There, a husband provided to his wife an annuity of £200 during his life, and of £500 after his death. The provision of the annuity of £200 was to the wife stante matrimonio. It is, as the Lord Justice-Clerk described the annuity in Dunlop's[1] case, "nothing but a transfer from the husband without adequate consideration," the plain purpose being to protect what is given from the diligence of the husband's creditors—a purpose which is not legitimate. Such a gift is revocable, and a postnuptial deed to attain that object cannot receive effect in a case with creditors. The Lord Ordinary in deciding that Dunlop's[2] case does not apply here gives weight to the case of Rust v. Smith,[3] where a husband purchased a property, and got the disponers to grant the title in name of his wife, and where this was upheld as a provision for the wife. The circumstances there were very exceptional. In the first place, as pointed out by Lord Deas, it was not left within the power of the husband and wife by destroying the deed to alter the state of matters, as they might have done had the deed been one granted by the husband; and, in the second place, it appeared in that case that the wife was carrying on an industry of her own, and thus bringing profit to her husband, and that there was ground for holding that out of these profits the set aside as gratuitous and a donation; but not the provision of £500, which bore to be payable after the husband's death. It is true that there was not, and could not have been, any decision on that latter point, because the wife predeceased her husband; but the opinions of the Judges to the effect that such a provision would have been sustained as an onerous provision sufficiently appear.

"I do not read these cases as deciding that a postnuptial provision by a husband could in no case be sustained during the husband's life. That could not have been held consistently with Rust v. Smith, which was decided about two months before the case of Dunlop, and was quoted in the argument in that case. In Rust v. Smith, 14th January 1865, 3 Macph. 378, a disposition taken by a husband in favour of his wife was sustained in a question with his trustee in bankruptcy. That disposition, of course, took effect during the husband's lifetime; and in reference to this case, Lord Fraser (Husband and Wife, p. 948), remarks: 'It is difficult to see how the soundness of this decision, so far as regards the rents during the subsistence of the marriage, can be maintained, after the case of Dunlop v. Johnston.' In the case of Honeyman & Wilson v. Robertson, 7th December 1886, 14 R. 163, which is subsequent to the publication of Lord Fraser's book, Lord President Inglis referred to the case of Rust v. Smith without disapproval, and as 'a very good example of how such a provision may be made effectual against the husband's creditors.' The present case, so far as regards the conveyance of the leasehold subjects, bears more resemblance to the case of Rust than to the case of Dunlop, because here the assignation contains the whole provision. If, therefore, I am entitled or bound to hold the case of Rust v. Smith as not deprived of authority by the decision in Dunlop v. Johnston, I rather conceive I am bound to follow the case which most nearly resembles the present, and therefore to sustain the assignation so far as it assigns the heritable subjects, if it does not exceed a reasonable provision. I have further to notice that no demand for a partial reduction was made, and no argument in support of it was submitted.

"It is to be kept in view that the assignation conveys two other subjects besides the leasehold property, namely, a policy of insurance for £100 and household furniture. Now, I do not see how the assignation of husband might make "some small irrevocable provision for his wife by buying the property for her." The case was therefore highly exceptional, and I cannot hold, as the Lord Ordinary does, that the case of Rust[1] detracts from the authority of Dunlop's[2] case. I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to reduction of the assignation on the first ground stated. This makes it unnecessary to consider the other ground of reduction stated by the trustee in the sequestration.

LORD YOUNG.—This case has been fully argued, and we took time to consider our judgment. The result of my own consideration was a disposition to agree with the Lord Ordinary; indeed, my opinion was that his Lordship's judgment ought to be affirmed. I reconsidered that opinion when I ascertained that your Lordships all held a different view, but I must own without being able to change the impression which I had formed. I do not think that it would serve any useful purpose to enter upon the details of the case. I was certainly favourably impressed with the position of the the policy could be held revocable as a donation consistently with the judgment in Craig v. Galloway, 22 D. 1211, rev. 4 Macq. 267. If the assignation had been of the policy only, the case would have been the same as Craig v. Galloway, assuming Robertson's solvency, and I do not see that it should make a difference that other subjects are conveyed along with it.

"There is a difficulty about the furniture. There is a question as to the ownership of some of the articles of the inventory. But I do not see how the assignation of furniture which belonged to Donald Robertson, and which was neither inventoried nor in any form delivered, can be sustained. Reduction to that effect has not, however, as yet been asked.

"The question remains whether, supposing the assignation to be a provision, it was in the circumstances unreasonable and excessive. I apprehend that if it was excessive it might quoad the excess be held revocable as a gratuitous donation, and therefore reducible. Now, no doubt, this may be a difficult point; but, in the first place, this question was not argued. The pursuer made no suggestion as to the extent to which it might be sustained, if sustained at all; secondly, the total amount was not great, although, it is true, it was all that Robertson had. I am disposed to think that it is usual to deal with a question of this sort somewhat liberally, and as the pursuer has not aided me by any suggestion as to what might be a reasonable sum, I have found it hard to say that a provision worth no more than about £200 can be held excessive.

"I am therefore, on the whole, disposed to reject the pursuer's argument, so far as it is founded on the law as to the revocability of donations, and so far as it proceeds on the assumption of Robertson's solvency.

"But (secondly) the pursuer goes on to contend that the defender was not solvent at the date of the assignation; that is the same as to say that the company estate was not solvent, and that the deed was therefore reducible under the Act 1621, cap. 18. This raises a different question. I think, as I have already indicated, that at the date of the assignation Donald Robertson believed, although, perhaps, not with perfect confidence, that the estate was solvent; but it is now insolvent, and was so, of course, at the date of realisation. There is no proof that it had fallen off in value between the date of the assignation and the date of realisation; and I think it must be admitted that the defender's estimate of the value of the estate was over sanguine, and that at the date of the assignation it was in fact defender Robertson. He was in a good position in the service of the railway company, from whom he received £120 a year, but he had very little personal property. He had been carrying on the business of the deceased John Robertson as one of John's trustees, not on his own account, but for behoof of the truster's wife and family, and the result was that in 1899 it turned out that the business was unsuccessful, and there was a question whether the trust-estate would be sufficient to pay the company's debts. It seems to have been thought uncertain, in 1899, whether the heritage of the deceased John Robertson was liable to pay the debts of the company. If it was, the conclusion arrived at was that the company was solvent; if not, that there would be a deficiency. It is to be observed that Donald Robertson had no debts of his own, but he was liable for the deficiency if there turned out to be a deficiency in the trust business because of his conduct in allowing his name to be used for behoof of the truster's widow and children. Well, in 1898 Robertson was solvent, and was under no apprehension as to his liabilities except for a deficiency on John Robertson's business not then ascertained. In these circumstances I suppose that his attention was called to the fact that the business was not turning out successfully—that there was a risk—and he accordingly thought it right to make this provision for his wife. In my opinion he was entitled to do so. I think therefore that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am unable to concur in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

The deed sought to be reduced is a conveyance by Robertson to his wife of the whole estate of which he was possessed at its date, and the purpose for which it was granted appears to me from the whole circumstances to be plain. I think that purpose was to put the estate of Robertson beyond the reach of his creditors, but not beyond the reach of his own enjoyment. It is said that the deed is maintainable on the ground that it was only a reasonable provision made by a husband for a wife for whom no provision had previously been made. Looking to Robertson's circumstances at the date of the deed I seriously doubt whether he was in a position to make insolvent. That being so, the question arises as to the effect of a postnuptial provision to a wife after the husband is insolvent. This is well known to be a debateable point. The chief authorities are probably Ersk. iv. 1, 33; Bell's Com. i. 687; and Fraser on Husband and Wife, 1498. On this question I rather take the view presented by the defender's counsel that, in the present state of the authorities, it should be held in the Outer-House that such a postnuptial provision is effectual. The question is, whether it is onerous or gratuitous. I think it is not gratuitous, but onerous. I think that not only the judgment in Rust v. Smith, but also the opinions of the Judges in Kemp v. Napier and Dunlop v. Johnston, support the view that a postnuptial provision to a wife is, or may be, onerous; and if it be onerous, like an antenuptial contract, although not to such a high degree, it rather appears to me that, so far as onerous,—that is to say, so far as moderate,—it should, like an antenuptial contract, be exempt from the operation of the Act 1621, cap. 18; and on the whole I come to the conclusion, although with much hesitation, that the defenders are entitled to absolvitor from the reductive conclusion and the conclusions following on it, except so far as regards the furniture. . . ."

any provision for his wife which would have been preferable to the claims of creditors. But the deed has none of the characteristics of a provision, and, on the contrary, has the characteristics of a gift. It is a conveyance of the granter's whole estate, heritable and moveable, and it is not usual for a husband to strip himself of everything he possesses and transfer it to his wife as a provision for her stante matrimonio. It is not conditioned to take effect in the event of the wife's survivance, but gives possession to both heritage and moveables at once—that is, at the date of granting. These circumstances alone stamp the deed, in my opinion, with the character of a gift. If this view is sound, then it follows that the gift was revoked by Robertson's bankruptcy, and the pursuer is entitled to have it set aside. It was urged upon us that the deed in question might be sustained as a provision, at all events in so far as regards the life policy which it transfers, on the authority of the decision in the case of Craig v. Galloway.[1] But that case was distinctly different from the present. There the life policy was originally taken out in the wife's name, and the only thing (certainly the main thing) urged against it as a provision was that the wife could stante matrimonio surrender it, and take the surrender value. The Court thought that such a proceeding was not at any time within the contemplation of the parties, and was in itself so improbable that no weight was given to that consideration, and the Court being of opinion that the life policy was taken out as a provision for the wife, sustained the wife's right against the challenge of the husband's creditors. But I am satisfied that in the present case the transfer of the husband's policy was not made as a provision, but as part of the gift of his whole estate, and in that view the case of Craig v. Galloway [1] has no application.

Lord Moncreiff.—In more than one passage in his opinion the Lord Ordinary discloses his uneasiness and suspicion of the defenders' case, but notwithstanding he has assoilzied the defenders from the whole conclusions of the action.

I entirely differ from him on both branches of the case, and first as to the assignation granted by the male defender in June 1898. Having considered the whole of the evidence I can come to no other conclusion than that when by that deed the male defender professed to divest himself in favour of his wife of (what he says was) his whole property, including the lease of the house in which he lived, and all the furniture therein, he did so, not for the bona fide purpose of making a provision for his wife in the event of his predeceasing her, but in order to defeat the rights of his creditors in the event which he anticipated of their proceeding against his estate under the guarantee which he had granted.

The assignation does not profess to be a provision for the wife in the event of her survivance; it is an absolute gift, to take effect from its date and during the husband's life. If it is of any effect the wife might have realised the whole of the property assigned immediately. A husband if solvent can by postnuptial settlement make a rational provision for his wife in the event of her survivance, which shall not be revocable except quoad excessum. "But there must be no circumstances whence to presume an intention in the husband to prefer his wife to his other creditors"—Ersk. iv. 1, 33. Now, in two points this assignation fails. First, it is not a provision to take effect only in the event of the wife's survivance; and secondly, it was clearly made for the purpose of defeating an anticipated claim by the husband's creditors. The effect of it, if a demand had been made on him at the time, would have been to make him ostensibly bankrupt.

I am therefore of opinion that this assignation was either a gratuitous donation inter virum et uxorem made stante matrimonio, or, as I think, a purely collusive attempt by the male defender to put his whole estate beyond the reach of his creditors while truly retaining control of it. In either case it is revocable and reducible.

In this view it is not necessary to consider the case on the footing that the assignation can be regarded as bona fide intended to be a provision for the female defender. But if it could be so regarded it would be reducible in part. A husband cannot make an irrevocable provision for his wife to take effect stante matrimonio. I do not share the Lord Ordinary's doubt on this point, which I think is settled by the case of Dunlop v. Johnston.[1]

The only matter as to which some doubt might have existed is in regard to the policy of assurance. In the view which I take of the case this policy was assigned not as a provision to take effect in the event of the wife's survivance, but simply as one asset of the male defender's effects which was made over along with the rest of his property.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, granted decree of reduction, and ordained the defender Mrs Robertson to deliver to the pursuer the titles of the leasehold subjects and the policy of insurance, decerned for payment of £439, 10s. 8d., and quoad ultra assoilzied the defenders.

MRS CATHERINE MUNRO WARRAND of Bught, Inverness-shire, died on 24th March 1891, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement and deed of directions, dated 3d October 1883 (with four codicils thereto of various dates) by which she conveyed her whole estates, heritable and moveable, real and personal, to trustees for the purposes therein specified.

By the trust-disposition and deed of directions, the testatrix, after providing for the disposal of her estates of Bught and Piltochie, and directing payment of a number of legacies, in the fifth place gave directions as to the disposal of the residue of her means and estates. The fourth and last branch of the fifth purpose was in the following terms:—

brother who may predecease the term of payment of such share, leaving lawful issue, shall be paid to such surviving issue or their legal guardians, and failing issue, the share of any such predeceasing child shall belong to the survivors of the said children of my brother and the issue of predeceasers, if any, equally among them per stirpes: But it is hereby declared that any of the children of my said brother, upon attaining majority, and during the lifetime of their father, shall have power to divide and apportion his or her prospective interest among his or her children and their issue, in such proportions and subject to such conditions as he or she may think proper; and I direct the said trustees to hold and apply the rents, dividends, and other annual produce and income of the share of said residue prospectively falling to each of the children of the said Alexander John Cruickshank Warrand (in the event of his decease), or such part thereof as the said trustees may deem necessary and proper for the maintenance, clothing, education, upbringing, and advantage of such child, until actual payment of his or her share, and to accumulate as part of said share such part of the income thereof as the said trustees may not apply for these purposes, if such accumulation may lawfully be made, otherwise the right to such surplus income shall immediately vest in the child or children prospectively entitled to the share of capital producing such income; and notwithstanding the period of payment of the shares of residue before expressed, I provide that it shall be lawful to and in power and option of the said trustees, if they shall see fit to advance and pay, after my death and before the arrival of the term of payment foresaid, to and for behoof of the said children of the said Alexander John Cruickshank Warrand, or any of them, with consent of my said brother during his life and at the discretion of the said trustees after his death, such part as they may see fit of their respective shares of the fee or capital of the said residue for the support of such child or children, or for establishing a son in business or fitting out or making provision for a daughter on marriage, or otherwise for behoof of such child or children."

The testatrix was survived by her brother, Alexander John Cruickshank Warrand.

On 4th April 1893 Alexander J. C. Warrand executed a deed of appointment, by which upon the narrative of the foregoing power of appointment and upon the further narrative that he then had eight surviving children, viz.:—Alexander Redmond Bewley Warrand, Emily Catherine Fannie Warrand, Louisa Laura Forbes Warrand or Caton, Constance Georgina Warrand, Hugh Munro Warrand, George Arthur Stuart Warrand, Myra Kathleen Grant Warrand, and Duncan Grant Warrand; and that he had resolved to exercise the power of appointment: "Therefore, in virtue of the powers conferred on me by the said trust-disposition and settlement and deed of directions and codicils, and of all other powers enabling me herein, I do hereby appoint that the said residue shall on my death belong to the said children (on the conditions and under the restrictions hereinafter written, so far as I may lawfully impose such conditions and restrictions) in the proportions following, that is to say, to the said Alexander Redmond Bewley Warrand, eighteen one-hundredth parts; to the said Emily Catherine Fannie Warrand, eighteen one-hundredth parts; to the said Louisa Laura Forbes Warrand or Caton, twelve one-hundredth parts; to the said Constance Georgina Warrand, twelve one-hundredth parts; to the said Hugh Munro Warrand, ten one-hundredth parts; to the said George Arthur Stuart Warrand, eight one-hundredth parts; to the said Myra Kathleen Grant Warrand twelve one-hundredth parts; and to the said Duncan Grant Warrand, ten one-hundredth parts; and I provide that the share hereby appointed to the said Alexander Redmond Bewley Warrand and Louisa Laura Forbes Warrand or Caton shall vest in and be payable to them on my death; and with regard to the shares of my other children, I provide, direct, and appoint that the said shares shall belong to them in liferent only, and for their alimentary use allenarly, and shall be held by the trustees acting under said trust-disposition and settlement and deed of directions and codicils during the lifetimes of the said children respectively, and the free income of the respective shares shall be paid to such children, and that the fee or capital of the respective shares shall belong to the lawful issue of such children, and in the event of any such children dying without issue, the share of such child shall on his or her death be disposed of as he or she by will or other deed shall direct, and failing direction, shall belong to the next of kin of such child, and the shares of the said children, other than the said Alexander Redmond Bewley Warrand and Louisa Laura Forbes Warrand or Caton, shall vest in liferent as aforesaid on my death, and on their respectively attaining majority in the case of sons, or in the case of daughters on their respectively attaining majority or being married: And I further provide, direct, and appoint that notwithstanding the restriction of the children above named to a liferent, it shall be in the power of the trustees acting under the said trust-disposition and settlement and deed of directions and codicils to advance and pay to any of such children, or to apply for his or her behoof from time to time, or in one sum, a part of the capital of the share of such child not exceeding one-third of the total capital of such share, and the interest of the issue of such child shall be restricted accordingly."

By another deed of appointment, dated 10th December 1894, Mr Warrand directed and appointed that the shares of residue which should belong to his sons Hugh Munro Warrand and George Arthur Stuart Warrand should be nine one-hundredth parts each, instead of ten one-hundredth parts and eight one-hundredth parts respectively, as provided in the earlier deed of appointment.

Mr Alexander J. C. Warrand died on 2d November 1899, survived by the eight children mentioned in the deed of appointment, all of whom had attained majority.

In November 1900 a special case was presented by (1) Mrs Warrand's trustees; (2) Hugh Munro Warrand; and (3) George Arthur Stuart Warrand, for determination of, inter alia, the following question of law:—"1. Is the provision in the deed of appointment of 4th April 1893, whereby the second and third parties are restricted to a liferent of the shares apportioned to them, with a power of disposal in the event of their dying without issue, a valid exercise of the power of appointment conferred on Alexander John Cruickshank Warrand, and ought it to receive effect? or Are the second and third parties entitled to payment of the capital of the sums appointed to them respectively?"

The facts above narrated were set forth in the case.

The first parties maintained that the restriction of the shares of the second and third parties to a liferent was effectual. The second and third parties maintained that, on a sound construction of Mrs

Warrand's trust-disposition and settlement and deed of directions, Mr Alexander J. C. Warrand was not entitled to restrict these parties to a liferent of their shares, and to appoint the fee to their children; that the appointment of the fee to their children was invalid, and that they were entitled to payment of the capital of the sums appointed to them respectively.[1]

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The late Mrs Catherine Warrand by her trust-disposition and settlement directed her trustees, in an event which has happened, to pay and divide the residue and remainder of her estate to the children of her brother Alexander, "in such proportions, at such times, on such conditions, and under such restrictions as he (Alexander) may direct by any writing under his hand." Alexander, by deeds executed by him of date 4th April 1893 and 10th December 1894, on the narrative of the foresaid power conferred on him by his sister, appointed with regard to the second and third parties to this case (with whose interests only we are here concerned) that their shares of said residue should be 9/100th parts to each; but he also provided that said shares should belong to them in liferent only and for their alimentary use allenarly, and that the fee or capital of their respective shares should belong to their lawful issue, and failing such issue, should be disposed of as they (the second and third parties) should direct, and failing such direction should belong to their next of kin. We are asked to determine whether such an appointment by Alexander was a valid exercise of the power conferred on him. There is authority for the proposition that an appointment within the power is valid, and may be sustained, although burdened with conditions ultra vires of the appointer. In such a case the appointment is sustained, and the conditions annexed to it are disregarded. Whatever, therefore, may be thought of the conditions and restrictions imposed here on the shares appointed to the second and third parties, I think there can be no doubt that there was a valid appointment made in favour of each of them of a 9/100th part of the residue.

But, as I have pointed out, Alexander Warrand by his deed of appointment directed that the shares appointed to the second and third parties should belong to them in liferent only, and the fee to their issue, or, failing issue, as the second and third parties should direct, or to their next of kin. Was it competent to the appointer to make these restrictions and conditions? I think not. In the first place, I think it clear that the direction to give the fee of the shares in question to the children of the second and third parties was ultra vires of the appointer, because he was thereby conferring part of the estate to be divided on persons who were not objects of the power. In the second place, to confer a mere liferent of the shares appointed was not within the power of the appointer. What he was authorised by the power to do was to apportion the residue of his sister's means and estate—that is, the fee of such residue—the residue itself—among his children. To give them a mere liferent of a portion of that estate was not giving them that to which by the truster's settlement they were entitled, and which by the same settlement the appointer was directed to give them. There is no authority, so far as I know, for the proposition that under a direction and power to appoint to a share of an estate the appointer may validly appoint to a mere liferent of a share. On the contrary, I take the law on that matter to be well stated by the Lord Justice-Clerk in the case of Lennock's Trustees,[1] when he says,—"When a sum of money is left to certain persons, and a power is conferred on another to divide or apportion the amount among them, it has been settled that it is beyond the power to restrict the share of one of the beneficiaries or legatees to a mere right of liferent, and an attempt so to exercise the power will be of no avail." But it has been maintained by the first parties that it was competent to Alexander Warrand to restrict the right of the second and third parties to a liferent if he gave them also a power of disposal of the fee. For this proposition there is some appearance of authority in the cases to which we were referred, namely, the cases of Lennock's Trustees,[1] Wallace,[2] and Wright's Trustees.[3] But when these cases are carefully considered I think it appears that they do not support the proposition, to the full extent at all events for which the first parties contend. In these cases the right conferred on the beneficiary was regarded as in some measure a right of fee the enjoyment or use of which was restricted. I do not myself see how a right of fee can be conferred, and at the same time a restriction placed on its use and enjoyment. It was decided in Miller's case[4] that this could not be done. But assuming for the moment that it can—that there can be a fee restricted to a liferent enjoyment of it by the fiar (as by declaring that he shall not be entitled to alienate it gratuitously during his lifetime, although that would not exclude the diligence of creditors against the fee) —the case we are here dealing with could not be brought within such a category. The right which the appointer declared to be the right of the second and third parties was not a restricted fee, but an alimentary liferent allenarly. No doubt there is added a power of disposal, but it is not absolute, but conditional—conditional on the second and third parties having no issue; so that even if it were within the power of an appointer directed to divide the money or estate among certain persons, to appoint to a certain share in liferent with an absolute power of disposal of the fee (a view which I am not to be regarded as holding), that would not avail the first parties in the present case.

I am, therefore, of opinion that, while the appointment in the present case is valid in so far as it appoints a 9/100th share of the truster's residue to each of the second and third parties, it is invalid and ineffectual in so far as regards the conditions annexed to the appointment.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur.

Warrand's Trustees v. Warrand.

LORD MONCREIFF.—It is clear from the terms of the power of appointment that the primary objects of the power among whom the residue was to be divided were such of the immediate children of Alexander Warrand as survived what is called in the deed the "term of payment"—that is, such as survived their father and attained majority, or, being females, married. Alexander Warrand was given power to divide the fund among his children "in such proportions, at such times, on such conditions, and under such restrictions" as he might direct by any writing under his hand. The issue of the children are to take in the event of their respective parent's predeceasing the "term of payment," which is expressly said to be the time of vesting. To this limited extent they also are objects of the power, but not in competition with their parents.

The first parties, who are the testamentary trustees of Mrs Catherine Warrand, do not maintain that the appointment made by Alexander Warrand is in all respects valid; but they do maintain that he validly executed the power of appointment conferred upon him in so far as he restricted the shares of the second and third parties to a liferent. While I think that the first parties were well entitled to present the question for the determination of the Court, and while their argument at first sight receives support from the cases to which we were referred by Mr Mackintosh, I do not think that their contention is sound. The appointment made by Alexander Warrand, while good as a division and apportionment of the capital, is ultra vires and invalid in so far as it restricts the rights of the second and third parties to a liferent.

Turning to the deed of appointment the appointment by Alexander Warrand commences thus:—"In virtue of the powers conferred on me by the said trust-disposition and settlement and deed of directions and codicils, and of all other powers enabling me herein, I do hereby appoint that the residue shall on my death belong to the said children (on the conditions and under the restrictions hereinafter written, so far as I may lawfully impose such conditions and restrictions) in the proportions following—that is to say." He then proceeds to divide the fund into one hundred parts, and these he apportions in certain proportions among his eight children. The second party is given 10/100th parts, and the third party 8/100th parts, subsequently altered to 9/100th parts to each. So far that is a valid and unobjectionable exercise of the power of appointment. The deed then proceeds to declare that the shares appointed to two of the children, viz., Alexander and Louisa, shall vest at and be payable to them on their father's death. This also is unobjectionable, because Louisa (Mrs Caton) had married, and Alexander, the eldest son, presumably had attained majority.

But then the appointer proceeds to cut down and restrict the interests which he had already given to the remaining children (three of whom, be it observed, were sons) to an alimentary liferent. The deed leaves no doubt of the limited nature of the interest which he intends his children to have. It is not even a restricted fee; it is a liferent. The direction is, that "the free income of the respective shares shall be paid to such children, and that the fee or capital of the respective shares shall belong to the lawful issue of such children." And again, the said shares "shall vest in liferent as aforesaid," &c.; and again in a clause by which he empowers the trustees to make advances of capital to the said children he says,—"I further provide, direct, and appoint that notwithstanding the restriction of the children above named to a liferent, it shall be in the power of the trustees . . . to advance and pay to any of such children, or to apply for his or her behoof from time to time, or in one sum, a part of the capital of the share of such child, not exceeding one-third of the total capital of such share, and the interest of the issue of such child shall be restricted accordingly."

No. 59.

Warrand's Trustees v. Warrand.

Pausing there, that is undoubtedly a bad exercise of the power of appointment, or rather a bad restriction of the apportionment which the appointer has already made, in this respect, that it restricts the interest of the immediate children to a liferent, and bestows the fee of their shares upon their children, who in competition with them were not objects of the power.

But it is argued, that granting that the gift of the fee to grandchildren was ultra vires, the result is, not that the whole limitation falls, but that the destination to grandchildren being struck out there remains a restriction to a liferent coupled with a power of disposing of the shares by will, and that this is sufficient.

The decisions have gone far in the direction of sustaining a deed of appointment in so far as it can possibly be held to be within the power after striking out these parts of the deed which are invalid, although in doing so some violence is done to the intentions of the appointer. There is no stronger example of this than the case of M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees,[1] which must now be held to regulate the law of Scotland.

But this is only done where it is possible to separate the good from the bad, and if the objectionable portions are so mixed up with the remainder of the appointment as not to admit of separation, the whole deed, or at least such part of it as is inextricable, falls.

In the present case there is no difficulty in separating the appointment of the fund from the limitations which follow. In that respect the case resembles and is more than covered by the case of M'Donald.[1] In that case the appointers began by declaring that it was their will that a sum of £25,000 secured over certain entailed estates should "be settled on and belong to our eldest son and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate—the sum of £25,000 being the share . . . which we . . . have allotted and apportioned, and do hereby allot and apportion, as the share of our eldest son, or failing him of the heir of entail succeeding to the said entailed estate," and that the way, and the only way, in which the appointers intended and directed that the eldest son should obtain the benefit of this apportionment was that their marriage-contract trustees should after their death discharge the said heritable bond for £25,000 over the entailed estates, the result of which would have been that Colonel M'Donald, the eldest son, would only have had an interest during his life in the sum apportioned, and that the benefit of the apportionment might ultimately accrue to persons who were not objects of the power. It was contended for the younger children, and with success, in this Court, that the conditions being invalid (and both the majority and the minority of the Court agreed that they were) the whole apportionment failed, and that there must be an equal division. So formidable did this objection appear to Colonel M'Donald that in the appeal case his first alternative contention was that the whole appointment was good. Alternatively he pleaded that the appointment of the £25,000 was good, and that the conditions attached to the gift being invalid should be disregarded. The House of Lords sustained the latter contention, and held that the appellant was entitled to the £25,000 absolutely, although undoubtedly this was not according to the intention of the appointer.

In the present case the appointer, after making what if it stood alone would be a good absolute appointment to the second and third parties, has attempted to restrict their interests under the erroneous belief that he had power to give the fee of their shares to their children. The whole of the restrictions hinge on this. He has restricted the second and third parties to a liferent, and although he has superadded provisions which might raise the interest given to somewhat more than a liferent, these provisions are conditional and might never come into operation. I do not admit that an unqualified power to test would cure the defect, but not even that is given. He gives them a power to test, but only in the event of their dying without having had issue. Again, the trustees are given power to make advances of capital, but these advances are limited to one-third of the respective shares, and this restriction is made in the interests of the grandchildren to whom the fee is destined. In my opinion the whole of these restrictions are due to and dependent on the invalid gift of fee to the grandchildren, and stand or fall according to the validity of that gift. Even if they could stand alone the interest given does not amount in any view to one of fee.

It is necessary to say a word on the cases which were pressed on us in argument. Assuming them to be well decided, none of them when examined seems to me to touch the case. The principal Scottish authority relied on was Lennock's Trustees.[1] The judgment in that case was framed, or intended to be framed, upon the judgment in the old English case of Carver v. Bowles.[2] The latter case is chiefly known and cited as an authority for the proposition that an appointment otherwise good does not necessarily fail because the appointer has adjected invalid conditions; but it is true that another point was decided which must be noticed. The direction in the appointment was to pay the interest to the daughter during her life for her separate use and without power of anticipation or alienation; and then followed the limitations in favour of issue, followed by a conditional power of disposal on the failure of issue, which were held to be in excess of the power. The Master of the Rolls held that the words of appointment were sufficient to vest the shares absolutely in the daughter; but that it was competent for the donee of the power to limit the interest which he appointed to his daughters to their separate use and to restrain them from anticipation or alienation. Accordingly in the judgment (p. 309) it was declared that the daughters' shares "are limited to their respective separate use for life, . . . and are to be held and enjoyed by them without power to make any assignment or appointment by way of alienation." Subject to this they had an absolute right of disposal. The decision may or may not be sound, but two things are apparent, that it is not an authority to the effect that a liferent coupled with a qualified power to test would have been good; and secondly, it was not necessary to remodel the deed of appointment further than to draw a pen through the objectionable clauses.

Coming now to Lennock's Trustees,[1] there are peculiarities about that case which somewhat detract from its value. The terms of the deed were substantially the same as those in the case of Carver v. Bowles,[2] it being directed that the trustees should pay the interest and annual proceeds to the appointer's daughters during their respective lives "for their and each of their own separate and absolute use and benefit, notwithstanding coverture, and so that my said daughters respectively shall not have power to dispose thereof by way of anticipation."

Then follows a power to the daughters to divide the fee among their children; and in case there should be no children who attained a vested interest in the funds, "in trust for such person or persons in such shares, and in such way and manner as my said daughters respectively shall in manner aforesaid appoint." It is to be observed that both parties to the special case maintained that the restrictions on the daughters' interests were wholly invalid; but the Lord Justice-Clerk held that the case was ruled by Carver v. Bowles.[2] He did not, however, regard the interest given to the daughters as one of liferent. He expressly says that an attempt to restrict the right to a liferent would have been bad; but he says,—"It may be quite true, as it was in that case (Carver v. Bowles[2]), that some of these restrictions reduce the actual enjoyment to little more than a life interest, but they do not appear to me to exceed the limits which were contemplated by the testator." Lord Gifford again, as I gather from the conclusion of his opinion, did not even decide that the grandchildren had not a right of fee. He contented himself with holding that there was a good appointment of the fund in liferent to the daughters, leaving the question as to their power to dispose of the fee to arise subsequently.

The interlocutor, again, goes beyond the declaration in the case of Carver v. Bowles,[2] which contained no reference to disposal by will; because after declaring that the shares of the daughters are limited to their separate use for life, it proceeds,—"are to be held by them subject to the power of appointment conferred by the said settlement." Now, the power of appointment in the settlement was limited, if there were issue, to appointing among the issue who were not objects of the power. Perhaps the interlocutor means simply that the daughters should have power to test. If so, there is nothing to suggest that the power was conditional on there being no issue. I think that this was the Lord Justice-Clerk's intention, but not Lord Gifford's, who was not prepared to decide as to the interests of the children.

The decision in Wallace's Trustees[3] simply followed the other decisions, the language of the deed of appointment being practically the same, with this exception, that there was no destination to the issue of the daughters. The daughters had an absolute right of disposal by will of the capital of their shares—not, as here, a limited and conditional power.

Warrand's Trustees v. Warrand.

In the last case, Wright's Trustees,[1] the power of appointment was contained in Mr John Wright's antenuptial marriage-contract. Under it the survivor of the spouses had power to appoint among the child or children of the intended marriage in such proportions, at such times, and under such conditions as he or she might direct. Mr John Wright survived his wife, and died leaving a settlement by which he directed a third part of the trust funds to be held for behoof of his daughter Florence in liferent, and the parties after named in fee. The parties after named were her lawful children if she had any, and failing children such parties and in such manner as she should direct by any writing under her hand, and failing such writing to her nearest of kin equally. I observe in passing that under that deed, differing from the one which we have to construe, the appointment did not commence with an absolute appointment of a certain sum to Florence. The only appointment made to her is in liferent, and this of itself is sufficient to distinguish it from the present case. It is also, I think, sufficient to distinguish it from the cases of Carver v. Bowles[2] and Lennock's Trustees,[3] because in both these cases, although there was a prohibition of anticipation, there was what was held to be otherwise an absolute appointment.

But then Lord Adam deals with the peculiarity of the case, that the power to test which is superadded to the liferent is not an absolute power to test, in which respect the deed resembles that in the present case. He holds, and rightly, that the abortive appointment to children who were not objects of the power could not of itself render invalid a gift to an object of the power. But then he had to meet the difficulty that the power to test was not an absolute right, but was conditional upon Miss Wright dying without issue. He held, however, that the power to test, though qualified, was sufficient, coupled with the liferent, to constitute a good exercise of the power in favour of Florence. If it were good law that a liferent, plus a qualified power of testing, is equivalent to a right of fee, I should agree that the effect of an abortive attempt to interject persons who were not objects of the power would not affect the right to test conferred. But I know of no authority to the effect that a liferent with a power to test so qualified is equivalent to a right of fee.

In regard to the case of Crompe v. Barrow,[4] to which Lord Adam refers, I fail to see its application to the case of Wright.[1] In Crompe v. Barrow[4] the contention on behalf of Charles Barrow was that the fee of the moiety, of which he had the liferent, having been given to his issue, persons not objects of the power, in the first instance, and in the event of his dying without issue to his sister Frances, the whole of the appointment fell, and the fund fell to be disposed of as unappointed. It is true that the judgment of the Master of the Rolls implies that Frances would only take in the event of Charles dying without leaving issue, and that if he left issue, although they could not take, the fund would go as unappointed. But Frances seems to have been content with this qualified right, and the real dispute was whether the gift to her was not wholly bad in consequence of the invalid appointment to the children of Charles. The Master of the Rolls held that it was not, and sustained the claim of Frances to that extent. The question does not seem to me to be the same. There the question was whether a gift in remainder of a full though conditional right of fee to an object of the power wholly failed because an ineffectual attempt had been made to give the fee to persons who were not objects of the power. In Wright's[1] case, as here, the question was whether an object of the power who was entitled to a fee was bound to accept something less than a right of fee. If Crompe v. Barrow[2] applied at all to the present case, the second and third parties would have no power to test on their shares if they had issue. That is exactly what they complain of.

None of these cases, assuming them to be well decided, seems to rule this case, or necessarily to conflict with the view which I take of it. In none of them was there such a distinct and separable appointment as here. Again, Carver v. Bowles,[3] on which the decisions in Lennock's Trustees[4] and Wallace's Trustees[5] were intended to be based, merely decided that it was within the power to restrain the object of the power (a female) from anticipation, leaving her otherwise absolute owner, and free to dispose of her share by will or deed to take effect after her death. In Wright's Trustees[1] the only appointment was in liferent, which is sufficient to distinguish the case, but I do not agree in the judgment, which goes far beyond the other decisions. This case really depends on the well-settled law that, "if the first appointment gives the absolute interest to the appointee, and the subsequent superadded modification of it is void, the original appointment stands exactly as if the attempted modification were struck out of the will"—per Master of the Rolls (Lord Romilly) in Churchill v. Churchill.[6]

I therefore would answer the second alternative of the first question in the affirmative.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Trayner.

THE COURT answered the first alternative of the first question in the negative, and the second alternative in the affirmative.

Succession — Vesting — Clause of Survivorship — Trust — Discretion of Trustees.—Trustees under a settlement were directed to divide the residue of the truster's estate on the death of a liferentrix, "so soon thereafter as deemed proper," with the further provision that if any of the residuary legatees should predecease "the said term of payment and division among them," the share of such predeceaser should be held as lapsed.

A residuary legatee survived the liferentrix, but died before the trustees had made payment and division.

M'Call's Trustees v. Murray.

Held that the share of residue destined to the residuary legatee had vested on the death of the liferentrix.

Succession—Heritable or Moveable—Conversion.—Trustees under a settlement were directed on the death of a liferentrix to "divide" the residue of the truster's estate into as many "shares" as the truster had sisters, and "having thus divided the said residue and shares," to "pay" the "shares" in certain proportions to his sisters, whom failing, to their issue, declaring that if any of his sisters should have predeceased the "period of payment and division," leaving issue or their descendants, such issue or descendants should take equally among them, if more than one per stirpes, the share which would have fallen to the deceasing parent, but that if any sister predeceased the said term without issue her "share" should be held to have lapsed. The trustees were further directed, if they thought proper, "in order that the provisions herein conceived in favour of females may be rendered more secure," to invest the shares falling to females on the security or in the purchase of heritable or other property, exclusive of the jus mariti, courtesy, or other legal rights of any husbands they might marry.

Part of the residue was heritable at the date of death both of the truster and of the liferentrix.

Held that the truster intended his estate to be realised and converted into cash on the death of the liferentrix, and that the share of a residuary legatee who had died intestate after her share had vested in her belonged to her heirs in mobilibus.

2D DIVISION.

THOMAS M'CALL, architect in Glasgow, died in 1869, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 27th September 1861, whereby he conveyed his whole means and estate to the trustees therein named in trust for, inter alia, the following purposes:—(4) Payment of annuities to his five sisters; (5) payment of the liferent of the residue of his estate to his daughter Mary M'Call, and upon her death, in the event of her leaving lawful issue, and upon such issue respectively attaining the age of twenty-one years complete, for division and apportionment of the said residue itself among such issue; and (6) "In the event of the death of the said Mary M'Call without leaving lawful issue or in the event of her death leaving issue and of such issue all predeceasing the foresaid term of payment and division amongst them, then, so soon thereafter as deemed proper my trustees, after providing for fulfilment of the purposes of the trust above mentioned, shall divide the residue and remainder of my estate and effects including as a foresaid into equal shares according to the number of my said sisters who may be in life at the period of such division and such of them as may have died leaving lawful issue that is a share for each sister then in life and one for each sister who may have died leaving lawful issue, and my said trustees having thus divided the said residue and shares as aforesaid shall pay over two thirds of one share to the said Mrs Alice or Elshie M'Call or Kirkwood, whom failing to her issue as aftermentioned, and the remaining shares and part of a share equally to and among the said Mrs Jean M'Call or Gracie, Isabella M'Call or Whyte, Agnes M'Call and Jessie M'Call, whom failing to their issue as aftermentioned, my said sisters and their issue in the events foresaid being hereby constituted my residuary legatees; Declaring always that should any of my said sisters Jean M'Call or Gracie, Isabella M'Call or White, Agnes M'Call, Jessie M'Call or Alice or Elshie M'Call or Kirkwood have predeceased the said term of payment and division amongst them, leaving lawful issue or their descendants, such issue or their descendants shall take equally among them if more than one per stirpes the share which would have fallen to the deceasing parent had she survived the said term the issue of predeceasing children in every case coming in their parent's room and place but, in case any of my said sisters shall predecease the said term without leaving lawful issue or their descendants at the foresaid period of division, then the share provided to such sister and her issue shall be held as lapsed and divided accordingly." The testator provided that the whole provisions in favour of females should be "exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husbands," "and in order that the provisions herein conceived in favour of females may be rendered more secure I authorise and empower my said trustees, if they shall think proper so to do, notwithstanding the foresaid destination and provisions, in place of paying over their provisions to the said females, to lay out the same on the security or in the purchase of such heritable or other property as they may think fit, either in name of the said females exclusive of the jus mariti courtesy or other legal right on the part of their husbands or of themselves the said Trustees or others as trustees for behoof of such females in liferent for their liferent use allenarly and of their children whom failing of my said trustees for the ends uses and purposes before mentioned in fee in which last case the fee before conceived in favor of such females is hereby restricted and limited to a liferent right accordingly but with power nevertheless in that event to them respectively in the event of any one or more of them dying without issue to test by will or other mortis causa deed upon the fee of their respective shares."

The trustees were further given full powers of sale.

Thomas M'Call was survived by the liferentrix Mary M'Call, and by his five sisters. Of the sisters all save one, Jessie M'Call, predeceased the liferentrix Mary M'Call.

Mary M'Call died on 23d October 1899. Part of the residue was heritage and part was moveable, both at the death of the testator and at the death of the liferentrix.

Jessie M'Call died unmarried and intestate on 3d January 1900, by which time no steps had been taken to wind up or divide the estate.

Of Thomas M'Call's sisters who predeceased the liferentrix three—viz., Mrs Kirkwood, Mrs White, and Mrs Gracie—left issue and descendants of issue. The others died unmarried.

Questions having arisen as to (1) whether the share of the estate of Thomas M'Call, provided to the said Jessie M'Call, vested in her at the death of the liferentrix, and (2) whether the terms of the testator's settlement imported conversion of the estate from heritable to moveable, the present special case was brought.

The parties thereto were (1) Thomas M'Call and others, the testamentary trustees of the late Thomas M'Call; (2) George Murray and others, the issue and descendants of issue (excluding the heir in heritage) of Mrs Kirkwood; (3) Margaret Mackey or Coote and others, the issue and descendants of issue of Mrs Gracie and Mrs White (exclusive of the heirs in heritage), and Thomas White and another, the executors of Jessie M'Call; and (4) Thomas M'Call Gracie and others, the heirs at law in heritage and heirs in mobilibus of both Jessie M'Call and Thomas M'Call.

The second parties maintained that the share of the estate of the said Thomas M'Call provided to the said Jessie M'Call vested in her, and that the same was part of her moveable succession, and fell to them, along with the third and fourth parties, as her heirs in mobilibus ab intestato, or alternatively that it formed the intestate moveable succession of the deceased Thomas M'Call, and fell to the same parties as his heirs in mobilibus ab intestato.

The third parties maintained that the said share did not vest in Jessie M'Call, but belonged to them and the second and fourth parties as residuary legatees of the said Thomas M'Call, and fell to be divided among these parties in terms of his settlement; alternatively, that the said share was moveable, and fell into intestacy, and belonged to them and the second and fourth parties per stirpes as the representatives of his heirs in mobilibus.

The fourth parties maintained that the part of the said share which consisted of heritage was heritable, and fell to them either as heirs in heritage of Jessie M'Call or alternatively of Thomas M'Call.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were:—"(1) Did the share of the residue of the estate of the said Thomas M'Call in favour of Jessie M'Call vest in her? 2. In the event of query 1 being answered in the affirmative, does such share of residue fall to be paid to the representatives of Jessie or Janet M'Call ab intestato? 3. In the event of query 2 being answered in the affirmative, does such share of said residue fall to be paid over (1) to the heirs in mobilibus of the said Jessie M'Call, or (2) so far as represented by the share of the heritable property to her heirs in heritage, and the remainder of her said share to her executors? 4. In the event of query 1 being answered in the negative (1) does such share of said residue belong to the second, third, and fourth parties as residuary legatees of the said Thomas M'Call, or (2) does such share fall into intestacy, and (a) belong to the second, third, and fourth parties per stirpes as his heirs in mobilibus, or (b) so far as represented by the share of heritable property belong to his heirs in heritage, and the remainder of said share to his heirs in mobilibus?"

Argued for the second parties;—(1) Vesting took place in Jessie M'Call at the death of the liferentrix; the discretion to the trustees as to the term of payment did not prevent vesting at the date when payment became possible.[1] (2) What vested in Jessie M'Call was a right to claim a share of residue, and there was here conversion.[2] The number and complicated nature of the pro indiviso shares which would have to be made unless there was conversion, shewed that the testator intended conversion to take place.

Argued for the third parties;—There was no vesting in Jessie M'Call.[3] Assuming no vesting, the share passed under the residuary clause of Thomas M'Call's settlement.

Argued for the fourth parties;—The second parties were right in their contention as to vesting in Jessie M'Call, but there was no conversion. The second parties had not established that the testator intended the house property to be changed to moveable before distribution. It was not necessary for the purposes of the trust, and unless it was necessary there was no conversion.[4] If trustees could lawfully convey to beneficiaries the estate as committed to them, the beneficiaries were bound to accept it in that shape, and there was no conversion.[1] In the case of Anderson,[1] there was just the same difficulty as to pro indiviso shares which there was here. Any difficulty as to the clause in the settlement as to the provisions in favour of females being exclusive of their husbands' legal rights was met by the case of Sheppard,[2] where there was a similar clause. If there was no vesting in Jessie M'Call there was intestacy, and if so, no conversion, even where there was a direction to sell, because such a direction could only take effect where there was a bequest in favour of somebody. There being intestacy, these parties took the heritage as heirs in heritage of Thomas M'Call.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The first question is, whether the residue of the estate of Thomas M'Call vested in Jessie M'Call. Thomas appointed the liferent of the residue to go to his daughter Mary M'Call, and on her death without issue then alive it was to be divided into equal shares according to the number of his sisters, the issue of any predeceasing sister being entitled to a share with surviving sisters. When the liferent lapsed Jessie M'Call was the only annuitant surviving, and she died in 1900. Three of her sisters died leaving issue.

The clause of the deed upon which the question of vesting depends is the sixth clause, by which the trustees are directed in the event which occurred "then so soon thereafter as deemed proper my trustees . . . shall divide the residue, . . . and having thus divided that residue shall pay" in a certain manner directed. I am of opinion that Jessie M'Call having lived to the time to which this direction applied, there was vesting in her. There is no direction to hold up the estate, the only discretion given being to enable the trustees to have reasonable time to carry out the testator's directions in detail, but the rights and interests of beneficiaries coming into operation upon the event occurring which caused the right to emerge.

The second question is, whether the whole share which vested in Jessie is to be held to have been moveable, or was partly heritable and partly moveable, the rights of parties to this case depending upon the answer to be given to that question. It is not unattended with difficulty, there being nothing direct in the trust-deed to aid in interpreting it. But I think that when the deed is examined to ascertain the intention of the granter, the fair result is that he desired his estate to be divided as a moveable estate. I do not proceed upon the power given to the trustees to sell, for that might be a power which it was wise to give, although the testator had no direct intention that his estate should be dealt with as moveable in its entirety when the time for division came. Nor do I attach any weight to the use of the word "pay" used in regard to the shares, for if the deed was otherwise clear the use of such an expression would not be sufficient to compel a reading which would imply that the whole was moveable. But when it is found that the testator's instructions seem to relate to a division into shares, and again into fractions of shares,—and further, that when the testator desires to provide protection for provisions to females he specially gives the trustees power, if they see fit, to lay out the amount of their shares "on the security or in the purchase of such heritable or other property as they may see fit, either in name of the said females, exclusive of the jus mariti, courtesy, or other legal right on the part of their husbands,"—it seems to me that that indicates that the estate the trustees had to deal with was a moveable estate, part of which they might apply for special reasons in the purchase of heritage. It is to be noted that in the general conditions only the jus mariti and right of administration of husbands are excluded, and that where the testator deals with heritage he inserts the appropriate word "courtesy." It seems thus to be a fair inference from the deed that the succession was moveable.

My opinion is that the first and second questions should be answered in the affirmative, and the first alternative of the third question in the affirmative. The fourth question it is unnecessary to answer.

LORD YOUNG.—I am also of opinion that the share of the estate of Thomas M'Call provided to Jessie M'Call vested in her. I am further of opinion, from expressions used in the deed, that it was the intention of the testator that she should take her whole share in money, and not part of it in land, and that the estate must therefore be dealt with as moveable, and go to her heirs in mobilibus.

LORD TRAYNER.—I entertain no doubt that the rights which the late Jessie M'Call took under the settlement of her brother Thomas M'Call vested in her on the death of Mary M'Call, who liferented the whole trust-estate. The only doubt which has been suggested as to the period of vesting arises from the terms of the direction to the trustees to divide the residue of the truster's estate on the death of the liferentrix without issue, or "so soon thereafter" as the trustees deemed proper, with the further provision that if any of the residuary legatees should predecease "the said term of payment and division among them," the share of such predeceaser should descend to her issue, and failing issue should be treated as a lapsed legacy. In view of these provisions it was maintained that there was no vesting in the residuary legatees until actual payment or division had been made. I cannot assent to that view. It appears to me that the period of division and payment to and among the residuary legatees contemplated by the truster was the death of the liferentrix, and although it is added "or so soon thereafter" as the trustees should deem proper, these words appear to me only to provide for a reasonable time being allowed the trustees to realise and distribute the estate. In a word, that the latitude given to the trustees as to the time of division had only reference to the fair administration of the trust and realisation of the estate according to what they deemed best, but did not postpone vesting, or enable the trustees by their actings to delay or alter the period of vesting.

The question whether the share of residue which fell to and vested in Jessie M'Call was all moveable or was partly heritage is attended with some difficulty. Part of the residue was undoubtedly heritable at the date of the death both of the truster and of the liferentrix. The trustees had a power of sale, but did not exercise it. There was therefore no conversion through the action of the trustees. But there are three considerations which lead me to the conclusion that the share of Jessie M'Call must be treated as all moveable succession. First, the direction of the truster to his trustees is to divide the residue, and to pay it in certain proportions to the residuary legatees. This in itself is not much, because I recognise that the words "pay," "convey," "transfer," &c., have been regarded in previous cases as practically synonymous. Still it is a direction to pay, which applies more directly to a division of realised estate than to estate which is to be transferred to a legatee in forma specifica. Second, the fractional division of the residue among the legatees would have been more difficult to accomplish in the way of pro indiviso conveyance of heritage than in the payment of money, and I see nothing to suggest that the truster intended to put any such difficulty on the shoulders of his trustees. Third, the truster directed his trustees, if they think proper, "in order that the provisions herein conceived in favour of females may be rendered more secure," to invest the shares falling to females in the purchase of heritable property or in heritable securities, so as to exclude the legal rights of any husbands they might marry. Now, I think that direction fairly presupposes that the heritage left by the truster had been or was to be realised before the division of the residue, as otherwise the truster would have directed his trustees to convey the existing heritage to the legatees, so as to exclude their husbands' legal rights, and to invest the balance in such a way as to produce the same effect. This last consideration seems to me to be enough to turn the scale on a balancing of considerations in favour of the view that there was conversion—conversion by reason of the intention of the truster—who intended, as I conclude, from his whole deed, that on the death of the liferentrix his estate should be realised, and in that form paid over to the residuary legatees in the proportions mentioned by him.

No. 60.

M'Call's Trustees v. Murray.

Lord Moncreiff.—On the question of vesting I do not entertain any doubt. The "term of payment and division" in the case of the liferentrix Mary M'Call dying without leaving lawful issue was the date of her death. No doubt the deed contains the provision that the trustees are to divide "so soon thereafter as deemed proper," but that is after the term of payment and division in the sense of the deed has arrived, and the direction is only inserted in order that the trustees may take such reasonable time as they may think fit for ingathering and realising the estate.

The question of conversion is perhaps more difficult. The argument ab inconvenienti does not carry us very far, because those who are entitled to take may chance to be many or few at the date of division. But in the present case there are sufficient indications in the deed that what the truster anticipated and intended in disposing of his mixed estate was that it should all be converted into cash and then divided. The provisions which have already been referred to with regard to the provisions in favour of females sufficiently indicate this.

I therefore agree that the first and second questions, and the first alternative of the third question, should be answered in the affirmative.

THE COURT answered the first and second questions and the first alternative of the third question in the affirmative, and quoad ultra found it unnecessary to answer. No. 60. Jan. 24, 1901. M'Call's Trustees v. Murray.

T. F. WEIR & ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—HENRY ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—W. & J. COOK, W.S.—Agents.

GEORGE NEILL, Pursuer (Respondent).—Watt, K.C.—A. M. Anderson. SIMON HENDERSON, Defender (Reclaimer).—Craigie—David Anderson. No. 61. Jan. 25, 1901. Neill v. Henderson.

Reparation—Slander—Privilege—Judicial Slander—Arbitration—Witness—Malice.—In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that during the course of arbitration proceedings to which the defender was a party, and in which the pursuer was called by the arbiter to give information, after a statement by the pursuer to the arbiter, the defender stated to the arbiter of and concerning the pursuer "that man cannot speak one word of truth, and all that he has stated just now is lies from beginning to end," and that on being asked to withdraw the statement he repeated it.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney, diss. Lord Young) that the pursuer was entitled to an issue, but (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney, dub. Lord Moncreiff) that the occasion was privileged and malice must be put in issue.

THIS was an action of damages for slander at the instance of George Neill, commission agent, 1 Morrison Place, Edinburgh, against Simon Henderson, baker, Fountainbridge, Edinburgh, concluding for £500 of damages. 2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

The pursuer averred:—(Cond. 2) "About twenty years ago the defender and Dr John Bowie, 41 Lauriston Place, Edinburgh, and John Nisbet, High Street, Edinburgh, purchased the estate of Parsons Green for feuing purposes, and entered into an agreement for the construction of certain roads dividing their respective portions of said estate. Sometime ago disputes arose between the defender and Dr Bowie as to the payment of the cost of constructing said roads. The defender and Dr Bowie agreed to refer the matters in dispute between them in connection with said roads to the arbitration of Mr William Ormiston, Lord Dean of Guild of Edinburgh. Mr Ormiston accepted the reference, and appointed a meeting of parties and their agents to be held on the ground on the 6th April 1900, at 2.30 p.m., to hear parties and take evidence on the matters in dispute. As the pursuer had constructed the major portion of the roads on said estate, he was asked by Dr Bowie to attend the proposed meeting, so as to point out to the arbiter the roads which he had made on the orders of and at the expense of Dr Bowie." (Cond. 3) "On said 6th April 1900 the pursuer accordingly went to said meeting at Hobart Street, Parsons Green. After the agents of the parties had made statements to the arbiter, the pursuer was called upon to state to the arbiter which of the roads in question were made by the different proprietors, Dr Bowie and the defender. After the pursuer had made this statement, the defender, in the presence and hearing of the said William Ormiston, Alexander Guild, of Messrs Reid & Guild, W.S., agent for Dr Bowie, and the said Dr Bowie, said, 'Mr Ormiston, that man cannot speak one word of truth, and all he has stated just now is lies from beginning to end,' or used words of like meaning and import. The said statement was of and concerning the pursuer, was false and calumnious, and was made maliciously and without probable or any cause. The pursuer immediately called upon the defender to withdraw the said statement, but he refused to do so. On the contrary, the defender reiterated the said slanderous statement in the same or similar language, and subsequently, during said meeting, he addressed other offensive terms towards the pursuer. Subsequently the pursuer wrote the defender by registered letter, calling upon him to apologise for said slanderous statement, but to this letter the defender has made no answer."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender having slandered the pursuer, is liable to make reparation therefor.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments are neither relevant nor sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (3) In any event, any statement made by the defender regarding the pursuer being privileged, and the defender having made the same without malice, and with probable cause, decree of absolvitor should be pronounced.

On 13th November 1900, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) approved of the following issue:—"Whether, on or about the 6th day of April 1900, and at or near Hobart Street, Parsons Green, Edinburgh, the defender, in the presence and hearing of William Ormiston, Lord Dean of Guild of Edinburgh; Alexander Guild, of Messrs Reid & Guild, W.S., Edinburgh; and Dr John Bowie, 41 Lauriston Place, Edinburgh, or one or other of them, did falsely and calumniously say of and concerning the pursuer: 'Mr Ormiston, that man cannot speak one word of truth, and all he has stated just now is lies from beginning to end'; or did use words of like import and effect of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage?" *

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) There was no issueable matter on record. The statement complained of was referable only to the proceedings on the occasion in question, and was not meant to be, and could not be interpreted as, a charge of general mendacity. It was an extravagant remark, made practically in rixa, and therefore

* "OPINION.—I am of opinion that the issue lodged by the pursuer should be approved. The words complained of amount to a general charge of mendacity, and are, in my opinion, slanderous. The case of Milne v. Walker, 24th November 1893, 21 R. 155, appears to be in point. There have been cases in which language of that sort has been held not to support an award of damages, where it appeared from the proof that the words were spoken in the heat of a quarrel, and were not intended to impute, nor understood as imputing, actual delinquency, but were merely of the nature of coarse vituperation, and were so understood by the person attacked, as in Watson v. Duncan, 4th February 1890, 17 R. 414, and Christie v. Robertson, 12th July 1899, 1 F. 1155. These were not judgments on issues, but on the evidence; and, if in this case it shall appear in the evidence that nothing slanderous was intended or understood, the defender may be entitled to a verdict.

"It was argued for the defender that the case was one of privilege, the words complained of being spoken in the course of proceedings in an arbitration. The pursuer maintained that proceedings before an arbiter were not to be regarded, in questions of this sort, as judicial proceedings. I am clearly of opinion that they are (see Macmillan v. Free Church, 3 July 1862, 24 D. 1282, at p. 1285; Hay v. Cameron, 18th June 1898, S. L. T. 67), and that words spoken in the course of proceedings before an arbiter are entitled to a certain measure of privilege. But I do not consider that such privilege covers a charge of general mendacity; and I am therefore of opinion that it is not necessary to take an issue of malice. I may add that I think malice is relevantly averred."

No. 61.

Neill v. Henderson.

there was no relevant case.[1] The case was quite different from the case of Milne v. Walker,[2] relied on by the Lord Ordinary, which was a case of a deliberate charge of lying made by letter to, and published in, the papers. (2) The occasion was an arbitration, which was a judicial proceeding, and a statement by a party, being referable to the matter arbitrated on, was entirely privileged, just as a statement of counsel or of a witness.[3] In any event, malice must go into the issue, and malice was not relevantly averred.[4]

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) The statement was defamatory. (2) The pursuer was not a party to the arbitration proceedings, and therefore there could be no privilege. Even if privilege attached to the statement in so far as it referred to the matter in arbitration the scope of the statement was much wider. If the case was privileged, and malice was necessary to the issue, it was relevantly averred,[5] but it was not necessary to the issue, and the pursuer was entitled to meet a defence of privilege by proof of malice at the trial, although he had taken an issue without malice.[6]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In adjusting the issue in this case the only question is, whether the word "maliciously" should be inserted in the issue. In my opinion it should be inserted. The slander is said to have been uttered in speaking to an arbiter during the course of a practically judicial proceeding. It has been the practice, where issues have been allowed in cases where the alleged slander was spoken in the course of such cases, to put the malice specifically in the issue, as a matter to be proved. I would therefore insert the word "maliciously" before approving of the issue.

LORD YOUNG.—I do not think it is desirable to express any opinion in this case, as I understand that all your Lordships except myself are of opinion that it should go to trial. It must therefore go, and it will serve no useful purpose for me to state why I differ from that view.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the language used by the defender and here complained of was libellous, and that the pursuer is entitled to an issue. But as the language in question was used in the course of a judicial or quasi-judicial proceeding, and was not plainly irrelevant or impertinent to the matter being discussed, I think the defender was privileged, at least to the extent of requiring that malice should be put in issue, and this I think should now be done.

LORD MONCREIFF.—The only question is whether the word "maliciously" should be inserted in the issue. My own opinion is that it should not, because I think that, on the pursuer's statement, which is what we have to deal with, no privilege is disclosed; or rather, that any privilege that attached to the occasion or to the party was lost owing to the intemperance of the words which the defender is said to have used. But I do not mean to press my own views on that matter, for two reasons. In the first place, it is the general practice to insert the word "maliciously" in cases of judicial slander, and I do not desire lightly to depart from what seems to be a well established practice. But, secondly, it matters very little whether the word "maliciously" is introduced or not into the issue. Even if it is introduced, in my opinion the pursuer will have fully discharged the burden thus laid upon him if he establishes at the trial to the satisfaction of the jury the facts which he sets forth in the third article of the condescendence, —that is, that the defender used the words imputed to him, that there were no circumstances to put upon them a different meaning from that which they naturally bear, and that on being called upon to withdraw them the defender reiterated the charge. I say that if these averments are proved, there will be evidence upon which it will be competent for the jury to find that the defender used the word maliciously in the sense of the issue.

THE COURT approved of the issue as amended by the addition of the words "and maliciously" after the word "calumniously."

Burgh—Dean of Guild—Appeal—Competency—Order to take down ruinous buildings—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. cxxxii.), sec. 166.—The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (as amended by the Edinburgh Improvement, &c. (Amendment) Act, 1893, sec. 34), enacts by section 166 that if any building "be deemed by the burgh engineer to be in an insecure or ruinous state," he shall cause notice to be given to the owner to take down or secure or repair such building "as the case shall require," and failing the owner doing so, "the Dean of Guild Court shall, on the complaint of the Procurator-fiscal of Court, if they find it necessary after hearing parties, order the owner" of the building "to take down, rebuild, repair, or otherwise secure the same to their satisfaction within a time to be fixed by the Court."

In a complaint under this section the Dean of Guild Court, proceeding on their own skill and knowledge, after due inspection of the buildings in question, pronounced an interlocutor finding that the buildings were in a ruinous state and ordering the owner to take them down.

In an appeal the owner asked for further inquiry as to the condition of the buildings, either by a remit or by proof.

I beg further to intimate, that should you fail to have the work begun within three days from this date, further proceedings will be taken, and all expenses incurred will be levied from you in terms of the statutes." *

Mrs Armour not having complied with this notice, a petition was presented to the Dean of Guild Court on 22d May 1900 by George Somerville, Procurator-fiscal of that Court, in which Mrs Armour and the owners of the upper flats of the tenement were called as respondents.

The respondent Mrs Armour lodged answers to the petition, and stated that she had "been advised by skilled and competent advisers that her property is satisfactorily built and in good condition, and is perfectly secure. She is willing to take all reasonable steps to repair any defects that the Court may hold proved to exist in her property."

After certain procedure in the petition, the Dean of Guild, on 18th October 1900, after having visited the premises and heard the Procurator-fiscal and parties' procurators, found "in the meantime that all the flats of the tenement above the ground or shop flat are ruinous and insecure, and must be taken down"; and also "that the joists between the ground flat and the first flat, and the stone arching on the ground flat, are insecure"; and therefore in the meantime he ordained the respondents, other than Mrs Armour, to take down forthwith the flats belonging to them respectively.

Jan. 25, 1901. Somerville v. Macdonald's Trustee.

The upper flats were taken down as thus directed, and thereafter the Dean of Guild Court again visited the premises on 14th December 1900 in the presence of the agents of the parties interested.

On 20th December the Dean of Guild Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having of new visited the locus and inspected the premises so far as now existing, and having heard the procurator-fiscal, counsel for the respondent the trustee of Tertius Macdonald: . . . Repels the motion made by counsel for the trustee of Tertius Macdonald that the Court should allow a proof of the condition of the property owned by the said trustee: Finds . . . that the work ordered by the interlocutor of 18th October last has now been executed: Finds, on further inspection, now that the upper flats have been taken down, that the premises owned by the respondent the trustee of Tertius Macdonald, . . . are not only insecure but are ruinous, and must be taken down: Therefore ordains the respondent the trustee of Tertius Macdonald to take down forthwith her said premises," &c.*

Mrs Armour (Macdonald's trustee) appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellant;—The words "as the case shall require" in section 166 shewed that the burgh engineer was required to specify in the notices served by him what was to be done. The notice in this case was defective in this respect, and further, it was a notice to the appellant as part owner of the whole tenement, whereas she was only owner of the ground floor. The notice was thus not sufficient to support the proceedings which followed upon it.[1] But, further, as the case was instituted in May, and the interlocutor appealed against was pronounced on 20th December 1900, it was evident that there was no reasonable apprehension of any danger to the public, or any reason for immediate action. It would thus have been the proper and fair course to have granted the appellant's motion for a proof in regard to the state of the property. This was especially the case in view of the position taken up by the appellant on the advice of her own experts, that the subjects owned by her were in a perfectly secure state. The judgment of the Dean of Guild contained no information to shew why other and less drastic measures than demolition would be insufficient,

---

* "NOTE.—In consequence of the report of the burgh engineer, dated 11th December 1900, it became necessary for the Court to again visit the premises, and they did so on 14th December curt., in the presence of agents for the parties interested. The Court found that the work of pulling down the upper flats had been executed, and the Court were in a better position to judge of the condition of the premises on the ground floor than they were in before the upper flats were taken down. The result of the Court's inspection was that they were unanimously satisfied that the premises of the respondent, the trustee of Tertius Macdonald, are not only insecure but also ruinous, and that they are in such a condition that they must be taken down. The Court heard counsel for the respondent the trustee of Tertius Macdonald and the procurator for Mrs Carr on 18th December current. The counsel for the respondent the trustee of Tertius Macdonald then asked to be allowed to lead proof as to the condition of his premises. The Court repelled this motion, because they consider the matter which was to be the subject of proof is one which they are completely competent to judge of without proof, in respect that the members of the Court are men of skill on this particular matter."

information which was very desirable in view of the divergence between the opinion of the expert members of the Dean of Guild Court and the appellant's expert advisers. In exercising its jurisdiction under the section in question, the Dean of Guild Court was merely exercising its ordinary jurisdiction, and it was competent for this Court to review the judgment on any ground.[1] In the circumstances of this case the appellant was entitled to further inquiry as regards the condition of this building, which might either be by a remit to an independent architect or by a proof.[2]

Argued for the respondent;—The respondent accepted the view that in these special enactments, by which new duties were imposed on the Dean of Guild, that Court was treated as a pre-existing Court, from which at common law there was a right of appeal. But the Court of Appeal would examine into the nature of the duties thrown on the Dean of Guild by the particular provision in question. This had been lost sight of in the appellant's argument in dealing with the authorities, particularly with regard to the case of Boswell.[2] In that case the point was, whether the proprietor of an upper flat, who had no express title to the back area, had any right to object to buildings erected by the owner of the ground flat in the back area. The Dean of Guild held that the proprietor of the upper flat had a right to object on the theory that he had a prospective right of support from the building in the area. This view was negatived by the Second Division, who held that the proposed buildings did not interfere with the common interest. The case of Boswell[2] was thus not a case where a view of the Dean of Guild upon a question of fact was reversed upon a remit. The real question involved was a question of law, and there was no necessity for a remit at all. There was thus no precedent for the course the appellant asked the Court to adopt. The question was, what was the duty imposed on the Dean of Guild by section 166 of the Act of 1879, as amended by section 34 of the Act of 1893, and had he fulfilled that duty? The words "deemed by the burgh engineer" shewed that initially at all events the burgh engineer was the judge of the matter of fact, but he was not final. The Dean of Guild Court had to satisfy itself that he was right, and if so satisfied, to proceed forthwith. The question was not, was an appeal from the decision of the Dean of Guild Court on this matter competent, but what were competent grounds of appeal. It was not a competent ground of appeal that the Dean of Guild Court was wrong in approving of the view taken by the burgh engineer, because what the statute required was that there should be approval in fact, not by this Court but by the Dean of Guild Court.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After stating the proceedings)—The present appeal was thereafter brought, and the appellant moved either for a proof of her averments that her premises are not ruinous or insecure, or for a remit to a man of practical skill to be named by this Court, to report as to the condition of these premises. The respondent objects to either of these courses being followed, upon the ground that they are, according to his contention, precluded by sec. 166 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, as amended by sec. 34, subsec. 3, of the Edinburgh Improvement, &c., Act, 1893.

The words, "if they find it necessary after hearing parties," were introduced into sec. 166 by the amending Act, and prior to their introduction, it might have been contended with much force that the question whether a building was in a ruinous or insecure state so as to warrant proceedings being taken under it depended solely upon whether the building was or was not "deemed" by the burgh engineer (which I take to mean considered by him in the exercise of an honest judgment after proper examination), to be in a ruinous or insecure state. His judgment on this question was not declared to be subject to the review of any Court, and, assuming it to have been honestly arrived at, it might possibly have been held that it was final, and that the duty of the Dean of Guild Court, after the burgh engineer had reported his opinion as to the condition of the building, was rather executorial than judicial. But the introduction of the words, "if they find it necessary after hearing parties," gives them the right (if they had it not before) to exercise a judgment as to the condition of the buildings, and they did so in this case after due examination.

The respondent did not dispute that an appeal to this Court is competent, but he submitted that the only power which the Court has under such an appeal is to ascertain whether the burgh engineer has (in the sense already explained) "deemed" the building to be in a ruinous or insecure state, or whether the Dean of Guild Court has arrived at that conclusion in the performance of its duties under sec. 166, and that, as in this case there is no allegation that the burgh engineer and the Dean of Guild Court did not apply their minds to the subject, or did not honestly arrive at the conclusion that the building is ruinous, this Court has no power to review their judgments on this matter, either upon a proof as to the condition of the buildings, or upon a report by a man of skill, whose judgment would be substituted for that of the burgh engineer and the Dean of Guild Court. There is much force in this contention, but it does not appear to me to be necessary for the decision of the present case to express an opinion upon it, so absolutely put. Not only does the appellant not allege that the burgh engineer did not in the sense above explained "deem" the building to be ruinous or insecure, or that the Dean of Guild Court did not, after due examination, arrive at the same conclusion, but there are no other allegations which should, in my view, lead us to order further inquiry, if we have power to do so. Such judgments as we have before us should not be lightly disturbed, especially where they relate to a statutory provision made for the purpose of protecting the lieges from imminent danger.

The appellant states in her pleadings that for some months prior to the date of the notice the burgh engineer was negotiating, through her agents, for the purchase of her property—a statement which might suggest that the appellant meant to allege that the action taken by the burgh engineer was not in the proper execution of his duty, but for the purpose of enabling the city authorities to acquire the property at less than its true value. The appellant's counsel, however, upon the question being put to them, stated that they did not desire to make any allegation, or ask for any proof, to this effect.

Somerville v. Macdonald's Trustee.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed, and that the interlocutors appealed against should be affirmed.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in your Lordship's opinion. I think the jurisdiction of this Court under the Acts in question was not disputed. It was conceded by the Lord Advocate that to some effect the Court has jurisdiction to review the Dean of Guild's interlocutors, and I should desire to reserve my opinion as to the extent of that jurisdiction, and the manner in which in each case it may be expiscated. I agree that in the present case all the proceedings were regular and fair. According to the constitution of the Dean of Guild Court the Court is entitled to proceed upon its own knowledge after due inspection of the buildings, and there is nothing to suggest that the inspection was not properly and fairly made. I see no ground for disturbing the finding of the Dean of Guild Court.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. The appellant's counsel pointed out that the competency of this appeal had not been challenged in the Single Bills, and argued that therefore it must be held that the jurisdiction of this Court was not called in question. I confess I think that in saying so he entirely misunderstood the point taken against him by the respondent, and the position in which the case stands. Nobody disputes the competency of the appeal, nor the jurisdiction of this Court, to consider the grounds upon which it is taken. But it is a totally different matter to say that this Court has jurisdiction to determine, upon an inquiry ordered by the Court itself, special questions of fact and discretion which the statute commits, first to the burgh engineer and then to the Dean of Guild Court, and to substitute our decision for their decision upon these questions. Your Lordship has thought it unnecessary to decide the general question raised by the argument of the respondent's counsel on the point I have just stated, and I quite agree that the case may be disposed of in the circumstances in which it is brought before us without deciding any more general question than your Lordships are disposed to decide—namely, that there is no sufficient ground for our interference in this case. I agree with what was said by your Lordship in the chair, that if the question had arisen under the first of the two Acts founded on, so long as it stood unamended it might have been doubtful whether the opinion of the burgh engineer was not conclusive, because the statute says that when he deems that a building or a wall is ruinous and insecure he shall immediately order the removal of the persons occupying such building, and then there are certainly strong grounds for saying that certain statutory consequences are to follow as a matter of course. But the Lord Advocate conceded, and I think rightly, that it was not very material to determine whether that would have been so or not, because, as the statute is now amended, a power to reconsider the engineer's determination on its merits is given to the Dean of Guild Court. The Dean of Guild Court, when it is set in motion, after hearing parties, may, according to the construction of the statute which the Lord Advocate conceded to be the right one, upon its own judgment, and upon such materials as they think necessary, determine whether the burgh engineer's opinion is to be carried into operation or not. Now, the question is whether we, in like manner, are to consider on its merits the opinion of the Dean of Guild Court. I am not disposed, having regard to the view taken by your Lordship, to consider in what circumstances it might be maintained that we ought to review upon its merits that question of skill and discretion which the Dean of Guild Court has to decide. I have no doubt whatever that if a case could be made to shew that the Dean of Guild Court has not properly applied its mind to the question, if it has not proceeded fairly in the exercise of its jurisdiction so as to do justice to the parties before it, or if it has come to a conclusion without having informed itself of the facts according to the ordinary and proper methods of procedure, the Court should interfere, and we should recall the Dean of Guild's judgment, and remit to him to proceed and do justice, or take some other course which it may be proper to consider when the case arises. But in this case there is really no ground for suggesting that the Dean of Guild Court committed any error of procedure or any injustice. The appellant complained that the notice which was served upon her by the burgh engineer was too general, because she is proprietor only of the lower flat of a certain tenement, and his notice referred generally to the property without specifying the particular part of it, and in what respect it was ruinous. Now, I think as it stood at first the notice is certainly open to that criticism, but then in the course of the proceedings the complaint was made perfectly specific. The appellant denied that her house was ruinous, and the question of fact was dealt with very properly. The Dean of Guild Court, in the first place, ordered an inspection of the premises, and made that inspection themselves. Upon that, as your Lordship has pointed out, they found, in the first place, with reference to the upper flats, which did not belong to the appellant, that they were ruinous and must be taken down, and then they said as to the ground flat, "we shall postpone coming to any conclusion about that until the upper storeys are down; we shall look at it in the position in which it will be after these operations are completed, and then make up our minds as to what shall be done." But when the upper flats had been taken down the Dean of Guild Court—that is, the Dean of Guild and the other practical members of his Court—inspected the premises in the presence of the parties, and came to the conclusion that this lower flat was also ruinous and dangerous, and must be removed. Now, the question is, whether we are to set aside, in the first place, the opinion of the burgh engineer, made after due inspection, that this building is ruinous and dangerous, and must be removed; and secondly, the opinion of the Dean of Guild Court, which is composed, as we all know, of practical men experienced in this particular matter, that the burgh engineer is right, and that the building is dangerous; and to substitute for them our own opinion, which we are to arrive at either by setting up the opinion of one man of skill of our own selection against the opinion of the men of skill appointed by Parliament, who are public officers responsible for the performance of their duty, or our own opinion founded upon a proof to be taken in this Court. I confess I think neither the one course nor the other would—to say the least of it—be at all expedient. The whole proceedings directed by this clause in the statute are intended to be summary. The burgh engineer is to proceed immediately, and that arises from the very nature of the case, namely, that the building is ruinous, and that the safety of the lieges is endangered by its condition. Now, if that question is not to be determined until after proof is taken in a Court of law and the Court have had sufficient opportunity for coming to a conclusion upon the conflicting testimony of experts, it is obviously very probable that in many cases the question would be solved by a high wind before the Court had time to consider it. Then, I think, it is equally out of the question to set up the opinion of one man whom the Court may select as conclusive against the men of skill selected by Parliament. Without suggesting that these considerations should lead to a different conclusion from that of your Lordships, I think they at least afford sufficient ground for refusing to disturb the determination of the Dean of Guild Court, when nothing can be said against the procedure and nothing against the determination itself, except that the appellant thinks it wrong. I observe that the reason which the Dean of Guild gives for the ultimate course of procedure which he took is a perfectly good one, because he says that after the second inspection which the Court ordered, because they thought they would then be in a better position to judge of the condition of the premises than on the first inspection, it was moved for the appellant that she should be allowed to lead proof as to the condition of her premises. The Dean of Guild says,—"The Court repelled this motion, because they consider the matter which was to be the subject of proof is one which they are able to judge of without proof, in respect that the members of the Court are men of skill on this particular matter." I think the Dean of Guild Court was perfectly justified in arriving at that conclusion, and that we should not be justified in disturbing its judgment upon any grounds which have been argued to us.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the interlocutor appealed against.

Reparation—Wrongous Apprehension—Police-constable—Issue.—In an action for damages for wrongous apprehension against two police-constables the pursuer averred:—That the defenders came to her house and apprehended her on a charge of making a disturbance in a shop; that she denied the charge, and signified her willingness to accompany the defenders to the police-office, "but before she could put on her hat and jacket, or any other thing properly, the said" defenders "suddenly seized hold of her, and in presence of her neighbours and a large number of people, dragged her out of her said house down the stairs into the street, and thence to" the police-office; that throughout she offered no resistance, and said to the defenders that she would go quietly with them if they would release their hold of her; but that they paid no heed to her requests.

and violence" apprehended the pursuer in her house, and conveyed her to the police-office?—approved.

IN December 1889 Mrs Isabella M'Gilvray, wife of John M'Gilvray, 30 Kelvin Street, Glasgow, with consent of her husband, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, against William Bernfield and Fanny Cohen, both residing at 102 North Woodside Road, Glasgow, and also against Alexander Main and William Nisbet, constables in the city of Glasgow Police, and Samuel Glass, an inspector in that force, praying for decree against the defenders jointly and severally or severally for the sum of £500, as damages for slanderous charges, assault, and wrongous and oppressive apprehension.

The questions now reported relate solely to the case as directed against the defenders Main and Nisbet. The following were the pursuer's averments in so far as material to the case as against these defenders:—

(Cond. 2) On 2d October 1899, at noon, the pursuer called at the shop 102 North Woodside Road, occupied by the defenders Bernfield and Cohen, for the purpose of making inquiry regarding a chest of drawers, and after she had transacted her business with the defender Cohen, who was in the shop, she left and went home. (Cond. 3) "About three hours afterwards on said date, and while the pursuer was in her house at 30 Kelvin Street aforesaid, which is one stair up from the ground level, and on the door thereof the pursuer's husband's name appears on a brass plate, the defenders Main and Nisbet called on her along with the defender Cohen, and stated in the hearing of Mrs Young, 30 Kelvin Street, Glasgow, and pursuer's daughter Catherine, and her neighbours, that Cohen had charged pursuer with cursing and swearing and making a disturbance in the said shop at 102 North Woodside Road aforesaid on that day, and that pursuer must come with them at once to the police-office at Camperdown Street, Glasgow. Pursuer immediately denied the charge, and signified her willingness to accompany them to the police-office, but before she could put on her hat and jacket, or any other thing properly, the said constables suddenly seized hold of her, and in presence of her neighbours and a large number of people dragged her out of her said house down the stairs into the street, and thence to the Camperdown Police-Office. Pursuer throughout offered no resistance, and said to the constables that she would go quietly with them if they would release their hold of her, but they paid no heed to her requests." (Cond. 4) She was detained in a cell in the police-office for about five hours, after which she was released on bail of 10s. 6d., on the understanding that she would answer to the charge on the following day. (Cond. 5) On the following morning she appeared to answer the charge, but no one appeared against her, and she was allowed to go. (Cond. 7) "The whole of the said proceedings were wrongous, irregular, and oppressive, and the charge made by Bernfield and Cohen, and repeated by the two constables, was false and most slanderous. The pursuer was apprehended without a warrant of any kind, and was subject to the indignity of being dragged from her house through the public streets of Glasgow, and of being detained in the public cell without a warrant of any kind having been first obtained from the proper authorities. The defenders, in apprehending and detaining the pursuer in the manner above mentioned without legal warrant, and in treating her in the manner before described, acted maliciously, oppressively, and illegally, and without any just or probable cause. In executing the arrest they used great harshness and acted with quite unnecessary force and violence. The charge preferred against her was utterly groundless, and was also made maliciously and oppressively."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The pursuer having been assaulted by the defenders Main and Nisbet, the latter are liable in damages to her. (4) The pursuer having been illegally, wrongously, and oppressively seized and marched in custody of the defenders Main and Nisbet, and afterwards detained by the defender Glass in the police-office, these defenders are liable to pursuer in reparation, and decree should be granted, with interest and expenses as craved.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia, that the action was irrelevant.

On 13th February 1900, the Sheriff-substitute (Strachan) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Before answer, allows parties a proof of their averments, other than the defender Samuel Glass. . . . Finds that no relevant case has been stated against the said Samuel Glass: Therefore assoilzies him from the conclusions of the action."

The defenders Main and Nisbet appealed to the Sheriff (Berry), who on 26th June 1900 adhered.

The pursuer then appealed for jury trial.

She proposed two issues, the first being directed against the defenders Bernfield and Cohen, with damages laid at £250. The second was in the following terms:—"(2) Whether, on or about 2d October 1899, the defenders Alexander Main and William Nisbet, maliciously and without probable cause, apprehended the said pursuer in her house at 30 Kelvin Street, Glasgow, and conveyed her to the police-office at Camperdown Street, Glasgow, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £250."

Hunter having moved that the issues proposed be approved, Lees, for the defenders Main and Nisbet, objected to the second issue.

It was pointed out from the bench that, assuming a relevant case to be stated against Main and Nisbet, the second issue proposed was not the appropriate issue to raise that case—that the pursuer's case against these defenders appeared to be, not that they had acted illegally in arresting her without a warrant, but that they had made the arrest with unnecessary force and violence.

Hunter stated that the issue had been framed in accordance with that approved in the case of Young,[1] but intimated that he was willing that the issue should be amended by substituting for the words "maliciously and without probable cause" the words "wrongfully and with unnecessary force and violence."

The issue was amended accordingly.

Lees then argued;—The action as against Main and Nisbet was irrelevant. An action against a police-constable for damages on account of the use of unnecessary force and violence in making an arrest would be allowed to go to trial only if supported by very clear, specific, and substantive averments.[2] Here there was nothing more than the language of mere exaggeration.

Hunter was heard in reply.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I see no ground for not allowing the second issue as now amended. The pursuer makes a distinct averment on record of a wrongful act in which unnecessary violence was used towards her by the police-constables. The wrongfulness of the act consists in what they did. It is said on behalf of the defenders that the language must be assumed to be exaggerated. I do not think we are entitled to assume that. In the meantime we must take the statement that a law-abiding citizen was not allowed to put on decent apparel, but was seized and dragged through the streets. If that were done, she being willing to go peaceably, it is impossible to consider it as otherwise than wrongful. It was said it would be very hard on the police if charges of this kind were made against them when there was no ground for them. I can only say that it is hard on any citizen to have a charge made against him which cannot be justified. Charges are often made by the police themselves which in the ultimate inquiry cannot be justified. I can see no reason for protecting the police more than any other citizen from inquiry where distinct averments of excess are made. The fact is that very few cases of such a kind come before the Court, just for this reason, that in nine cases out of ten the police act within their rights and with fairness, and if they use violence it has been necessary in the carrying out of the law.

In the present case, with the clear averment before us on record, we have no option, in my opinion, but to send this case to be expiscated by evidence.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. The second issue as amended is, whether the police in the execution of their duty behaved wrongfully and with unnecessary force and violence. I quite agree that we should not do anything which would hamper the police in the performance of their duty, but care must also be taken that the police in the performance of their duty do nothing that is wrongful or tyrannical. In the present case what is averred is that the policemen called at the pursuer's house, charged her with a criminal offence, and desired her to go with them to the police-office; that before she could dress herself to go out with decency, they seized hold of her and dragged her with unnecessary violence to the police-office. If that statement is true, then the policemen exceeded their duty.

There appears to be some doubt as to whether the word "wrongfully" should be inserted in the issue. I am of opinion that it should be inserted. The meaning to be attached to the word is shewn by the words with which it is connected, namely, "with unnecessary force and violence." The question is not as to whether the pursuer was apprehended wrongfully because the police had no warrant. If it had been intended to try that question, it would have had to be stated plainly in the issue whether the police acted "wrongfully and without a warrant." But that is not the question sent for trial. That question is whether the police in the execution of their duty acted "wrongfully," because they acted "with unnecessary force and violence."

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. It appears plainly from the pursuer's averments that the police-constables in making the arrest acted on information supplied to them. I therefore think that they were justified in apprehending the pursuer. The question comes really to this—Were the police-constables justified in their mode of carrying out the arrest? I agree that we should not interfere unnecessarily in cases like the present, but if the facts stated on record are assumed to be true, it is impossible to hold that the pursuer's case is irrelevant. It may turn out that the pursuer's averments are not true, and that the police-constables did not act as stated, or that the pursuer resisted, and they were compelled to arrest her violently, but the true facts can only be ascertained at the trial.

The only other point is as to the insertion of the word "wrongfully" in the issue. I have some doubt as to whether this word should be inserted, because it might suggest to the jury that if the pursuer proved that the defenders acted without a warrant they acted "wrongfully," and were not entitled to make the arrest. But it must be understood by the parties and explained to the jury that the word "wrongfully" is not used in that sense, but refers merely to the mode in which the police-constables carried out the arrest.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT approved of the issue as amended as the issue for the trial of the cause.

Contract—Proof—Writ or Oath—Written Contract of Sale—Prior Oral Agreement—Innominate Contract.—In an action raised by A against B for damages for failure to deliver certain parcels of indiarubber goods, A produced and founded on sale-notes under B's hand, bearing that he had sold the goods in question to A. In defence B averred that prior to the transactions condescended on the parties had entered into a verbal agreement to the effect that while the contracts for the supply of rubber by the defender to the pursuer were to be pro forma with the pursuer as buyer, the pursuer was only to receive a commission on the sale of the goods by him to a particular consumer who was named, and further, that the pursuer was to confine his dealings in the article in question to the defender alone. B further averred that A had not implemented this agreement, and moved to be allowed a proof pro ut de jure of his averments. The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) held that the alleged agreement could only be proved by the writ or oath of the pursuer, on the ground that it was an agreement of an innominate and unusual character.

The defender having reclaimed, the Court adhered to the Lord Ordinary's judgment on the ground that it was incompetent to supersede a contract of sale instructed by writing by parole proof of an antecedent oral contract of an entirely different character.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

THIS was an action at the instance of F. R. Müller & Company, merchants, Glasgow, against Weber & Schaer, merchants in Hamburg, concluding for £7500 as damages for breach of contract in respect of the defenders' failure to deliver certain parcels of rubber or gum, known in the trade as balata.

The pursuers averred that by contracts dated in May, June, and July 1899, the pursuers purchased from the defender four several parcels of balata amounting in all to 140 tons, for delivery commencing in July and ending in April 1900.*

The pursuers further averred (Cond. 4) that at the request of the defenders an agreement was come to by letters postponing the time for the delivery of the balata; that the defenders had delivered 14½ tons but refused to deliver the balance; that the pursuers had accordingly been compelled to purchase balata elsewhere to enable them to meet their engagements; that the price had risen, and that they had suffered loss in consequence to the extent of the sum sued for.

The defenders admitted that they refused to deliver the balance of the balata.

They stated, inter alia, that the principal consumers of balata in the United Kingdom were R. & J. Dick of Glasgow, and that they received their supplies from the defenders through the pursuers. "The business in indiarubber between the pursuers and defenders was done in the ordinary way of merchants' business, the pursuers sending orders at certain prices, and the defenders accepting if satisfied with the prices. Prior to September 1898 the business in block balata was done in similar form, but on the basis that the pursuers on their part were really doing the business on commission for the defenders, that is to say, their profit was in the form of a commission on the sales made to them for R. & J. Dick."

Further, that in consequence of incidents displeasing to the defenders, Messrs Weber and Mr Lussman, the defenders' broker in balata, had a meeting in Hamburg with Mr F. R. Müller of the pursuers' firm, with a view to adjusting the footing on which business was to be done. (Stat. 6) "Before Mr Müller left Hamburg he had a meeting with the Messrs Weber and Mr Lussman, when an agreement was come to as the basis of all future transactions in block balata between the pursuers and the defenders, to the following effects, viz., that while the contracts should pro forma continue to be with the pursuers as buyers—(1) The pursuers should be bound to accept a commission of one-half per cent from the defenders and to take no further commission or profit from Messrs Dick; (2) The pursuers should be bound to sell all balata supplied by the defenders to Messrs Dick at the defenders' invoice prices, and to put before Messrs Dick all the defenders' offers or proposals of business at the prices and on the terms quoted by them; (3) That if the pursuers desired at any time to speculate in balata on their own account they should only be entitled to do so after advising the defenders beforehand of the transactions, and on condition that any such balata bought by them was not for Messrs Dick, but for the pursuers' own account, or eventually for account of one or other of the smaller consumers in the United Kingdom; (4) That in the absence of express stipulation all block balata sold by the defenders to the pursuers should be for Messrs Dick so as to

* The contracts were, mutatis mutandis, in the following form:—

"Von WEBER & SCHAER.

"Für Herr Messrs F. R. MÜLLER & Co., Glasgow.

"DEAR SIRS,—

"We have this day sold to you:

"60 tons Venezuela Block Balata, July/December delivery, at 1/4 per lb. engl. f.o.b. here, less ½ % for you, payable per cheque on London within 14 days after date of B/L.

enable the defenders to keep in touch with that firm's requirements; (5) That the pursuers should not buy any block balata in Hamburg except through the defenders, and that they should not buy in any other market; (6) That the pursuers should transmit to the defenders accurate information as to requirements and arrangements of Messrs Dick in regard to the purchase of balata. The above mentioned agreement was made as the basis of all future business in balata between the parties, and all contracts made thereafter, and in particular the contracts now sued on by the pursuers were entered into subject to said agreement and were conditional upon the pursuers duly performing their part thereof. In the contracts carried out after this agreement was come to the pursuers, while appearing as buyers on the invoices, were paid the stipulated commission of one-half per cent above mentioned."

That the pursuers had violated the terms of this agreement, and that consequently the defenders, as already stated, had refused to deliver the balance of the balata.

The pursuers pleaded;—(4) The defenders' averments of agency contract alleged to qualify the contracts libelled in condescendence 3 can only be proved by writ or oath. (5) The alleged contract libelled in statement 6 of the defenders' statement of facts being innominate and unusual, can only be proved by writ or oath.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) Lis alibi pendens. (4) In respect of the pursuers' breach of contract as condescended on, the defenders were justified in refusing to make delivery under the contracts sued on.

On 4th December 1900 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Repels the second plea in law for the defenders: Sustains the fifth plea in law for the pursuers: Allows the defenders a proof by writ of the pursuers of defenders' averments in statement 6 of their statement of facts; and quoad ultra, and under reservation of all other pleas, allows the pursuers a proof of their averments on record, and to the defenders a conjunct probation." *

* "OPINION.—In this action the pursuers, merchants in Glasgow, purchased from the defenders, merchants in Hamburg, 140 tons of balata, which is a species of gum; and they produce four memoranda signed by the defenders and addressed to the pursuers, each stating that the defenders had sold to the pursuers the quantities of balata therein mentioned, the four contracts making up the total amount of 140 tons. The pursuers aver that the defenders have delivered only 14½ tons, and have refused to deliver the remaining 125½ tons; and this is an action of damages for the defenders' failure to deliver in terms of their contracts. The pursuers allege that the price of balata has risen since the date of their contracts, and they conclude for £7500 as the amount of damage which they have suffered. That, of course, they require to prove.

"The defenders do not dispute the contracts, and they admit the nonfulfilment of them. They, however, take the plea of lis alibi pendens; and, on the merits, they plead that they were justified in refusing to make delivery because of the pursuers' breach of a contract which they, the defenders, allege.

"[After dealing with the plea of lis alibi pendens.] The other defence of breach of contract is founded on an averment of a verbal agreement, said to have been entered into in Hamburg at a date not definitely stated, but shortly after September 1898, the parties to which are said to have been the defenders and a member of the pursuers' firm, and which the defenders

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) This was not an attempt to vary a concluded and unambiguous written contract by parole proof of a prior verbal agreement. The alleged contract of sale was not complete. It was unilateral only. There was no antecedent request or order for the goods bearing to be sold—no writing at all under the hand of the pursuers. The contract, moreover, was not wholly contained in the sale-notes founded on. On the pursuers' own averments (cond. 4) the terms of these were modified by certain letters which were not before the Court. The alleged contract was not unambiguous. The price was stated to be so much "for you" or "to you." That was a very unusual clause, and suggested a special relationship pointing to just such an agreement as the defenders alleged. In the circumstances a proof at large should be allowed.[1] The cases founded on by the pursuers were cases of contracts absolutely complete and perfectly unambiguous. (2) The Lord Ordinary's judgment was based on the ground that the alleged agreement was of an innominate and anomalous character. But the rule restricting proof in the say 'was made as the basis of all future business in balata between the parties and all contracts made thereafter, and in particular the contracts now sued on were entered into subject to said agreement,' which is a very singular averment. This alleged verbal agreement is quoted in statement 6, and a most intricate and confused and singularly expressed agreement it is. This is the agreement which the pursuers are said to have broken, and, until it and the breach of it are proved, there seems no defence except as to amount. The pursuers argued that the averment was irrelevant in any view, but that is a point which may be cleared after proof, if the agreement and breach are proved by competent evidence.

"In regard to this agreement, the pursuers have pleaded that it can only be proved by writ or oath, firstly (plea 4), because it purports to qualify the written contract expressed in the memoranda, and secondly, because it is innominate and unusual. I incline to think that both pleas are good, although, looking to the terms in which the memoranda are expressed and the circumstance that, so far as they form contracts, or rather parts of contracts, they are unilateral, I have some doubt as to the first of these pleas, and prefer to proceed on the second. There is a rule in our law to the effect that contracts which are both innominate and unusual can only be proved by writ or oath. It is a rule which may not be of easy application in all circumstances, but it has been enforced and judicially affirmed too often to be questioned; in particular in Edmonstone v. Edmonstone, 7th June 1861, 23 D. 995, 33 Scot. Jur. 514; Taylor v. Forbes, 13th January 1853, 24 D. 19, note; Wharton v. Goodlet, 16th July 1864, 6 Macph. 1067; Forbes v. Caird, 1877, 4 R. 114; and Garden v. The Earl of Aberdeen, 24th June 1893, 20 R. 896. If ever there was an averment of a verbal agreement to which this rule might be fitly applied, it is the agreement averred by the defenders, for it is so detailed and so confused that the idea that it could possibly be proved by parole seems almost out of the question. It was urged by the defenders that the rule had never been applied to a mercantile contract, and should not be extended. But I see no reason, and the opinions of the Judges suggest none, for making any distinction as to this point between a mercantile contract and any other. The unreasonableness of leaving a complex contract to depend on mere memory is as great in the case of a mercantile contract as of any other, and the reasons for the rule, good or bad, apply equally. I feel, therefore, bound to sustain the pursuers' fifth plea, which will make it unnecessary to dispose of plea four; and I think the proper course will be to allow a proof, reserving the other pleas of parties."

case of innominate agreements was highly technical. It was very rarely applied, and only when the contract alleged bordered upon the incredible, which was very far from being the case here. The tendency of the Court was to reject the rule,[1] especially in the case of mercantile transactions.[2]

Argued for the respondents;—(1) What the defenders proposed to do was to displace what was on the face of it a written contract of sale by a verbal agreement, proved only by parole evidence, of agency. That was directly against the well-established rule that the terms of a written contract could not be contradicted or varied by parole evidence.[3] (2) The Lord Ordinary was right in holding, on the authority of the cases cited by his Lordship, that the contract alleged by the defenders was innominate and unusual, and proveable therefore only by the writ or oath of the pursuers.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion that the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived is correct, although I prefer to rest my judgment on somewhat different grounds.

The first question is, what is the nature of the contracts, if any, which purport to have been made by the four "sold-notes"—to describe the writings by the most general name. The four notes emanate from the defenders, they are their writings, and they were in effect accepted by the pursuers.

Taking as a sample the note of 15th May 1899 we find that it runs thus:—"We have this day sold to you—60 tons Venezuela Block Balata, July/December delivery, at 1/4 per lb. engl. f.o.b. here, less ½ per cent for you, payable per cheque on London within 14 days after date of B/L."

That appears to me to be as distinct a record of a contract of purchase and sale (unless it is at once rejected by the person to whom it is sent), as could well be imagined. If the relation of the parties had been such that one of them was entitled to reject, and did timeously reject, the offer, a different question would have arisen. These notes, however, were not rejected, but were retained, and this retention of them seems to me to infer the acceptance of an unambiguous offer of sale in which all the essential terms of such a contract are to be found. The only point, as I understood the argument, that was made on the construction of the notes was that there was one ambiguous expression, viz., "less ½ per cent for you." This, it was argued, suggests agency, and so raises an ambiguity which requires to be cleared by proof. The expression, however, appears to me to be a natural and ordinary way of describing a discount. The "to you" which occurs in one of the notes seems to be a variation which is immaterial. The contract then is in writing, and it is, when retained, an unequivocal record of a transaction of purchase and sale.

The defenders, however, deny that there is any contract of sale, or any relation of buyer and seller, alleging that the agreement was truly one of agency. The pursuers reply that to allow the proof asked would be to sanction an attempt to convert what on the face of a written instrument is one contract, into an essentially different contract, which should not be permitted unless upon the production of evidence of a similar character to that by which the original contract is established, i.e., proof scripto. Accordingly, without having recourse to the plea that the contract which the defenders seek to establish is innominate and unusual, it appears to me to be a sufficient ground of judgment that the defenders' proposal is to displace the effect of documents constituting or recording contracts of sale, and to substitute for these another and a wholly different contract. And when we inquire how it is proposed that this should be done, we find that it is not by another writing or writings, but by parole proof of a statement [defenders' stat. 6] to this effect, that Mr Müller had a meeting in Hamburg with Mr Weber, "when an agreement was come to . . . to the following effects, viz., that while the contracts should pro forma continue to be with the pursuers as buyers (1)," and then follow six detailed heads embracing many matters of a somewhat complex and unusual kind. It is to be observed that not only is it not alleged that there was any writing embodying the contract proposed to be set up, but it is not said that the words set out in the six heads were in fact used on the occasion of the meeting. They purport to be merely a summary or result of what in the view of one of the parties passed between them at the meeting. But it is well known that the effect of a conversation is a thing about which parties may very well differ, and to allow a proof of so general an allegation would be to take off the effect of an unequivocal written contract by an allegation of the effect or result of verbal communings. Further, the proposal is not to modify the written contract by anything which happened subsequently, it is to prove that the written contracts were governed by an antecedent master contract which was to regulate all the future dealings of the parties, although no such contract is ever mentioned in the writings instructing their transactions. If the agreement of the parties was such as the defenders allege, it ought to have been reduced to writing, so that the subsequent written contracts could have been read along with it. Further, the tenor of the governing contract which the defenders seek to prove is inconsistent with the writings. The peculiarity is, that while one of the defenders' allegations is that the contracts for the future should pro forma continue to be with the pursuers as buyers, the proposal now made is to prove that the contracts are not sales at all. It is hardly necessary to point out the improbability of such an agreement as is alleged, and the danger there would be in setting aside later written contracts, when the presumption is that a subsequent writing is the last and governing expression of the agreement. The agreement alleged is not only very improbable, it is also very one-sided, binding the pursuers to give up all other trade connections and deal only with the pursuers, while the defenders are not placed under any corresponding restriction. It would, in my view, be contrary to the settled rules of evidence to permit a clear and unequivocal writing to be displaced by a parole agreement such as that alleged by the defenders.

LORD M'LAREN.—I quite agree, and have very little to add. The case is that the purchasers of goods under a sale-note bring an action of damages against the sellers for failure to deliver the goods.

The case for the defenders is that this sale-note is only pro forma a sale, and is subject to an antecedent agreement, whereby five or six conditions have to be observed in all transactions between the parties. The effect of these is to reduce the contract of sale to one of agency. Prima facie this appears to be a kind of agreement which could only be proved by written evidence, because it is an agreement which the parties who might desire to enter into it would be careful to reduce to writing. It is not difficult to find a good legal justification in support of the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, i.e., that the defenders' averments can only be proved by writ or oath. I think the key to the question is to be found in the consideration that the effect of the alleged agreement is not to add to or vary the contract, but to put an end to the contract of sale, and to substitute a new and different contract for it. Now, there is a doctrine in our law that when by a written contract property has passed, any agreement to restrict the right of property which has passed must be proved by writ or oath. I referred to certain cases in which, by an extension of the principle of the Trust Act, 1696, rather than by the direct application of that Act, it was held that you could not transform a written agreement of sale into some other contract otherwise than by the writ or judicial admission of the ex facie owner. In Hamilton v. Western Bank,[1] where goods were transferred to a bank ex facie absolutely, this principle was applied. A proof was allowed to the bank of its averment of pledge, but the Lord President announced that the proof had completely failed; and his Lordship's judgment is rested on the ground that the title could only be qualified in terms of the bank's judicial admission, which was, that the bank had taken over the goods in security of present and future advances.

In what I say I recognise that there may be cases of sale where the essentials of the contract are in writing, in which, nevertheless, certain conditions of the contract may be proved by parole. As an illustration, the case may be figured where the time and place of delivery are not expressly stated in the agreement. In such a case the law implies the usual conditions in the particular trade, and allows parole evidence to prove what these are. And I do not think that our judgment at all infringes on the principle that in the case of sale, which is a proper consensual contract, evidence of all conditions in the contract is competent, and such evidence may be partly oral and partly in writing. Nor do I wish to suggest a doubt as to the principle on which the Lord Ordinary has rested his judgment, because I have no doubt that there may be cases of contracts so unusual that they can only be proved by writ or oath. As an illustration, take the case of a contract of service for an unusual period—say for a term of years. But I prefer to rest my judgment on the ground I have stated, that this is an attempt to substitute one contract for another by

STUBBS, LIMITED, Defenders (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Asher, K.C.—T. B. Morison.

Reparation — Slander — Privilege — Malice—Trade Slander—Company for providing subscribers with confidential information as to financial status of traders.—In an action of damages for slander, the pursuers averred that shortly after they had placed an order with a manufacturer the defenders wrote to the manufacturer of and concerning them that "they do a fairly extensive trade, but the account, from various causes, is not regarded with much confidence in these markets, although in certain quarters they appear to be in receipt of moderate credit. The capital at command, however, is limited, and the payments of late have been slow and unsatisfactory, but their settlements for years have always been dilatory. At the same time, several of their shops are not thought to be paying, and it is feared that credit transactions meanwhile represent more than an average risk"; and that the defenders had failed to make adequate inquiry, which would have shewn that these statements were false.

It was admitted that the defenders were a company formed for the purpose, inter alia, of preventing their subscribers from making bad debts, by furnishing them with information as to the financial status of persons with whom they proposed to trade; that the manufacturer was a subscriber of the company; that the letter complained of was written in response to a request by the manufacturer for information as to the amount of credit which it would be safe for him to give the pursuers; and that the information was given on the condition that it was confidential, for the use of the subscriber only, and not to be divulged by him to any third party.

Held (1) (dub. Lord Trayner) that the case was relevant, and (2) that the defenders were privileged in writing as they did, and that malice must be put in the issue.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

THIS was an action of damages for slander at the instance of Messrs Bayne & Thomson, grocers and confectioners, Renfrew Street, Glasgow, against Messrs Stubbs, Limited, Edinburgh.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 2) "About the middle of February 1900 the pursuers gave an order to Messrs Gatti Brothers, chocolate manufacturers, Acton Street, Haggerston, London, per their Glasgow agent, Mr James Thompson Dowling, for a half ton of chocolates at £74 per ton nett. One half of the order was to have been delivered immediately after the order was given, and the balance when required." (Cond. 3) "Immediately after the said order was given the defenders, in or about February or March 1900, wrote to Messrs Gatti, stating that the pursuers' account 'from various causes is not regarded with much confidence in these markets, although in certain quarters they appear to be in receipt of moderate credit. The capital at command, however, is limited, and the payments of late have been slow and unsatisfactory, but their settlements for years have always been dilatory. At the same time, several of their shops are not thought to be paying, and it is feared that credit transactions meanwhile represent more than an average risk.'"* (Cond. 4) "The said statements made by the defenders are of and concerning the pursuers, and are false. By the said statements the defenders represented that the pursuers were in financial difficulties, and were persons whose financial position was so bad as to render it unsafe for merchants and traders to have business relations with them. They were made by the defenders of and concerning the pursuers falsely, calumniously, and maliciously. If the defenders had made adequate inquiry they would have ascertained that the financial status of the pursuers was excellent. They, however, failed to make such inquiry. As a result of said statements being made, Messrs Gatti failed to deliver the first portion of the chocolate when required, and only made delivery thereof upon receiving an assurance from their said representative that the said statements regarding the pursuers were entirely untrue.'

The defenders, in reply, stated that the letter contained no libel, and averred (Ans. 3 and 4) "that the defenders are a company of merchants and others engaged in trade, formed for the purpose, inter alia, of promoting bona fide trading, and preventing their subscribers from making bad debts. The said Messrs Gatti, who are subscribers of the defenders, made inquiry regarding the pursuers' position in the spring of the present year, and the defenders, in the exercise of their lawful rights in the interests of their said subscribers, answered said inquiry, but the defenders' answer was marked 'private and confidential'; and is a confidential document, and is regarded as such by Messrs Gatti."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The answer which the defenders made to Messrs Gatti's inquiry being confidential, and, separatim, being a privileged communication, the defenders ought to be assoilzied.

By interlocutor dated 13th November 1900, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) repelled the defenders' first and second pleas, and approved of the following issue:—"(1) Whether on or about February or March 1900 the defenders wrote to Messrs Gatti stating that the pursuers' account [here followed the statement libelled in cond. 3], and whether the said statements are of and concerning the pursuers, and are false and calumnious, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?"†

* The full text of the letter from which the statement libelled was taken was not produced till the hearing in the Inner-House, as after mentioned, and consisted of the above quotation, preceded by the words, "This is an old established firm of grocers and tea-merchants having several retail branch shops throughout the city, and an office and stores at the address given. They do a fairly extensive trade, but the account," and followed by the words, "Registered Information:—Small-debt decree, 1887; Small-debt decree, 1899."

† "OPINION.—This is a case of considerable importance and difficulty; but, after careful consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the first and second pleas for the defenders should be repelled, and that an issue for the pursuers should be adjusted.

"The pursuers are tradesmen. The defenders say that they (the defenders) 'are a company of merchants and others engaged in trade, formed for the purpose, inter alia, of promoting bona fide trading, and preventing their subscribers from making bad debts.' This may be quite true, but cannot be assumed at this stage, as the pursuers gave no admission on the subject.

"The pursuers set forth that the defenders wrote to Messrs Gatti the

The defenders reclaimed.

At the hearing the pursuers gave an admission of the defenders' statements in ans. 3 and 4, quoted above, and the full text of the inquiry by Messrs Gatti, which was on a form furnished by the defenders to their subscribers, and of the defenders' reply containing the alleged slander,* was for the first time produced.

The inquiry was as follows:—

"Please Report (upon the terms and conditions at foot hereof) respecting letter or memorandum set forth on record, but they do not aver or admit that that letter was an answer to inquiries by Messrs Gatti. The form of the pleadings forbids the assumption that it was. The pursuers have presented issues without any innuendo. They pressed for approval of these issues as they stood; but stated that they were willing to put in issue the innuendo which they have averred, if that was necessary. I may deal with this question of the innuendo at once, by saying that I do not think it admissible. So far as the innuendo expresses no more than the letter quoted, it would be superfluous. So far as it expresses something which the letter, according to its sound construction, does not express, I do not think it admissible. The innuendo sets forth that the letter represented that the pursuers were in financial difficulties. I think that is going further than the letter goes, and is putting on it a meaning which, on its sound construction, it does not bear. Therefore, while, as I have said, I think the pursuers are entitled to an issue, I think it must be on the letter without the innuendo.

"The defenders have maintained that the letter is not libellous, and that the action is irrelevant. They founded on the case of MacLaren v. Robertson, January 4, 1859, 21 D. 183, which they represented as conclusive in their favour. That case, however, does not relate to a trade slander. The pursuer was not a merchant or tradesman, but an innkeeper. The judgment proceeded on an extremely rigid criticism of the averments, and I think the Court regarded the alleged slander as imputing to the pursuer no more than poverty. They held that the words did not warrant the innuendo that he was represented to be insolvent. The case certainly decides that it is not defamatory to say of a man that he is poor, but I think it cannot be regarded as deciding any more general proposition, at least in regard to defamation of trade.

"There have been, however, later decisions which appear even more in point. The case of Andrews v. Drummond, March 5, 1887, 14 R. 568, was an appeal from the Sheriff Court. It was an action directed against parties who issued a publication which related to the financial position of the persons whose names they published. The pursuers' name was published in one of the lists, and certain statements were made in reference to them. The Lord President, in whose judgment the other Judges concurred, in dealing with these statements, observed that the meaning of them was 'that, as regards the whole persons named in the list, there is circumstances to be divulged to a third party, and the subscriber shall be held accountable for any loss or damage arising from the breach or non-observance of this agreement; also that subscriptions are only received, status inquiry books and search cards or forms furnished, and all information given, upon the understanding that the agency is not to be held responsible for damage or loss arising from insufficient or inaccurate information, whether by reason of mistake or negligence of the agency, its servants, agents, or correspondents, or otherwise.

"The dispensing of credit with safety being a matter demanding the utmost discretion, the subscriber undertakes to obtain information from other available sources, and not to give credit in sole reliance upon any information furnished by the agency."

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The Lord Ordinary had held that the letter complained of could not bear the innuendo which was averred, and the pursuers maintained that no innuendo was necessary, but in the absence of any innuendo there was no relevant case, for the letter, in the ordinary meaning of its terms, contained no libel, either personal or trade.[1] It was no libel to say that a man's credit was not of the highest; and this letter, unless it could be innuendoed, merely amounted to a statement that the pursuers had credit, but not the best. The case of Andrews,[2] relied on by the pursuers, and risk in dealing with them. If that be the true meaning, it certainly contains something that in law amounts to slander as against any party whose name is in that list, because it manifestly means that he is a party who cannot be dealt with by shopkeepers without the shopkeepers incurring a risk, which means that he is not in good credit.' That appears to me to lay down distinctly that it is slanderous to say of a tradesman untruly that he is in bad credit.

"In Wright and Greig v. Outram, July 17, 1889, 16 R. 1004, which was also a case of trade slander, an issue was adjusted whether a paragraph in the Glasgow Herald represented that the pursuers were in financial difficulties and were being financed by means of accommodation bills. That representation, however, goes further than the statement in this case, which does not represent or mean to assert that the pursuers were in financial difficulties. It is no doubt carefully and temperately expressed, but I think it is certainly disparaging to the pursuers' credit, and represents it as under average. The opinion given, however moderately expressed, is such as, if published, might be destructive of the pursuers' credit and ruinous to their trade.

"It was further argued for the defenders that the expression of their opinion was privileged, and that the pursuers could not succeed without proof of malice, which was not, and indeed according to the defenders could not be, relevantly averred. But I think it impossible to deal safely with that question at present, because I know nothing judicially about the defenders or their connection with this case, except that they made, or are said to have made, the statements referred to, with what object, and whether in answer to inquiries or ultroneously, I do not at present know. There was no proof of malice in the case of Andrews v. Drummond, and malice was not put in the issue in the case of Wright and Greig v. Outram. But I do not desire to decide at present that when the facts are fully disclosed there may not be room for the plea of privilege and for the argument that the statement complained of was the legitimate answer to legitimate questions. . . ."

founded on by the Lord Ordinary, was distinguishable. It was not a case of imparting confidential information, but of ultroneous publication, no doubt, to subscribers, but to subscribers whether they had asked for the special information or not. (2) The occasion was privileged, and if an issue were allowed, malice must be put in it. Stubbs were the agents of Messrs Gatti, and were under a legal obligation to do what they were paid for, viz., to ascertain and communicate to Messrs Gatti what they had learned as to the status of the pursuers.[1]

Argued for pursuers;—(1) The case was relevant and undistinguishable from Andrews.[2] The case of MacLaren[3] was distinguishable as not being a case of trade libel, and as establishing merely that it was no libel to call a man "poor." It was unnecessary to innuendo this letter; it spoke for itself. (2) No such company as the defenders' had ever been held to be protected by privilege. They could not be said to be a company fulfilling any moral or social duty, as was the case in Waller.[4] This was a company ultroneously putting itself forward as willing to give information for profit to itself. In order to create privilege, it was necessary that the person making the statement, the person to whom it was made, and the person of whom it was made, should be interrelated. There must be a right or duty to make the statement, and a right to hear it. No doubt a relationship existed between the defenders and Messrs Gatti which entitled the latter to ask for the information, but no relationship (such as, e.g., existed between master and servant) existed between defenders and pursuers which created either a right or a duty in the former to impart the information to Messrs Gatti, and in the absence of such a relationship there could be no privilege. If a private detective were to give untrue information, he would not be privileged whether he did it ultroneously or for gain or on employment, and the defenders were in no better position. It was always difficult to prove malice against a corporation, and if the defenders were to get the benefit of privilege, it would be practically licensing them to deal with the characters and reputations of others as they chose.
